On the other hand, the energy generation side of the Department of Energy is a little dull. There are vast opportunities for United Kingdom exports of small-scale generation technology in the range 100 kW to 10 MW. Half the world's population requires energy at that level. The Department of Energy is denying support to the United Kingdom industry for small-scale projects to get the prototype demonstrations that are required for export purposes.

The Department of Trade and Industry is fulfilling that role to some extent, but it does not have the Department of Energy's expertise. The Department of Trade and Industry has had its successes. It supported the Orkney scheme of James Howden of Glasgow. During the past 18 months that company has sold 10 generators overseas. However, all this bypassed the Department of Energy.

The hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) referred to the Norwegian wave energy project. I, too, regret the United Kingdom's withdrawal from wave energy research, because it has reached an advanced stage at East Kilbride in the National Engineering Laboratory and Coventry, at Lanchester polytechnic, which has a consortium of companies ready to go ahead, given a little help with funding. The Norwegian companies have been successful in building 500 KW generators, two of them for £800,000. But this is "too small" in Department of Energy terms.

What is the role of the Central Electricity Generating Board? I suspect that it, not the Government, gives the thumbs down to alternative energy schemes. There is no way in which a prototype demonstration can be cost-effective.

As for photovoltaic cells, the Under-Secretary of State said that the Department of Trade and Industry supports companies with a view to realising export potential. But why is the Department of Energy not interested in the development of amorphous silicon systems, such as those developed at Dundee and Herriot-Watt universities? They have a real export potential.

I was in Japan at the same time as the Minister. I visited Mr. Iwe, the president of Sanyo. He showed me round his solar house in Osaka. This is a massively expensive capital project which has largely been designed as a research base. It is completely reliant upon solar energy. I visited Osaka with Mr. Steve Wozniak, the founder of Apple computers, who had also evaluated a "total reliance" scheme for his home in California but had turned it down. Nobody is seriously suggesting total dependence upon alternative energy. In simple, pragmatic terms, we are looking, as the Minister said, at flexibility and diversity.

The practical problems facing local authorities need to be taken into account. I pay tribute to the Wiltshire county council architect, Mr. Haynes, who for some years has been seeking to develop an energy policy. Some of the most effective measures are the most simple, such as new buildings with proper draught exclusion systems and cavity wall insulation. The county council has examined the use of straw for heating. It has visited Denmark and Germany but has found that this is not economic. In response to the possible use of straw for heating, farmers have put up the price of straw.

Domestic rubbish is being burned in the cement works at Westbury. The county council is evaluating conservation measures, including double glazing and cavity walls. The pay-back on double glazing is 15 years and on cavity wall insulation four years. If county councils can build that into their building programmes it is useful. County councils will probably believe that they can save on static measures but that people on site cannot be controlled. That is one of the biggest sources of wasted energy. People leave doors and windows open in offices and schools and a kindly caretaker will probably increase the heating, if it gets a little chilly, by putting up the thermostat.

I pay tribute also to commercial undertakings such as Endless Holdings in my Salisbury constituency. It has developed such successful energy management systems for large buildings that it now operates in New York and Hawaii as well as in Salisbury. How appropriate that its headquarters in Salisbury is situated in one of our oldest medieval streets, Endless street.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) was right to mention wind generators as a potential project for our aid programme. As I said, half the world's population needs small-scale energy generation and the Danes have developed the Vesta wind turbines. Since they were designed seven years ago, production has reached 10 a day, at £30,000 each and 80 per cent. of them go for export.

It is time that the Department of Energy, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Overseas Development Administration started working much more closely. I bear in mind particularly the report on the science budget published at the end of July by the Select Committee on Education, Science and the Arts and I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that there is a severe squeeze on the research councils and the universities. Our competitors are increasing their spending and in Japan the proportion of gross national product spent on research will soon rise to 3 per cent.

There is one area where this country has egg on its face, Eigg, the island off Scotland, was to have been the site of an exciting scheme sponsored by the United Nations and managed by the university of Strathclyde. I understand that the project has fallen through and I urge the Minister to look at the problem urgently.

That is the new key element that I mentioned earlier. The Eigg project was overseen by the Ministry of Agriculture, which, understandably, has no energy commitment. To its credit, the Ministry approached the ODA which, equally understandably, questioned whether aid money should be spent on Eigg.

The energy studies unit at Strathclyde university is involved in a project with the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation and the United Nations development programme to evaluate the possibilities of renewable energy for farms and rural communities in Europe. It seeks to define economically viable technical solutions to meet energy demands in farms and rural communities from renewable sources and to identify combinations of technologies that give the best economic and operational results. It also seeks to define the barriers that hamper the diffusion of renewable energy systems in agricultural and rural communities.

The FAO-UNDP project was started only at the beginning of this year, after a two-year study. The countries involved are seven less-developed countries—

Czechoslovakia, Greece, Hungary, Poland, Portugal, Romania and Yugoslavia and six more highly developed countries—Finland, France, Israel, Italy, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

The ultimate goal of the project is to commit the rural communities of those countries to reduce their dependence on external energy supplies, which are often transported great distances at great cost and carry subsidies, either implicit or explicit, because the rural area is charged the same price for its energy as the urban area. It is intended to demonstrate that the use of locally developed energy resources can reduce the production costs of agricultural commodities and increase farm profits.

For each participating country, an analysis has been made of individual technologies that are both technically and economically capable of supplying energy requirements in agriculture and villages.

The most rational combination of technologies for reducing the external energy consumption, depending on the individual requirements, is the goal of the analysis. In order to realise the aims, three steps were adopted. First, demonstration sites had to be found. Secondly a methodology was defined to analyse the energy requirements of the sites and, thirdly, a computer model was made to simulate the renewable energy systems and calculate the optimum combination of plant sizes.

The first two steps have been completed for the 10 participating countries. The sites have been selected, the energy demand curves have been measured and the locally available renewable energies have been identified. The next step is to define the optimum integrated energy systems and carry out installation in each country.

Work on that last part of the project has only recently started in earnest. Data are being collected on the positive and negative factors that affect the acceptance of renewable energy at farm level. Those factors include legislation, subsidies, and an infrastructure of maintenance, such as the existence of companies manufacturing appropriate plants.

The project is co-ordinated by the university of Milan, which carries out all the data collection and computer model work. Strathclyde university's energy studies unit is responsible for overseeing the computer modelling work and the data collection techniques.

Unless we manage to find funding to start a United Kingdom demonstration site, our involvement will be terminated by FAO and UNDP. That would be tragic. Demonstration site technology includes gasifiers for wood and crop residues, solar ponds, heat pumps, aerogenerators and windmills, biogas digesters and solar collectors for crop drying.

The energy produced from those sources is used for grain drying and vegetable drying, wood chip drying, milking, space heating, greenhouses, stables, hot water, lighting, water pumping and distilling as well as basic electricity generation. This is just the type of international collaboration in which we should be involved.

I congratulate the Minister on his enthusiasm and leadership, but we want him to do more. He has our full support. Please will he have another look at his Department's attitude to small-scale projects that can be of enormous benefit to ourselves in our urban communities through passive energy design, in our rural communities through increasing use of on-site supplementary energy, and in response to the strength of feeling that we must do more to aid the development of the Third world?

1.37 pm

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): When it was announced that we were due to have today's debate, I am sure that many thought that it would be a debate for the echo freaks and the friends of the foxgloves, that we would look back on a land with windmills at which we could all tilt and that we should be lounging on our green Benches dreaming of the countryside. That could not be further from the truth, as the Minister made plain in his spirited defence of the Government.

The Minister set the tone for the debate. We are looking not backwards but at the frontiers of modern technologies. When we discuss alternative energy and renewables, we are trying to harness and use skilfully the lessons of higher and nuclear physics, chemistry and technology and to use to the best of our ability our natural resources. We are talking about a new subject and I am pleased that we have been able to have such a good debate.

It is inevitable that politicians should have to grapple with today's problems. That is our role. We tend to put off tomorrow's problems for tomorrow's generation. At best, we leave the alternatives and subjects connected with the forefront of technology to the academics and scientists.

We have discussed renewable energy in two dimensions or timescales. The Minister spoke of trying to use and generate renewable energy to deal with the problems of today, tomorrow and the day after tomorrow. However, we should constantly bear in mind the other problems that will emerge in 20 or even 50 years from now. I am certain that many of the projects which we reject today will be developed in the years ahead.

There are difficulties because Governments have to deal with budgets and rates of return. The Minister repeatedly made it plain that he is looking for the most cost-effective way of using energy. Although that may seem attractive, when trying to look far ahead it is difficult to be absolutely certain that the accounting system of today will also be the accounting system of tomorrow.

There is a great divide between Opposition Members and Conservative Members. Although we agree with much of what has been said today, we do not believe that a cash value can be put on every judgment. The Government should take other aspects into consideration when deciding which of the alternative forms of energy to back.

We would not have been seriously discussing the subject today had there not been an oil price hike in the mid-1970s. As the Minister said, he had to look at a programme that had been developing for 10 years, and which was aimed to come to fruition in the mid-1980s. It has done so, and he has taken decis for the second advance of the programme.

The Minister, rightly and not surprisingly, pointed out that the Government had increased spending on renewables. Using a five-year block involved a little sleight of hand, but it was convenient and suited the Minister. I do not quibble about the figures that he used; they were accurate. However, it was not the best way to present them. He should have adopted the same manner that he used on 13 June in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), when he gave a breakdown of the Government's reports over the past 10 years for each broad band of renewables.

Those detailed figures show a slightly different picture from the broad global figure that he used today to defend the Government's record. Even his broad global figure of £14 million to be spent in the current year is considerably less than the figures for 1981-82 and 1982-83. If analysed in detail, the position is alarming. That is why his hon. Friends were critical of some aspects of the Government's approach to renewables.

[Dr. David Clark]

The figures show that the amount spent on wave power research has fallen from £1 million in 1983-84 to £400,000 in 1984-85. That really means the end of support. Expenditure on geothermal aquifers has fallen from £1·8 million to £1·1 million; on solar power it has fallen from £900,000 to £500,000. As many hon. Members have said today, research on solar power should go ahead as fast as possible, not only for our benefit and that of the good citizens of Salisbury, where apparently the sun is always shining, but as an effective way to give overseas aid to underdeveloped countries. I suspect that many Conservative Members agree with the Opposition on that point. Indeed, the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) mentioned that.

Expenditure on biomass fell from £300,000 to £200,000. The Minister will say that there have been increases, and there have. They have occurred primarily in two areas: in wind, where expenditure has increased from £2·5 million to £4·8 million, and in geothermal hot dry rocks — principally the Camborne experiment — where expenditure has gone up from £2·9 million to £4·6 million.

The Minister said that they had been identified as winners. We are worried lest they are being developed at the cost of the remainder. Decisions seem to have been made too early. Rather than increasing just those two and reducing the others to compensate, it would have been better to increase expenditure on the two winners while maintaining research work on the others as well.

Short-sighted gains and immediate advances have been the main determinants in the Government's judgment. When we examine the matter in the long term, I am not sure that the decisions that the Government have taken will prove to have been wise.

My hon. Friends and I are keen to support all the efforts that are being made, and I echo the remarks of the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark). He will agree that, while we do not want to see windmills on the top of every hill, there are places where useful windmills can be established.

Dr. Michael Clark: The hon. Gentleman will agree that windmills could be established, for example, offshore, where they would not cause any environmental upset, yet we would achieve the same generation near to urban areas.

Dr. David Clark: I am not sure that the fishermen of my constituency would agree with the hon. Gentleman. Rarely does one get something for nothing. A cost must be paid, even for renewables. However, in the Orkneys, at Ilfracombe and in Carmarthen bay windmills are functioning effectively.

Why does there seem to be a mood, in particular in the CEGB, to favour overseas designs and installations? I understand, for example, that the 200 kW machine owned by the CEGB at Carmarthen bay, which has been in service for two years, has run into problems, including trouble with the control system and cracks in the blade sparts. I understood that the machine was a proven United States design and was chosen in preference to a United Kingdom machine with a good record.

Parliament would be interested to know the thesis behind the decision to purchase that equipment, in view of the troubles that have occurred with it. As I say, there is a suspicion, I hope not born simply of jingoism, that there is a tendency to think that anything built overseas must be better than anything built in this country.

When I visit other countries I find, for example, that in pollution technology much of the equipment has been produced in this country. Almost all machinery concerned with coal — one need only think of coal pulverisation and the like — is manufactured in Britain. We have a tendency to undersell British industry.

Nowhere could that be more true than in relation to wave power. I do not apologise for returning to that issue because every hon. Member who has taken part in the debate has talked of wave power and agreed that the Government's decision has been wrong. The Minister shakes his head, but I had the feeling that it was the clear wish of those who participated in the debate that the Minister should reconsider the issue. I hope that he will give us an assurance that he will monitor closely that which takes place in Norway. If there is an inkling of evidence that his figures are wrong, I hope that he will do what he can to resuscitate the programme. I speak as someone from South Shields when I say that just across the sea in Norway, at Toftestallen, there is an oscillating wave column machine that is due to go into production on 13 November which will put electricity into the Norwegian grid. It is ironic that that should be done at the very time when we have, in effect, scrapped our wave power research programme.

Another worrying feature is that the machine in Norway, which will go on stream within the next few weeks, was devised and invented in the United Kingdom. It was developed by Professor Wells at Queen's university, Belfast. What has happened with the wave generating machine in Norway has happened all too often with British industry. The result is that hundreds of thousands of jobs have been lost by the failure of Governments and industry to capitalise on their research and development capability.

There is a dispute about figures and the Minister says that wave power is being phased out because the experts have estimated that the cost per kW hour will be between 9p and 15p. We shall be able to see in 12 months or two years whether the Norwegians' claims are right. The installation at Toftestallen has taken 10 years to develop and the decision has not been taken lightly. the Norwegians are skilled business men and very good assessors and they have been prepared to face high construction costs. They claim that they can produce electricity from the installation at 3·4p per kW hour.

The Norwegian Government have supported the project even though the average cost of electricity from the vast hydro network in Norway is only 2·7p per kW hour. It is no use the Minister saying that it is easier for the Norwegians to implement the development because of the topography of their country. When I first made inquiries of the experts, I was told that the reason for the different estimates of cost per kW hour was that of tidal differences. I am assured by energy experts that that is not so. Dr. Peter White, of Manchester polytechnic, is on record as saying:

"For the Wells generator"— that is the one that will operate in Norway—

"all you need is a cliff, deep water and a smooth bottom, and that is not uncommon."

I suggest that that sort of territory is not confined to the eastern side of the North sea. We have that sort of topography on the western side, especially in Scotland. I think that we have missed a great opportunity. I hope that the Minister will give us an assurance that he will monitor the Norwegian development and that if there are any signs of error on our part we shall put the process into reverse immediately and start pumping up the wave power programme.

Mr. Bruce: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman or the Minister will be able to clarify the complaints of those who are involved in the wave power programme. They claim that the method of calculation has been to average the worst and the best, and has therefore produced a much higher estimate of cost than is realistic and much higher figures than the industry thinks are obtainable. That is one of the main reasons why we should reconsider the matter.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Member for Gordon has made a pertinent point. I have here the papers that he has already seen, and the Official Report from which the figures were derived. It would be helpful if the Minister would refer to that. I see that he is nodding his head. Hon. Members would like to see a detailed statement. We feel that, leaving the Norwegian example aside, it just does not make sense for us, as an island nation, to write off wave power. Even if the Norwegian example had not been in existence, we should be pursuing that route for renewable energy.

Something else has been presented to us as new—the burning of waste. I applaud everything that the Government are doing in this respect, and their conversion to the case. I make this not as a point against the Government, but as a complaint against the nation. We are not the leaders; we are back with the laggards. It would be wrong to present ourselves as the leaders in waste burning. Many of the continental coutries have done this for a long time, as the Minister knows, and he and I have visited plants in Denmark and Sweden and seen the magnificent work there. They have taken it a stage further by integrating a combined heat and power system and a local district heating system. The latter was referred to by hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker), who spoke about the particular problems of Belfast.

Hon. Members have recited examples from their constituencies of individual firms using different ways to heat their premises. That should be encouraged and we have to pursue the work that has been going on at Doncaster, where the local council has been involved with the Department of the Environment in a scheme. In Newcastle, a similar scheme, involving the use of propellants, has been set up.

This brings us to the divergence between the two sides of the House as to the true cost of any scheme. I hope that we have converted the Government from their narrow ideas on alternative energy sources. However, not only money, but other factors are involved. One thinks of the environmental impact. Perhaps the Minister can give us an assurance that when he is making a decision on what should go ahead he always makes the invironmental impact assessment. I hope that that will particularly be the case with the two studies of the Severn barrage scheme, which may be finished by the end of the year, because that is very important.

Other costs are involved, such as those of transport, nuisance and sea pollution. The amount of material dumped at sea, particularly in the North sea, is outrageous. As the Minister knows, we do not have the best reputation in Europe for the way in which we treat the North sea. I know that the argument is that our situation is different because we have fast rivers and currents. Nevertheless, we pollute the North sea more than any other nation, although people may point fingers at the Germans. We not only use our rivers—we take stuff out to sea to dump it. The cost of that may eventually have to be borne by the fishermen from constituencies such as mine, who have told me that their catches have fallen by tenfold in the past 20 years. I cannot say whether their figure is right, but there is an obvious shortfall in the catches.

The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), the hon. Member for Rochford and other hon. Members spoke about straw burning, which is a perennial and major problem. It causes a great deal of nuisance. The problem has not been lessened by the Government's decision to halve the amount available to the Soil Survey as from April this year. That is a retrograde step. We believe that the Soil Survey's expertise should be used to investigate the soils into which it would be beneficial to plough back straw and those into which it would not and those areas where we must find alternative uses for straw. The work of the energy technology support unit and other groups suggests that farmers are using straw to heat their houses, byres and buildings. The technology jump needed to utilise the fuels is not great. There have been huge developments during the past 10 years in the technology applied to wood burning. The oil price hike of the mid-1970s made that necessary. I believe that before long we shall burn up to 1 million tonnes of straw to heat not only farms but rural industry. The chalk drying plant operated by Needhams Chalk Ltd. in Suffolk has a demonstration project. We hope that it will be successful and will point the way forward.

The fifth aspect—conservation and insulation—has been mentioned. We were pleased to read about the Government's recent announcement on "Monergy 86". All our worst fears are borne out when we see the way in which the Government are adapting "energy" and "money", but I shall say no more on that point. We wish the Government well. I hope that there will be a great advance in conservation measures in 1986. But is the Under-Secretary of State happy with the co-ordination between Government Departments?

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Department of the Environment has announced major cuts next year in the home insulation programme?

Mr. David Hunt indicated dissent.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but the figures show that each local authority has received an allocation for 1985-86 from the Department of the Environment which, on average, is 30 per cent. below the 1984-85 allocation. In some cases the figues are much worse. When we talk about lack of home insulation, we talk about people living in great discomfort and in bad winters risking hypothermia.

Mr. Hunt: It may be helpful if I explain why I shook my head. There have not been savage cuts in the home insulation grant. The history of the grant is one of underspend. The balance of the money has been retained to be allocated to those authorities that meet the revised targets and overspend. This year I hope that we shall exhaust the amount of money allocated, which is exactly the same as last year's amount.

Dr. Clark: I take the hon. Gentleman's point but, discounting the holdback, the total amount allocated this year to the English homes insulation programme is still 15 per cent. below the value of the previous year. I concede that consumers can claim extra, but the councils will not be able to make up the loss. There have been cuts in the home insulation scheme: Lambeth 87 per cent., Stockton-on-Tees 82 per cent., Norwich 69 per cent., Plymouth 65 per cent., Taff-Ely 84 per cent., Cynon Valley 77 per cent., and Monmouth 64 per cent. Even taking into account the Minister's point that local authorities can return when they have spent up to their level, I doubt whether Lambeth will ever make up 13 per cent. to reach 100 per cent. I emphasise the fact that the overall reduction is 15 per cent. on current values. There has been a change in the formula, but the overall amount of money is still reduced by 15 per cent. Other hon. Members have referred to that point. It is an example of a lack of co-ordination between Government Departments.

I feel that the point made by several hon. Members about the machinery of government is pertinent. One of the problems of renewables is that the subject is ranked way down within the management structure of the Department of Energy. It is headed by the chief scientist, whereas each of the other major sources has an under-secretary as its head. It is the odd man out in the management structure. The fact that it is so low has meant that it has not always had the co-ordination with other Departments that it should have had. We are unhappy about that. A point that other hon. Members have made is worth repeating. There should be a closer link with the Overseas Development Administration and the Department of Trade and Industry. One might wonder whether the export aspect of renewables should be with the Department of Trade and Industry or the Department of Energy. There is a certain logic in saying that, if solar development is within the Department of Energy, solar development for export should also be within that Department. There needs to be a study of the whole machinery of government.

We should be putting more money into renewables and formulating an energy conservation policy. The hon. Member for Gordon put the point fairly and strongly. To be successful, there must be capital investment. We must put the money up front, as he said. He is right. An energy conservation agency is needed to co-ordinate activities along the lines suggested in the fifth report of the Select Committee on Energy.

This has been a good debate. I have made my criticisms. I probed the Minister. I have suggested what we would do differently. My main anxiety, if I have one, is about philosophy. I was worried by the Minister's repeated emphasis on cost effectiveness throughout his speech. I realise that we have a Government who worship monetarism, but I suggest that this is one subject to which it is inappropriate to apply the simple cash nexus.

I had to smile because I could not help thinking at times that the Minister was running his Department's policies, not on Civil Service lines but almost like a bookie's office. All the phrases were there. "We are going for the long shot; we are backing winners." I expected to hear about the racing certainties. I wondered which ideas would be the accumulators and which would be the each way bets. That was slightly worrying.

I shall end with a slightly different analogy which the Minister has used previously. He said, correctly, that renewables are our insurance policies because we shall depend on our present energy forms for many years, no matter what policy decisions are taken. However, the point is whether the amount that we are spending — £14 million—is sufficiently high a premium to guarantee the insurance. That is the question that the House must answer.

2.10 pm

Mr. David Hunt: This has been a marvellous debate, and I welcome the contributions that have been made. It has been extremely valuable to range as widely and comprehensively as we have over the whole area. I appreciate the kind remarks made by hon. Members on both sides of the House. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been rightly praised for his initiatives in many areas. In particular, I welcomed the diversity of views on what the priorities should be. It was not quite as simple as the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) sought to summarise it. I regard that diversity as extremely important. In opening the debate, I stressed the importance of technical transfer and education in encouraging the commercial take-up of the renewables shown to be economic. The debate has also been a key element in drawing public attention to renewables.

I am grateful for the technical support that I have had. Scientists always tend to disagree. Today some scientists have been backed against others. We, as Members of the House of Commons, must rise above the merely technical arguments and try to fit the priorities into the overall policy structure.

There have been 12 speakers. It was appropriate that we should start with the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) who, for five years, was Under-Secretary of State for Energy. Therefore, he draws on a wealth of experience. Part of that experience is knowing how to put questions to junior Ministers summing up debates. I counted 47 questions. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, as will other Members, if I do not go through every question in detail, and that they will give me an opportunity to respond in written form to the questions that I do not have time to cover.

A leading figure in this area is my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller), the chairman of the all-party group Parligaes, who has been pressing for such a debate for a long time. He has great knowledge, experience and enthusiasm. However, he does not have great knowledge, experience and enthusiasm for surfing off the north Devon coast, to which he referred as an example of wave power. Four weeks ago I went to Australia. I said to the Australians, "Here is all this wave power around the coast. Are you still pursuing your wave power investigations?" They said, "No. We have examined it carefully but it is nowhere near economic."

I mention that because in some ways individuals behind the debate, some brilliant and outstanding in their field, have their own hobby horses to run.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) made a clear, concise and businesslike speech. He emphasised wind and tidal, not wave, energy. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) made a thoughtful contribution, but he reflected a little of the inconsistency about the spend, as did the hon. Member for Midlothian. There is always a limited amount of money. There never can be unlimited funding for the renewables programme. Therefore, it is necessary to get the priorities right. Let us have a good debate on what those priorities should be, but let us not think that it is all black and white, simple, easy and naturally obvious to anyone who cares to consider it, because it is not.

I rely heavily on the support that I receive from my advisory committee ACORD. In a robust speech, such as we always expect from him, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) said that there is nobody in that committee who understands anything about renewables. It was never intended that ACORD should represent sectional interests. The council is broadly based and comprises people of high repute and integrity. They are all independent and are drawn from the academic world, private industry and enthusiasts. The principal qualification for membership is broad experience relevant to research and development. The programme that the Government have announced is broadly in line with ACORD's unanimous recommendations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) mentioned liquefaction and gasification. I should like to return to that matter. He also mentioned combined heat and power. Such programmes are important, but I had not regarded them as relevant to today's debate. They merit a debate of their own. They represent tremendous potential, which is why my right hon. Friend has allocated £250,000 each to Leicester, Belfast and Edinburgh, to conduct studies into CHP. We await those studies with interest. I was present at the signing of the contracts and have met the leaders of the consortiums. I have asked them to keep me closely in touch with developments. Many right hon. and hon. Members will be watching them closely.

I hope that the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) will accept my passing his comments on to my opposite number in the Northern Ireland Office. I shall ensure that his questions are responded to.

The nuclear arguments have been advanced strongly today. The hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller), who is known for his knowledge of the subject, gave us the benefit of his experience and mentioned other matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) made a good speech, in which he said that he went to the Orkneys and found no wind there, but discovered it was all down here on his return. Somebody once said that the trouble with the United Kingdom is that everybody talks about the weather but nobody ever tries to do anything about it. We can never do anything about the problems that my hon. Friend mentioned, but they demonstrate the problems faced by science and technology in these matters. We can never rely on the presence of the resource at the appropriate time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) took us on a tour from everywhere between Hawaii and Japan. He demonstrated his wider vision and gave us some interesting ideas, which I would like to think about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) also made a good speech. He has some clear views, and he said that I should not talk about backing winners. Any politician is criticised for his use of language. In a fair and well balanced speech, the hon. Member for South Shields also took me to task. The Government's programme of support for research and development fully recognises that there will be losers as well as winners. That is a fact of life. There is a huge increase in costs as we proceed from laboratory research to development, to demonstration and finally to exploitation. When I talked of backing winners, I intended to stress our policy of keeping the programme on each technology in the renewables under careful and detailed review so that we do not proceed from one stage to the next, often much more expensive, stage, unless we are satisfied that the technology has some prospect of economic success. If we did not do that, we would prejudice other technologies and ideas.

The policy does not fail to recognise the need to investigate fully all the technologies that offer a prospect of economic energy production. I hope that the House agrees that it is a policy that selects possible winners and proceeds with their development in close conjunction with industry and progressively secures the technology transfer essential for successful exploitation. Taking full account of the United Kingdom's energy resources, I am convinced that that is the sensible way to proceed, and not through crash programmes without regard to costs.

I should mention the hidden hon. Members of the debate who could not be present. My hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North dealt with the points that my hon. Friends the Members for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) and for Erewash (Mr. Ross) would have raised. Later I shall deal with the points brought to my notice by hon. Members who were sad to be unable to attend today. Some hon. Members were in the Chamber at 3.30 am this morning, and it is difficult to attend when one also has a full constituency programme. It is not fair to judge the interest in this policy sector by the bare numbers who turn up on any one day. For the record, many hon. Members are present, which shows the interest that the matter arouses among hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I started by detailing energy policy, and I do not wish to go over that ground again. However, the hon. Member for Midlothian said that oil and gas would soon run out. I challenge him, because there is no question of that happening in the near future. At present oil and gas exploration in the North sea is at record levels. We expect a significant production of oil to continue well into the next century. Regarding gas, the hon. Gentleman may recall that earlier this year our estimates of the proven and probable reserves were raised by 15 per cent. The Government are confident that we have sufficient gas supplies to meet the country's needs well into the 1990s.

Mr. Spearing: That is only 10 years from now..

Mr. Hunt: We have gas reserves to last into the 1990s, and beyond. I want to answer carefully the question raised by the hon. Member for Midlothian.

We also had the usual arguments about money. One can do anything with figures. I could prove that the Labour

[Mr. Hunt]

Government spent nothing on renewables and that we have spent 90 per cent. of all the money ever spent. Nevertheless, everyone will recognise that we have expanded the sector and the spending considerably. It is difficult to judge year after year. For example, in 1983-84 we spent only £11·3 million, while in 1984-85 we spent £14 million. I did not mention that statistic, because each year must be taken separately, bearing in mind that some programmes have major bills at some stage in the programme. I hope that the House understands that the Government have a good record on renewable energy technology. That is not to be judged only by the £14 million, because it does not take into account the European Community spend, coal gasification and liquefaction or a range of other energy research and development schemes.

This year we spent £1 billion on energy research and development. My chief scientist calculated that figure. We spent £350 million on oil and gas exploration in the North sea and elsewhere, £175 million on energy-intensive equipment manufacturers, £197 million on nuclear power fusion, £123 million on electricity, £78 million on gas, £43 million on coal—that is a wise investment for the future — and about £40 million on renewables technology. That represents a massive spend on research and development in the energy sector.

We are dealing with the renewable technologies. In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford, I should say that the renewable technologies, with the exception of conventional hydropower, are unlikely to make a significant contribution to United Kingdom electricity supply this century, but they should make a contribution in the 21st century, which will grow as they become increasingly competitive. A comprehensive assessment of the prospects for the exploitation of renewable energy technologies in the United Kingdom is given in ETSU report 30, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. I commend it to hon. Members, because it contains very interesting information.

Wave energy was referred to by about two thirds of the speakers. This theme was stressed by certain hon. Members to the exclusion of others. Some hon. Members consider that it must be placed on an equal footing with other sources of energy. There has been a massive programme of wave energy research, costing £17 million. I have been beaten with the Norwegian stick, but we must put this matter into perspective. The contribution of the Norwegian Government is still very small — about £600,000 a year—compared with the United Kingdom's expenditure of £4 million.

We are closely monitoring the device that is being developed by the Norwegians and the Japanese for small scale use in particularly favourable cliff face locations. I have been asked by ETSU to prepare a report upon it. We shall be interested to know whether the costs of the project, as installed, are as low as have been estimated. However, even if it is successful, the Norwegian project would apply only to small and isolated communities that require limited amounts of power. That is the function of our project elsewhere.

During the course of the programme we have investigated a number of similar devices, and a certain amount of work is still being done. My Department is contributing to a study by Queen's university, Belfast, into a wave energy system which could be installed in a rock gully on an island site. Energy would be extracted from an oscillating water column by taking advantage of natural rock formations in coastal locations. Energy would be extracted by a Wells air turbine, which was invented and developed at Queen's university. Similar work is being undertaken in Norway and Japan.

We must carefully monitor all that is taking place in this crucial area. That is why international collaboration is so important. However, we must highlight those priorities upon which there should be maximum expenditure. That is why I have spent a great deal of time explaining why we are spending so much upon wind energy, which is much more promising. That is the unanimous view of my advisers.

I point out to the hon. Member for Midlothian that the cost of developing coal gasification and liquefaction is not contained in the £14 million. Substantial and wise investment by British Gas and the National Coal Board is taking place in that area. It is in addition to the figures to which I have referred.

Tidal energy has also been mentioned. In the United Kingdom this is potentially a large, self-renewing source of energy. I shall bear in mind my hon. Friends' points. I await with great interest the tidal power report from the power group. Its report is expected before the end of this year. We shall then be able to consider this matter in greater detail.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North referred to the energy equipment test centre at Cardiff. I recognise its importance. The former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) have already conducted a very strong lobby on behalf of Professor Brinkworth, the director of the centre. It does excellent work in active solar energy. I understand that proposals to continue to provide financial assistance to the centre are being considered sympathetically by the Department of Trade and Industry.

The warmer campaign was mentioned. Government policy is to encourage the use of waste as a fuel where this is environmentally acceptable and where there is no further economic use for the waste. The Government welcome the warmer campaign and are happy that Ministers have participated in the events that it has staged.

We have had some wonderful examples of what could be done with photovoltaic power, but no one has seriously argued that that is a renewable source for the future, bearing in mind our climatic conditions. However, there are good arguments for developing such systems for export, and over the past five years the DTI has made offers of assistance amounting to over £2 million for such projects, and the Department is currently supporting two projects on solar cells, which, if successful, should lead to the United Kingdom manufacture.

We have had a good debate, and I hope that Hansard will try to reflect——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

St. Vincent's Primary School, Redbridge

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There are 21 Bills on the Order Paper that were moved originally under the ten-minute Bill procedure. All are important, though some are more important than others and I am particularly concerned about the Pensioners' Heating and Communications Bill.

Why does a Bill of great importance and enormous concern to millions of pensioners appear to have been manoeuvred out of the way by the Government naming today as a day for Government business rather than a day for dealing with a number of these important Bills? The House must reflect the views of people outside and the enormous worries about this matter, because of the onset of winter, with the hardship that many pensioners will face through having to meet fuel bills.

The Pensioners' Heating and Communications Bill would alleviate the hardship that many pensioner households are facing with dread. We look to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for help and guidance on how, in the dying days of this Session, the issue can be debated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I do not question the importance that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends attach to the Bill, but they know that at the start of each Session the House itself decides how many days — and which dates — should be allocated for debating private Members' legislation. This is not one of those days.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We all understand that there is a shortage of time for private Members' legislation, but I do not understand why Bills appear on the Order Paper if they are not to be read out. Under what Standing Order does that happen? The Bills are apparently able to be moved, if not debated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am following the practice that the House has followed in all the years that I have been an hon. Member. The outstanding orders and notices of motion are put on the Order Paper. We are doing nothing different from what has been done in every Session in the 21 years in which I have been an hon. Member.

I hope that the House will bear in mind that we are now eating into the time allocated for the Adjournment.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand what you are saying to the House. You are really saying that it has always been done like this and it will go on like this for ever. We are trying to suggest that it is time that some changes were made. As you know, Mr. Speaker is in charge of certain matters in the House. We have just come back after a long recess and the whole place has been furnished. Thousands of pounds has been spent on new carpets at £30 per sq yd——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be fair to the hon. Member who has the Adjournment. I understand the concern that has been expressed about the Pensioners' Heating and Communications Bill, but this is not the occasion to make speeches about expenditure in the House.

I hope that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) will bear in mind when he is expressing his concern about the need for change that that is not a matter for me. It is a matter for the House and it will be a bad day when the Speaker tells the House rather than the House telling the Speaker. I urge the hon. Gentleman to walk round and see the wise words of Mr. Speaker Lenthall in the No Lobby. I hope that we can now get on, rather than deprive the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) of his Adjournment debate.

Mr. Skinner: I have not finished. I was trying to explain that the comforts of the people in this place are always looked after. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) was trying to discuss a Bill to look after the comforts of pensioners and get rid of standing charges. It is a scandal that money can be found to look after Members of Parliament and God knows how many other members of the Establishment, but when we try to look after 9·5 million pensioners who find it difficult to live it is a different story altogether. That is my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I entirely understand the hon. Gentleman's concern but this is not the occasion to make the speech that he might have made if we had been discussing that Bill.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thank you for your indulgence. I agree with my hon. Friends that it is an abuse of the procedure for the Government to use the last Friday to discuss Government business when so many important private Member's Bills have not yet been dealt with——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have made it clear that the House itself decides at the beginning of each Session how much time will be allocated to private Members' Bills and the dates on which those Bills will be discussed. We have exhausted that time. The remedy lies with the House. I cannot try to vary a decision by the House. I have answered the point of order.

Mr. Cohen: I accept that, but an important element requires your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When Second Readings appear on the Order Paper normally we have an opportunity to shout, "Object." Usually, the Government Chief Whip does that. At least the Bill is then sorted out. Because of Government business, there is no——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The points of order are being made at the expense of time allocated for the Adjournment debate to the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) who, I have no doubt, wishes to raise a subject important to him. It is for the House to decide, not me or the Government. The House has decided that this is not a day allocated to the discussion of private Members' Bills.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Chris Smith: I do not wish to detain the House. My point of order is related, but slightly different. The House might have decided a long time ago that Government business should take place today, but why is the list of private Members' Bills printed on the Order Paper, giving many of my constituents the impression that they would be discussed? I know that you are concerned for the interests of Back Benchers. Will you discuss with Mr. Speaker the way in which the Order Paper is prepared and the impression that is given to people outside the House?

[Mr. Chris Smith]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that what is happening today is no different from the usual practice. The designated Remaining Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions appear on the Order Paper because that is precisely what they are. I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear in mind the protests that he and other hon. Members would make if we followed his suggestion and omitted them. That is not a matter for me but for the House and perhaps the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Banks: It is different but related, naturally. Since Whips representing the Government business managers are present, will they explain whether we shall have a chance to debate any of the issues before the Session ends on Wednesday? If we are not to be given that opportunity some important prospective legislation will be buried by Wednesday. That seems to be what the Government intend. We are entitled to know whether these important issues can be raised on the Floor of the House before Wednesday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My task is to ensure that Standing Orders are observed and that the conventions are recognised. We are doing nothing different today from what we have done on other occasions. It is wrong, because it is not in the order of business for the day, for hon. Members to seek to discuss private Members' Bills, or a particular private Member's Bill. I hope that we can move on.

Mr. Cohen: On a different point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall try to be as brief as possible. On the Order Paper stands my Bill dealing with racial harassment, which is an important matter. There have been a number of racial attacks in the east end of London—one only last night in Waltham Forest. Many citizens live in a constant state of fear of racial attacks and harassment.

This vital Bill stands on the Order Paper for today, but the House is discarding it. That adds insult to injury for those affected by racial harassment. I urge you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to find a way under the conventions of the House to extend this sitting or to make time available before the House completes its Session next Wednesday, so that the Bill can be properly considered by Parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the power to do neither of those things, as the hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well. Equally, he knows that there are many Bills outstanding on the Order Paper, no doubt all of them dear to the hearts of the hon. Members who proposed them. None of them can be discussed because we have exhausted the time that the House allocated at the beginning of the Session to private Members' motions. We are about to start a new Session, and when we discuss these matters then perhaps the hon. Gentleman will bear in mind the points that he has put to me today. I can do nothing about these matters now, and I hope that we can get on with the Adjournment.

2.40 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I deplore the fact that more than one third of the time allocated for consideration of my constituents' problems has been consumed by Labour Members of Parliament raising matters that could quite properly be raised elsewhere — and, on your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, should have been dealt with in that way.

I shall therefore immediately turn to the problems that have arisen because of the current position at St. Vincent's Roman Catholic primary school, Waldegrave road, Redbridge. The school was built in 1929 and the only alterations since then have been the addition of an assembly hall and a kitchen, which were added in about 1964.

The children's main toilet facilities were built at the same time as the school, and there have been no major alterations or improvements since the parents' association roofed in the area in 1980-81 with clear PVC corrugated sheeting that leaks and gives no protection against the cold.

The toilets are unheated and poorly lit. Washing facilities are not immediately available near the toilet area, and the children must re-enter the school before washing their hands, with the risk of spreading infection on door handles and the possibility of their forgetting to wash their hands.

Mrs. Judith Gleeson, the present extremely able and competent head teacher, took up her appointment at the school in July 1984. She was appalled to discover the state of the toilets, which she considered to be unsuitable. She requested the local education authority to clean and repair them before the school re-opened in September, to avoid the need to advise the chairman, Monseigneur McKenna, and the governors that the school should be closed until the toilets were fit to use.

During the extremely cold spell that lasted several weeks at the beginning of this year—and during similar cold spells in previous years—the toilets were frozen almost every day and the caretaker had to carry many buckets of hot water to defrost them. Each night through the winter months it is necessary to drain the entire system to minimise the risk of freezing. The caretaker has carried out such duties since he came to the school 11 years ago. Almost every year he needs to spend a considerable amount of time during winter months taking care of the toilets so that they are available for the children.

The total cost of the project to provide new toilets and internal remodelling is £70,207 in the current financial year. That requires a grant of £63,000 from the Department of Education and Science under the planned grant earning expenditure as opposed to committed grant earning expenditure.

On 4 March of this year, the Department wrote defining the categories under which the distribution of resources to voluntary aided schools were determinded. One referred to basic need, but it referred only to new or expanded schools. Surely, basic need should include the provision of adequate hygienic toilet facilities for children at school.

The Minister wrote to me on 7 March saying:

"You will appreciate that owing to pressure on resources generally, it has been necessary for the Department to place a strict limit on the number of new building starts which can be accommodated in any given year. It is also, unfortunately, the case that the level of committed expenditure falling to be met in the coming year in respect of projects already in hand has proved to be substantially higher than was originally anticipated. As a result, it has proved possible to programme only those new projects which are required in order to meet basic need of population growth or shift and those required in order to implement proposals approved by the Secretary of State under the Education Act, 1980. In consequence, the work now proposed at St Vincent's school . . . could not be found a place in the 1985-86 programme."

In his letter, the Minister added an assurance

"that the project, if resubmitted by Redbridge LEA, will be very carefully considered in the process of formulating the new programme for 1986-87."

The Health and Safety Executive inspector was then consulted and informed Mr. David Squires, the assistant diocesan education secretary, under health and safety legislation, that there was no legislation referring to toilet provision for children in schools. Surely children deserve such protection. The assistant diocesan education secretary wrote on 10 January 1985 to the Department:

"Our proposal at St. Vincent's School, Becontree Heath, constitutes a minor works scheme and although the Authority has supported the project, the Department of Education and Science has not made an allocation available. At this school we are dealing with a very serious health and safety matter. I think you will agree that we had indicated to the Head Teacher and Governors that because this case was so urgent it was highly likely that the Department of Education and Science would support the scheme. Over the last few days I have spoken to the Head Teacher and she informs me that during this very cold weather the caretaker and teaching staff have had to spend a considerable amount of time pouring boiling water down the lavatories to defrost them. The toilets in question are extremely unhygienic and I think it is likely that they will very soon have to be taken out of use. There are no other lavatories in the school for the age group that uses the external toilets and the closure of the toilet block in question will lead to an extremely serious deficiency in toilet provision in relation to the School Premises Regulations 1981."

This matter was raised first by Mr. Squires on 31 July 1984, when he wrote to Mr. Radcliffe, director of education services for the London borough of Redbridge, saying:

"Following our recent telephone conversations regarding St. Vincent's School, Becontree, we are including in our submission a bid for the replacement of toilets and other improvement works. As you know, these matters are most pressing and we hope that an allocation will be forthcoming in 1985-86."

It seems extraordinary that in 1985, when we are speaking of the need to provide in the majority of schools computers and other important facets of modern technology to prepare youngsters for an effective and constructive role in society, that we should be so neglecting this basic hygienic need. Is not the need for hygiene a basic concept of life?

I recently had the honour to visit Nepal; the Minister is aware that I am chairman of the Anglo-Nepalese all-party parliamentary group. In that country the schools are of an extremely basic nature. People must club together to build their own schools and finance them for five years before they are taken over by the Government. Thank goodness, we in Britain have long passed that state of affairs.

At the same time, hygiene is an important and essential element in the education of the children. The conditions that were just acceptable when my hon. Friend and I went to this type of school many years ago are entirely unacceptable now. As recently as 1945, perhaps as many as a quarter of homes in Britain had no internal toilet facilities. I believe that the figure has now fallen to less than 2·5 per cent., thanks to major schemes to make internal toilet facilities available through the 1950s and 1960s. That is undoubtedly an important improvement in our general standard of living. There is a grave need for toilet facilities to be adequately provided, especially in the training of young people in a formative period in their life.

The cost of the scheme is likely to have risen to about £90,000 in the next financial year, but we should not lose sight of the fact that building works are an important aspect of the employment programme. Building works are labour-intensive and the Government should surely be paying great attention to spending money in a way that will help to alleviate employment problems as well as improving conditions for our children.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): The hon. Gentleman has made a strong case for £90,000 to be spent at a Roman Catholic school in his constituency. Is he aware that the Catholic church itself, in the shape of the diocesan schools commission, wants to spend £1·3 million on a Catholic school in Birmingham so that it can close the Archbishop William's school in my constituency, which does not need any money spent on it at all?

Mr. Thorne: I know that the Catholic church is keen on education and that it pays its appointed share. I know also that it has every intention of doing so in the case which I am raising. It is extremely keen that the facilities that I am talking about shall be provided for the children in my constituency. I hope that my hon. Friend will have some good news for me and my constituents that will ensure that the Dickensian conditions of which I have spoken are banished from the schools of Ilford, South as quickly as possible.

2.53 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) for raising a number of important matters. Unfortunately, due to the consumption of time on points of order earlier, I shall not be able in the time available to me to respond to all the matters that I might have dealt with had I had more time. I regret that I cannot give public undertakings on some of the issues to which my hon. Friend has addressed himself. I undertake to write to him on any matters which I am unable to cover in the short time that remains to me.

I am grateful for the close interest that my hon. Friend has shown in St. Vincent's Roman Catholic primary school. His constituents should know that he has written many letters and lobbied me quite valiantly in its cause. I hope that the people of Ilford, South are fully aware of the tribute that they owe to him for his efforts on their behalf.

The House will know that there are different types of voluntary school and that the most numerous are the voluntary aided. More than 50 per cent. of voluntary schools are of the aided type, whereby certain capital building and external repair work remain the responsibility of the school governors, who are generally entitled to seek an 85 per cent. grant from the Department. The House will know that, in the context of my hon. Friend's earlier remarks, St. Vincent's comes within that category.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South spoke strongly in support of the case for a building project to replace toilet facilities at St. Vincent's Roman Catholic primary school. I can assure my hon. Friend that I fully sympathise with the difficulties created by the present outdoor facilities which the infant children have to use, and I should like to see the facilities replaced. Much as I would like to help St. Vincent's, however, it has not yet been possible to allocate the resources to cover this project.

The House should know that the level of existing commitments on aided school projects estimated for 1985-86 was higher than earlier information had shown. There are a number of reasons for this. For example, in some cases costs have risen beyond the approved level, initial estimates may have turned out to be too low and work may have gone ahead faster than expected. Although the provision made in 1985-86 for all work at aided schools was over £50 million — nearly 12 per cent. higher than last year's expenditure — governors' plans for projects at aided schools totalled more than £90 million. Inevitably that meant that a large number of schools had to be disappointed. Priority clearly had to be given to those projects that fell into the categories referred to by my hon. Friend. I have to repeat a point made many times — that the resources available for capital expenditure in the voluntary aided sector have to be limited to what the country can afford.

If, later this year, resources become available through the delay or cancellation of a project, either in Redbridge or elsewhere, we shall look at the claims of St. Vincent's again, but I can hold out no promises. Any resources that become available will have to go to projects where the need is greatest, and, while I sympathise with the case made on St. Vincent's behalf by my hon. Friend, many schools have a common problem and we can help them only if other priorities are not more pressing.

As to prospects for 1986-87, my hon. Friend knows that I cannot make any promise that resources will be available for St. Vincent's. All bids, including that submitted by Redbridge for the work to replace toilet facilities at the school, are being very carefully considered, and we expect to be able to inform local education authorities of their allocations for 1986-87 close to the end of this year. My hon. Friend will understand that I cannot go any further at this stage.

I apologise to my hon. Friend for the fact that my speech is, of necessity, brief. I am grateful to him for securing the debate and I shall undertake to do what I can to assist.

Mr. Neil Thorne: Will my hon. Friend be kind enough to make one promise? I do not know whether he looks at all these cases personally, but will he do so in this instance before any decision about 1986-87 is made?

Mr. Dunn: Inasmuch as my powers may go as far as that, I shall do what I can to assist my hon. Friend. On behalf of the House, I thank him for securing the interests of his constituents so well this afternoon.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Productivity

1. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the relative changes in productivity in the energy industries since 1980.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): Labour productivity generally in the public sector energy industries has improved since 1980. I hope this progress will continue.

Mr. Favell: I am glad to hear that productivity has increased, but is my right hon. Friend happy that, in July this year, his Department could not say by how much productivity in the gas, coal and electricity industries had increased since the end of 1980, nor could it compare their productivity with the economy as a whole? Are not those figures vital to all British industry?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is important to ensure that any figures provided are meaningful. It is difficult to provide such figures for different industries with different capital intensities and different balances between output and labour and capital use. However, I understand my hon. Friend's concern, and would be happy to discuss the matter further with him.

Dr. Godman: May I ask the Minister a question about the important offshore oil and gas industries? In recent times, what changes in productivity have there been in the offshore construction yards, and is it likely that those yards will receive contracts for offshore structures within the next eight to nine months?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I do not have the exact figures for which the hon. Gentleman asks, but I am delighted to say that our oil fabrication yards have had a good record in recent months and have won a major share of orders from oil industry in the face of fierce international competition. In that respect, their productivity is high.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: Has my right hon. Friend discussed North sea oil production with representatives of OPEC? Does he agree that, although there are obvious attractions in a falling oil price, excessive production at a time of falling prices worldwide could lead to a disorderly market?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Any large cut in production would cause a reduction in productivity. Our main concern, as I have said many times in the House, has always been to ensure stability in the oil market. In an area such as the North sea, where risks are great and capital investment is high, it is important to have as stable a market as possible so that such investment continues.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the British Gas Corporation makes no comparisons between the productivity of its men in small-scale distribution work and that of private contractors in reaching a decision to take work from the private sector and do it in-house? Does he agree that that is disgraceful?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Attention has been drawn to that matter from time to time. If there is any sign of unfairness in that area, I hope that my hon. Friend will urge those who think that is the case to draw it to the attention of the Office of Fair Trading.

Coal Supplies

2. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the level of coal supplies held at power stations.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): The latest published figures are for the end of July. They show stocks held at power stations in Great Britain at 18·6 million tonnes.

Mr. Colvin: Although my right hon. Friend does not run our coal industry, will he follow the example set by his predecessor and encourage the National Coal Board and the Central Electricity Generating Board to build up stocks of coal at both pitheads and power stations so that the resolve of people, particularly miners, who want to continue to work, if there is an industrial dispute, is not undermined by the threat of power shortages?

Mr. Walker: Electricity boards recognise the importance of having good stocks at power stations. The figure is for the end of July, and as August, September and October are the months in which stocks build up fastest, I expect that the next published figure will show quite a big improvemet.

Mr. Baldry: Is there anything about the level of coal stocks which shows the need for an increase in electricity prices beyond the rate of inflation?

Mr. Walker: Not that I know of.

National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd.

3. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd. in providing alternative jobs in mining areas affected by pit closures.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): My right hon. Friend announced at the end of July that the funds available to NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. the job creation subsidiary of the National Coal Board, had been doubled to £20 million. In its first year of operation the company has created more than 2,500 job opportunities throughout the coalfields. One hundred and eighty-six projects have been given direct financial assistance, and many more projects are being examined. The company is working closely with new and existing enterprise agencies.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Minister aware that at the Houghton careers office 328 people are registered unemployed, 210 youngsters are on short-term schemes, and there are two job vacancies, yet Eppleton pit is being merged with Murton mines, losing 700 jobs, Lampton coke works was informed at the weekend that it is to close, losing a further 226 jobs, and Ellington pit, according to the latest NCB report, is under a three-monthly review? Why is my area being sacrificed on the altar of monetarism? The £20 million is not enough for my constituency, never mind the rest of the coalfields.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman should put the other side of the picture in the north-east. I have had the opportunity of going underground at the coalface in Ellington and Wearmouth during the last few weeks. The spirit there is welcome, productivity records have been broken, and the coal industry in the north-east has terrific opportunities ahead. Both the chairman, Mr. Spanton, and the chief executive, Mr. Hewitt, of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. take a deep personal interest in the problems of mining communities in the north-east. Already 248 job opportunities have been created there.

Mr. Portillo: Further to my hon. Friend's first answer, does he agree that more publicity needs to be given to those achievements to dispel the impression that nothing is being done for communities where pits are closing?

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me a further opportunity of stressing the achievements of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. to which the Government attach significant support. Jobs created through projects that are financially supported by NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. have risen this month to a rate of 500 a month.

Mr. Mason: Is the Minister aware that since the strike ended the NCB has announced a further 3,000 job losses in Barnsley district because of further pit closures and mergers? Is he aware that that will increase unemployment in my district to 22 per cent.? What will NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. do to assist Barnsley and district in its plight? What additional assistance can his Department give to assist the Coal Field Communities' Campaign to help the distressed mining areas?

Mr. Hunt: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman is reassured by the level of commitment that the Government are giving to NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. and that NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. is showing to communities, which, everyone accepts, are facing extremely serious problems.

Mr. Batiste: Can my hon. Friend confirm that there will be no refusal by NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. of good and worthwhile projects which are put to it on the ground of limitation of funds, and that any good job creation scheme in an area of pit closures will be considered favourably?

Mr. Hunt: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that reassurance. If hon. Members on either side of the House have any projects in mind, they should discuss them urgently with NCB (Enterprise) Ltd.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Minister has assured the House repeatedly that there will be alternative jobs in other pits for men whose pits are closing. Does he agree that that is not strictly true? In effect, he is de-skilling certain jobs, which means that men are not being offered comparable jobs in the industry. There is a target of 350 jobs under the scheme for the whole of Wales, and in my constituency 28 per cent. of the male work force is unemployed. The position has been made worse by a recent pit closure. Will the Minister concede that the scheme is unrealistic?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Lady should recognise that the National Coal Board has, contrary to the expectations of many, been able to keep faith with its pledge of no compulsory redundancies. It is to be applauded for that. Like the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), the hon. Lady has failed to put the other side of the picture. A few weeks ago, I had the opportunity to go underground at Lady Windsor, Abercynon, which is in the hon. Lady's constituency. I found the spirit of the work force to be excellent. The men are reducing the cost of producing coal and they have a great future provided that coal can regain its place competitively in the market.

Mrs. Currie: Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituency was badly affected by numerous pit closures some years ago when there was no enterprise company and no thumping redundancy payments? We simply had to get on with it. As a result, our unemployment rate has consistently been half that of the national average. Does my hon. Friend agree that the best advertisement for any area is a skilled and willing population that wishes to work, not strike?

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making those important points. Let us not forget that over 11 years previous Labour Government's closed 330 pits, with compulsory redundancy and no enterprise company.

Mr. Lofthouse: Does the Minister recognise that the £20 million which is available under the scheme only scratches the surface, especially in areas such as the one that I represent where 42 per cent. of all youths aged under 24 years are unemployed? Is the Minister aware that of the coal mines that are operating not one has on its books a boy under the age of 18? No boy has been signed on from school since 1983. There is no evidence in my area that the enterprise scheme is doing any good or attracting any companies into it.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman must realise that NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. started with a capital of £5 million, which the Government doubled to £10 million and then doubled again to £20 million. More money will be made available as and when necessary. I urge Labour Members to contact NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. and to discuss with it vital projects in their areas.

Mr. Rowlands: We are saying that the money is necessary now. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of 2,000 jobs having been created, but 2,000 jobs have been lost in the mining industry in the Welsh coalfield since March. The efforts that have been made do not compare with the demands and the needs of our community. Will the Minister tell us that he will accelerate his programme to match the acceleration in pit closures?

Mr. Hunt: The Government have made it clear to NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. that more money will be made available as and when necessary. I urge Labour Members to discuss with NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. the strategic problems in the areas that they represent instead of criticing it.

Mr. Mason: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise this matter in an Adjournment debate.

Coal Industry

4. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to announce a new "Plan for Coal".

Mr. Peter Walker: Discussions are taking place to agree the strategy for coal. We are endeavouring to agree a strategy that will provide coal at economic cost to the consumer and a good future for the industry.

Mr. Hannam: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the original 1974 "Plan for Coal" failed on several important counts—productivity, demand estimates and estimates of pit closures? Does not the National Coal Board's new strategy represent a much more realistic set of targets based on achieving a profitable and expanding industry founded on competitively priced coal?

Mr. Walker: Yes. I think that one of the great ptities of the original strategy was the total lack of performance in terms of productivity targets. I hope that productivity will improve substantially. Productivity improvements will give the best prospects for the coal industry.

Mr. Ryman: What progress, if any, has been made in the negotiations between the right hon. Gentleman's Department, the NCB and the NUM about establishing a new, independent appeals procedure to hear appeals on colliery reviews concerning proposed pit closures? I understand from what the right hon. Gentleman said to me on 19 June and 4 October that the bodies are nearing agreement. What is the present position?

Mr. Walker: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows from my discussions with him that I share his anxiety that a modified procedure should be established quickly. On the latest information available to me, I can see no reason why that modified procedure should not be agreed this week.

Mr. Barron: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that if his new strategy is based purely on the assumption of the markets likely to be gained, it will inevitably fail because the lead time between investing in the industry and getting coal out of the ground can be anywhere between five and 10 years? What we need is a strategy based not on so-called markets but on coal for the future. Energy policy can be based on that. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that we should be talking about tonnages in the year 2,000 and nothing else?

Mr. Walker: In the last strategy we had 10 years of investment, but, alas, not 10 years of improving productivity.

Mr. Michael Morris: Are not the key determinants in any future strategy, first, that there should be flexibility and, secondly that there should be nothing written in tablets of stone which would prevent the NCB from doing what is in the interests of that great industry?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Eadie: I have here a copy of the new coal strategy. It is a very poor description, and certainly not a policy. It is a strategy for contraction of the coal industry. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, if one examines the document further, one sees that the board doubts whether total coal production will be 90 million tonnes? Coal production could be below that level and, if it is, there will be more massive pit closures.

Mr. Walker: No one knows better than the hon. Gentleman that the only way for the coal industry to expand is to improve productivity. It would be nice to hear some original proposals from the NUM on how productivity can be increased.

5. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy what further information he has received from the National Coal Board regarding further pit closures.

9. Willie W. Hamilton: asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement in the reduction of manpower in the coal industry since the end of the miners' strike; and how many further redundancies are planned for the next 12 months.

Mr. Peter Walker: Individual pit closures and the future manpower requirements of the industry are matters for the NCB. I understand that, since the end of the strike, 16 pits have closed. The net reduction in numbers of men on colliery books from 9 March to 28 September was some 17,100. The level of future redundancies will depend upon the board's operational requirements and the numbers of men volunteering to go on the terms available.

Mr. Pike: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that present and proposed pit closures are not in our long-term interests? Should not the Government's mandate to the NCB be to pay more attention to our long-term rather than short-term energy requirements and to stop pit closures in areas where there is workable coal?

Mr. Walker: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. I think that the pit closures that have taken place are sensible. Our long-term requirement is energy at an economic cost for the benefit of our economy.

Mr. Hamilton: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the figures in the Scottish context? With respect to the answer to question No. 3, how many of those 2,500 jobs have been created in Scotland? The right hon. Gentleman should rest assured that for a long time a large number of Labour Members have regarded Mr. Scargill as the greatest disaster to befall the NUM since its inception.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman will understand that I would have difficulty in disagreeing with the final part of his question. I do not have the breakdown of the Scottish figures, but I shall send them to him this evening. I recognise that there are some considerable problems for Scotland.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Successive Secretaries of State for Energy have closed pits, reduced manpower, and told us that productivity is being increased, so that in the end we would not have to put more thousands of millions of pounds into the coal mines. Could my right hon. Friend at least tell us when he thinks, as another Secretary of State, we should stop having to put thousands of millions of pounds down the coal mines and will get a real return for the taxpayer?

Mr. Walker: Investment in new machinery in better pits has been on a considerable scale, but, alas, there has been a lack of improvement in productivity. The current productivity figures for this year have been substantial, and I can only hope that that trend will increase. However, I cannot say what industrial or other action might take place to disrupt that progress.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As the Union of Democratic Mineworkers has clearly demonstrated that it is representative of a large group of people in the mining industry, will the Secretary of State give an undertaking that, if he discusses the future of the coal industry with various bodies, he will include the UDM if it wishes?

Mr. Walker: The coal board has recognised the UDM, so, in its discussions on matters such as the future of the coal strategy, presumably it will be included. I have always agreed to see the leaders of any trade union that is recognised.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is it not the case that many pits were overmanned in the first place and that the output now, after some miners have left voluntarily, is not affected too much? Is it not interesting to note that many miners who have been prepared to take voluntary redundancy have been given a good deal by the National Coal Board, which should be supported?

Mr. Walker: It is certainly true that the problem of closures of uneconomic pits is being treated in a more civilised and generous way than it was ever treated by any Labour Government in our history.

Mr. Ray Powell: The Secretary of State has not got his figures correct for Wales, in regard to what my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) said, when he referred to Scargill and his predictions. In fact, the numbers of redundancies were underestimated by him if one considers the way that they have escalated in Wales. Is the Secretary of State aware that, despite an Adjournment debate and a series of questions, St. John's colliery in my constituency is now due for closure—not under the new review procedure that was promised to me by right hon. Gentleman's side-kick on the Front Bench —and that 800 miners are to be made redundant in an area where male unemployment is now 24 per cent. and will escalate to 50 per cent.? What action will the right hon. Gentleman take to deal with the unemployment problems in my constituency?

Mr. Walker: I can only suggest to the hon. Gentleman that, as many Opposition Members know, the coal board has made several offers under the modified procedure, which nobody could argue was other than in keeping with the proposals that have been made. If the unions disagree with the offer that is on the table, that will be extraordinary. I gather that if they agree, there is no reason why the closures, including that of St. John's, should not go ahead under that modified procedure.

Mr. Dormand: The Secretary of State keeps referring to the modified review procedure. Is he aware that it is a year since the principles were agreed with the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers? Is it not obvious that the NCB has been deliberately delaying its implementation so that it can get on with closing pits? If the new scheme is agreed next week—we hope it is—will there be a review of all the pits that have been or are proposed to be closed, such as Horden in my constituency and Bates in Northumberland? Will they be subject to the review after the scheme is implemented next week?

Mr. Walker: With regard to the suggestions that have been made, some months ago there was agreement on the terms of reference on all the detail. The disagreement was on the composition. There was an offer of independent planning inspectors and independent lawyers, which was rejected, not by the coal board but by the other side. The agreement that is now available is an independent machinery, which is obvious to anybody. I hope that, not next week but this week, the unions will accept that offer. If they do, several closures that have been going through can be put through the modified procedures.

Mr. Eadie: The right hon. Gentleman must remember that my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) has previously raised the question of the new modified colliery procedure and drawn it to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman uses the word "sacrosanct". Is he aware that a new situation has arisen? We find, without exception, that the National Union of Mineworkers, the British Association of Colliery Management and the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers take exception to the National Coal Board deciding unilaterally what kind of independent review proceedure there should be. Will the right hon. Gentleman intervene and tell the NCB that it is time it got back to the negotiating table and to the days when negotiations meant negotiations and not dictation?

Mr. Walker: I totally disagree with that interpretation. There have been a number of occasions on which any fair and reasonable person would agree that a totally independent procedure was on offer. I do not believe that there has been any delay on the part of the NCB.

Fluidised Bed Combustion

6. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to promote the further development and use of fluidised bed combustion, in particular in regard to the development of combined heat and power systems.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department, the CEGB and the NCB are jointly funding a design study of an advanced 600 MW power plant employing pressurised fluidised bed combustion. The concept of linking a fluidised bed boiler to CHP plant is also being demonstrated under my right hon. Friend's Energy Efficiency Office's energy efficiency demonstration scheme.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister make it clear that the Government agree that this sort of development would usefully and wisely demonstrate clean and efficient coal use, would provide very necessary industrial orders, and could, under the CHP system, provide considerable help to urban areas, which are currently in dire need? Even, if the NCB's present chairman is not enthusiastic about selling the coal that his industry produces, will the Minister accept that this venture could be extremely useful?

Mr. Hunt: The technology for industrial boilers and furnaces is now fully commercial, with over 50 plants already built or on order. All variations of the technology, which the hon. Gentleman and I have seen, whether shallow, deep or circulating beds, are offered by British manufacturers with full commercial guarantees. It is very much the technology of the future.

Mr. Speller: Will the Minister stress that, in addition to fluidised bed combustion, there are many other ways of making coal efficient, other than by straightforward burning? Will he include such methods as gasification, which have an equal potential for industrial orders and for the future prosperity of the coal industry?

Mr. Hunt: Yes, I agree. My hon. Friend made his point very well in his excellent speech last Friday.

Mr. Allen McKay: As the coal-fired power stations will be coming towards the end of their life in the next 80 years, is the Minister proposing to order new coal-fired power stations, using the fluidised bed system?

Mr. Hunt: No. The ordering of the particular systems is a matter for the CEGB.

Mr. Chapman: As the fluidised bed combustion system is one of the methods by which sulphur emissions from power stations can be reduced, will my hon. Friend welcome such a development within CEGB power stations? In the light of the recent Select Committee report on acid rain, recommending that the United Kingdom should play its part in reducing trans-boundary pollution, will he set the CEGB targets for reducing sulphur and nitrogen oxide emissions from its power stations as part of a concerted Government policy?

Mr. Hunt: I have already said and made it clear that this is a matter for the CEGB. I confirm, as I said to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), that this is exciting new technology, and considerable advances are already being made in a very positive way.

Energy Prices

8. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairmen of the gas and electricity industries regarding energy prices in the next 12 months.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have frequent meetings with the chairmen. Prices are a matter for the industries.

Mr. Winnick: Are we going to find that the Secretary of State has yet again lost his battle with the Treasury over substantial fuel increases? Is he aware that increasing gas prices cause great hardship to many people, particularly those on low incomes who receive no assistance in paying their fuel bills? When will the Secretary of State recognise that these substantial increases are totally without justification?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman should realise that electricity prices have risen by only 6 per cent. over the past three years, whereas under the Labour Government whom he supported they went up by 6 per cent. every four months. If he fights the next election on gas and electricity prices, for the second time he will be defeated by the electorate.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend agree that efficiency improvements in the gas and electricity industries should be passed on to the customer and to industry to maintain competitiveness with cheap energy countries? Will he, therefore, impress on his Cabinet colleagues that if they wish to increase taxation it should be done openly and not by artificially increasing prices?

Mr. Walker: That is why I am pleased that in real terms not only are gas prices at the same level as in 1970, but that in the last three years both gas and electricity prices have gone down in real terms. I rejoice in that fact.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that he and the Government have shown a bad example over the past few years to any potential private owners of British Gas as to how to exploit a monopoly? Will he acknowledge that with the privatisation of British Gas there is real tension, with the Government trying to maximise the price at the expense of consumer protection? Will he, as Secretary of State for Energy, assure the House that he is on the side of the consumer?

Mr. Walker: Of course. The record of the past three years shows that consumers of gas and electricity have done better than at any time since the war.

Mr. McQuarrie: While I accept what my right hon. Friend said about the right of industries to agree prices, does he agree that any increase projected by either the gas or the electricity industry as a direct result of the miners' strike would be totally unacceptable to consumers?

Mr. Walker: There are many extra costs arising from the strike. The fact that certain price increases have not taken place during the period of that strike and since indicate that the Government share my hon. Friend's view.

Mr. Rowlands: May I jog the Secretary of State's memory? His predecessor introduced a formula of 10 per cent. above the rate of inflation for three years on the run for gas prices, leading to over 100 per cent. increase. I understand that Sir Denis Rooke has said that there will be no need for increases in gas prices above the rate of inflation. Will the Secretary of State assure us that the Government are not proposing, or assuming that there will be, any bigger increases than this in future?

Mr. Walker: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would care to ask, in the form of a written question, for publication of a list of price rises under a Labour Government as compared with this Government. The answer will show that their record vis à vis inflation or anything else is an appalling and disgusting one, of which the Labour party should be ashamed.

Electricity Supply Industry (Restructuring)

10. Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he proposes to restructure the electricity supply industry and the area boards.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): There are no present plans to reform the structure of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Skeet: I am very much obliged for that succinct answer. Will my hon. Friend consider over the long term, as the coal board supplies some 80 per cent. of its coal to the CEGB, the merger of these two industries under the electricity supply industry so that we can remove a certain number of anomalies? Will he also authorise, in the intermediate term, the CEGB to supply big projects with energy direct in order to reduce their costs?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is an expert in these matters and raises some extremely interesting points, which I shall certainly consider.

Mr. Pavitt: Although he is not completely restructuring the system, will the Minister look at the total dissatisfaction among hon. Members arising from complaints from their constituents about the way in which their bills are handled? Is he aware that the consultative committee has become a bit of a farce? If he cannot totally restructure, will he do something, especially for the elderly, about the way in which area boards handle complaints about bills?

Mr. Goodlad: In my experience, the area boards and consultative committees handle complaints extremely effectively, but if the hon. Gentleman has any particular cases in mind I hope that he will draw them to my attention.

Energy Act 1983

11. Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the working of the Energy Act 1983.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is too early to evaluate the full effects of the Act, but it is encouraging that the number of private generators selling electricity to boards in Great Britain rose from 59 in 1983-84 to 70 in 1984-85.

Mr. Rost: Will my right hon. Friend reconsider the fact that there is increasing evidence from private producers who claim that they are still not obtaining a fair price for their electricity and that the CEGB is not applying the spirit of section 19, which obliges the industry to adopt and support CHP and try to market its waste heat? Is he aware that the Sheffield consortium has been rejected by the CEGB even though the rate of return on its CHP scheme is in excess of the 5 per cent. discount rate required by nationalised industries and would be a higher rate of return than many other investments that the electricity industry is undertaking?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Act provides a proper framework for fair trading. The figures that I have just announced show that there is considerable interest in the matter and that there is a reverse of the progressive decline that there was in private generation until the passing of the Act.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Library (Usage)

28. Mr. Dubs asked the Lord Privy Seal what has been the increase over the last 10 years in queries put by hon. Members to the Library.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Over the period 1975-84 the percentage increase in the number of Members' inquiries answered in writing by the research division and by the international affairs section of the House of Commons Library was 77 per cent.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Minister aware that many Members of the House are grateful to the Library staff for the high quality of work and help that they give us, but that that is still no substitute for providing us with decent back-up? The two types of help are complementary. May I press the Leader of the House to think again about the need to provide each Member of the House who requires it with sufficient resources to employ one secretary and one research assistant?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman was shrewd to make the point about our gratitude to the Library staff, because that will unite the whole Chamber. I am not sure that the same is true of his second point. With the growth in the number of research assistants, one might have thought that there would be less demand upon the Library's research facilities, but in fact the reverse is true.

Mr. Hayward: Following the comments of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), when my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House reviews the opportunity for Members to have at least one research assistant, will he also consider limiting the number of research assistants that Members should have?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises two separate issues. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) was hoping that the review of the secretarial research allowance would proceed on the basis that the sum should include an amount equivalent to the financing of one full-time research assistant. The second point was made in the recent debate that we had on this matter. Whatever number of research assistants a Member might have, no more than two employees of a Member can have access to the House.

Mr. Alton: Notwithstanding the excellent help that the Library gives Members, how long will it be before the Leader of the House reviews the number of research assistants that hon. Members can have? Will he give an undertaking that that matter will receive priority over and above investigations into Members' salaries for this financial year?

Mr. Biffen: Members' salaries for this financial year operate under an automatic formula. The subject of hon. Members' research assistants and the degree of access that they have has been remitted to the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), and he will be reporting to the House in due course.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the latest contacts that I have had with the Library have told me about the emergence of an interesting new species—the research assistant's secretary? Is he aware of the conundrum of big fleas, little fleas and lesser fleas? Does he not think that the amount of Ministers' and Library staff time taken up by these research assistants, their secretaries and their secretaries' research assistants, and the amount of paper used, and the photocopying, has got out of control?

Mr. Biffen: I do not want to stray too far into that controversy, because the matter is now before the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford. It is undoubtedly true that the term research assistant is used fairly liberally in our discussions. Many of those people could in no sense undertake serious research.

Proceedings (Sound Coverage)

31. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Seal if there are any plans to extend to Members' offices facilities for live sound coverage of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the Select Committee on Sound Broadcasting is undertaking a study of the feasibility and cost of such facilities with a view to making recommendations to the Services Committee in due course, but the introduction of any such scheme would, of course, require the authority of the House.

Mr. Bruinvels: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Select Committee on Sound Broadcasting has already conducted a survey and that only 398 Members favoured such live sound coverage? In the interests of keeping the House active, will my right hon. Friend disregard that survey in view of the temptation for hon. Members not to turn up in the Chamber at all if everything is broadcast to their offices? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Chamber is empty enough already?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes the very fair point that in this, as in so many other matters, we must have regard to the impact on attendance in the Chamber. I must point out to him, however, that as the matter is now before the Services Committee it would be inappropriate for me to make any observations or draw any conclusions until I have had the benefit of the Services Committee report.

Mr. Faulds: Such a suggestion, Sir, God forfend.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the Services Committee will take note of that.

Mr. Squire: I regret any disagreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), but is my right hon. Friend aware that, although some of our parliamentary colleagues may be less than irresistible in their contributions, many of us who spend a fair part of the day at our desks might appreciate the opportunity to tune in from time to time to see how the proceedings are going?

Mr. Biffen: That is an interesting view of the nature of the parliamentary process, but I must put it firmly on record that whatever we do we must do our utmost to maintain the vitality of this Chamber as the very heart of Parliament.

Opposition Parties (Funding)

32. Mr. Beith asked the Lord Privy Seal when he plans to review the funds granted to Opposition parties in Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: The amounts payable to Opposition parties under the Short money scheme have so far been revised on four occasions since the scheme's inception in 1975. The latest rise was effective from 1 January 1985. 45to oFollowing this pattern, a further review would be likely to take place in 1987 or 1988.

Mr. Beith: When the Leader of the House considers the matter again, will he bear in mind that the Short formula does not tell the whole story, because of the enormous range of exclusive fringe benefits granted to the Labour party as the official Opposition? Will he take into account the £80,000 in salaries for leaders of that party in both Houses, the £66,000 for civil servants seconded to them and the £30,000 for a car and chauffeur for the Leader of the official Opposition?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct. The Ministers of the Crown Act 1937, under which a salary was first paid to the Leader of the Opposition, also provided for a number of supporting expenses to come from the public purse. The hon. Gentleman is, therefore, quite right. The evolution of the Short money system since then has meant that two systems have been operating in parallel. I agree that it is perfectly valid to consider that at some future date.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend comment on the anomaly that whereas the Labour party apparently sees fit to accept public money to keep its democratic institutions working, a large proportion of the trade union movement apparently resists acceptance of such money to keep its democratic institutions working?

Mr. Biffen: I would rather confine myself to what goes on in this Chamber. I believe that the provision in the 1937 Act allowing public funds to be made available to the Opposition party has proved itself. Perhaps in the fullness of time wiser counsels will also prevail in the trade union movement.

Mr. Dormand: I hope that this will not be treated as a party matter—[Interruption.] It will not be too long before the Conservatives find themselves in opposition. We are talking about the workings of a healthy democracy. At present, the Short money is entirely inadequate for an Opposition to function properly. I was most disturbed to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that the matter will not be reconsided until about 1987. Does he agree that it should be done much sooner?

Mr. Biffen: There are some who would argue that it is not the absence of money which makes for an ineffective Opposition. We should beware of being too liberal in the application of so-called Short money. An agreement has been concluded and it would be appropriate for it to run to 1987 or 1988, as I have suggested. Of course, these are all matters that are considered from time to time, so the hon. Gentleman should not get too excited about it.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Royal Commission)

33. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will study the proposals made by Sir Douglas Wass for the establishment of a Royal Commission to look at questions of civil servants' loyalty, ministerial involvement in appointments and public accountability of Whitehall officials and for the establishment of an independent inspector general to whom civil servants can appeal if they consider that Ministers are attempting to mislead Parliament, a copy of which has been sent to him.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): I understand that the article to which the hon. Gentleman refers was written as a contribution to public discussion. I shall be interested to see comments upon it, but the Government have no plans for establishing a Royal Commission on these matters.

Mr. Dalyell: Did Ministers notice that, with the full argeement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), speaking on behalf of the national executive committee of the Labour party at the Bournemouth conference, committed the party to the propositions encapsulated in the question? How can anybody resist my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover when he is shoulder to shoulder with a former permanent secretary to the Treasury?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman will be astonished to discover that I find it quite easy to resist his proposal, and that of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Procedures for the Civil Service are perfectly straightforward and well provided for. If civil servants have complaints, or if matters of conscience arise, there is a system of appeal that goes straight up to their permanent secretary if they wish. Such matters can ultimately be referred to the head of the Civil Service. The existing procedures are perfectly adequate.

Mr. Forman: As the Government have been commendably self-restrained in not establishing new Royal Commissions, and as it seems clear that, when he was in a senior position in the Civil Service, Sir Douglas Wass did not favour this proposal, will my hon. Friend follow his wise policy, study it, and reject it?

Mr. Luce: I assure my hon. Friend that there is no intention of forming a Royal Commission on this subject.

Mr. Skinner: What is wrong with civil servants having a chance to appeal? Is the Minister aware that, in the past few months, there have been at least two instances of top civil servants taking non-executive directorships in private companies? They include civil servants in the Department of Trade and Industry. If it is right for civil servants, through the Government, to take on jobs in the private sector while holding down a top job in the Civil Service, surely to God it must be right for one on the other side of the fence to have a chance to appeal when he is being hammered by people such as Sir Robert Armstrong.

Mr. Luce: What is so extraordinary about all this is the assumption that there is no proper procedure for appeal if civil servants think that something has gone wrong. There is a perfectly legitimate procedure which was laid down clearly in a note by the head of the Home Civil Service, which he published at the end of February. It sets out quite plainly the procedure that any civil servant can follow if he has a problem that he wants to pursue.

Mr. Dickens: Does not my hon. Friend think this question rather strange, coming from the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who was the very hon. Member who used his voice for Clive Ponting? Was it not he who tabled questions planted by Clive Ponting and which were to be answered by Clive Ponting, who then denied that he was the author? Is it possible that the hon. Member for Linlithgow is a hypocrite, disloyal, or has taken leave of his senses? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Member to withdraw the word hypocrite.

Mr. Dickens indicated dissent.

Mr. Speaker: I say to the hon. Member, who knows this perfectly well as he has been here long enough to know it, that that is not a parliamentary expression. I ask him please to withdraw that word.

Mr. Dickens indicated dissent.

Mr. Speaker: I give the hon. Member one more chance. I would be very reluctant to take the matter any further. He knows very well that that was not a parliamentary expression and I ask him now to withdraw it.

Mr. Dickens: Out of respect to the Chair, I withdraw the remark.

Dispersal Policy

34. Mr. Dorman asked the Minister for the Civil Service what is his policy towards the further disperal of Civil Service posts to the regions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: There are at present no plans to extend the Government's dispersal programme beyond that announced on 26 July 1979.

Mr. Dormand: The Government frequently shed crocodile tears about the high unemployment in the north. Why does the Minister not transfer some Civil Service posts to that region? Is the Minister aware that not a single Civil Service post has been transferred to the north since this Government came to power? As the decision is entirely that of the Government, would it not be a demonstration of concern for the north if they were to transfer some jobs there?

Mr. Luce: I know that the hon. Gentleman has strong views about this and has put down repeated questions on this important issue over the past few years. Our dispersal programme, which was announced in 1979, stands and has not yet been completed. The House will be aware that 4,500 civil servants have been dispersed since 1979 and another 1,400 have still to be dispersed. The northern region still has a higher proportion of civil servants than the national average.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Is not of the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to extend some of the activities of his Department an example that we ought to follow?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I have considerable sympathy with what he said, because it comes within the existing policies of relocation of the Civil Service. Any Secretary of State considering the modernisation of his Department or offices can consider relocation in other areas. It is obviously up to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is the Minister aware that the Government's decision when they came into office not to disperse the Property Services Agency to Middlesbrough was a devastating blow to Middlesbrough and to the whole of the Teesside area? In view of that devastating blow and the enormous vacant site in the centre of Middlesbrough which was cleared for that Government Department, and in view of the successful operation of defence establishments such as the Royal Navy spare parts depot in my own constituency at Eaglescliffe, will the Minister make representations to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, so as to get any Departments being dispersed into areas like mine?

Mr. Luce: I cannot contemplate a change in our dispersal policy. I remind the House that the previous question referred to the relocation policy which allows Departments, when they are modernising, to consider moving to other regions. That is an area that can be further explored.

Recruitment

35. Mr. Adley asked the Minister for the Civil Service what steps he is taking to encourage recruitment to the Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: Extensive efforts are made by the Civil Service Commission and Departments to encourage recruitment, through visits and other means of publicising employment opportunities in the Civil Service.

Mr. Adley: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that the occasional publicity given to certain civil servants could mask the fact that on the whole this House and successive Governments are extremely well served? In their dealings with the Civil Service, have not this Government achieved something that successive Governments have been exhorting industry to do, which is to replace quality with quantity—sorry, quantity with quality?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his correction. I must agree with him that over the past six years the Civil Service has been through some necessary and dramatic changes, including a reduction of 133,000 civil servants, and great improvements in efficiency. We can now say with considerable pride that we have a service that is streamlined, modern, efficient and professional.

Dr. McDonald: Does the Minister agree that a satisfactory outcome to the long-term pay negotiations that have just commenced between the Government and the Civil Service unions would greatly aid proper recruitment to the Civil Service? Will he make a statement on behalf of the Government and agree that the Civil Service unions should have access to arbitration and to pay research data, and that, in those negotiations, special account should be taken of the problems of the low-paid within the Civil Service as a whole?

Mr. Luce: I should stress that pay is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of course, facilities such as special allowances and special additions are available within the service to deal with recruitment and retention in areas where there are problems, such as shortages of specialist skills. On the broad question of longer-term pay, the proposals put forward by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 15 October provide the prospect of a stable system of future pay negotiations which will be fair to employees, Government and taxpayers alike. Discussions are now proceeding on that matter.

Minister of State, Home Office

3.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has the Leader of the House indicated to you that before the House is prorogued on Wednesday a statement will be made on the allegation made in this House last Thursday by the hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington) — the Minister of State, Home Office — that some hon. Members are abusing their right to make representations in cases? The hon. and learned Gentleman, referring to the system of making representations, went on to claim that "some hon. Members are abusing. I am not afraid to use that word — that system." (Official Report, 24 October 1985, Vol. 84, c. 420.]

The allegations involve grave issues that touch on the honour and integrity of hon. Members, and it is incumbent on the Minister either to substantiate his allegations or to resign his office. You, Mr. Speaker, are the guardian of the honour and integrity of the House of Commons, and I put it to you that the House should not be prorogued until the matter has been cleared up.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are you aware that last Thursday, in answer to a question from me, the Minister implied that some Opposition Members were abusing their right to make representations? I am certain that he had me in mind because we have corresponded on this matter. I utterly refute any such suggestion. The Minister does not like the legal advice that I give my constituents, but it is absolutely within the law.

I sincerely ask you, Mr. Speaker, to make sure that time is made available for the hon. and learned Gentleman to be forced to name the people he has in mind, to give details of his allegations and to give us a chance to answer them.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is it on the same point of order?

Mr. Corbyn: It is similar, Mr. Speaker. Are you aware that outside this House many people are extremely concerned about the Minister's statement? Indeed, many migrant families are frightened of the implications. This goes with the Minister's curious decision last May to impose visa restrictions on people from Sri Lanka. He now appears to be trying to restrict further the rights of hon. Members by referring to individual Members of Parliament. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), I am quite sure that I am one of the hon. Members that the hon. and learned Gentleman had in mind because of the nature of my constituency and the fear among many migrant families. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you ought to do your best to find a way in which this crucial matter can be debated before the House is prorogued on Wednesday.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Many of us are being asked—I certainly am—whether we are the hon. Members about whom the Minister made that contemptuous reference. Unless the hon. and learned Gentleman comes before the House, we have no way of clearing our names. Many of us are, in good faith, giving advice to our constituents on the legal position, and if we are constrained from doing so because of what the Minister has said that puts us in a very difficult position. We have the right to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that there is an opportunity for us to clear our names.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I can be helpful by saying that the hon. Members concerned would clearly know who they were if they consulted their records. Many hon. Members are putting forward genuine visit applications to the Home Office and are saying, "I know this family", "It is a genuine visit", and so on. Why, then, are dozens of those families living at the same address?

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I add my voice in a personal plea? I am the hon. Member with possibly more cases of this sort than any other. In fact, it has become quite a joke with the Minister's office, and I have been asked, "Which one is it this time, Mr. Pavitt?" We are therefore placed in an extremely unfortunate position unless we are able to go to our constituents and meet our community relations councils with a very clear statement that it is not us to whom the Minister is referring.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If my hon. and learned Friend is to be asked to take the matter further, will he consider any cases which may have come to his attention of people who have approached one Member of Parliament and, when they have failed to get what they regarded as satisfaction, have subsequently gone to another Member of Parliament in whose constituency they are not involved so that they may get a more sympathetic and helpful hearing? Will he consider such cases before he comes to the House?

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since I was the Member to whom the ill-judged observation was originally made—and since I do not want to be left out of the action—may I reiterate the demand that the Minister should come to the Dispatch Box and name names if he wishes to do so? Those of us with lots of immigration cases to handle—there are easier things to do—are entitled to defend our record in that we always work within the law.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House will understand that none of this is a matter for me. Every hon. Member and every Minister must take responsibility for his own statements, whether from the Back Benches or from the Front Benches.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I rise in the hope that what I say may be of assistance to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House.

Immediately before coming to the House, I wrote to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) a long letter setting out the various abuses which have been occurring—and I note that a number of hon. Members are vying for the honour of being involved. I want to make it plain that I would not be cataloguing the abuses if I were not able to name names. I am by no means sure how I should proceed if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to press me on names. We are talking about correspondence between my private office and hon. Members which the writers never intended should be published. I am happy to discuss the matter with the right hon. Gentleman if he wishes to press further the request for names, but perhaps he and other hon. Members would like to read my summary of what has been occurring, and to consider how to proceed and whether it is necessary to raise the matter with you again.

Mr. Kaufman: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is not a matter between the hon. and learned Gentleman and me; it is between the hon. and learned Gentleman and the House of Commons. When the hon. and learned Gentleman made his allegations last Thursday, he spoke about "some hon. Members". It is unacceptable to me, and were it acceptable to me it would not be acceptable to the House, that the matter should be settled by some kind of private fix between the Minister and me. The hon. and learned Gentleman has made allegations to the House about unnamed Members of Parliament.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that it will not do for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that he is faced with certain procedural problems. More than 96 hours have gone by since he made his allegations. It was on Friday morning on the radio that he said that he was ready, if asked in the House of Commons, to name names. A motion went down to that effect in the name of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and other Opposition Members on Friday afternoon. If the hon. and learned Gentleman is now saying that he has not had time to deal with the procedural matters, all I can say is that he is trying to bottle out in some other way.

Therefore, I make it clear—and we ask for your assistance on this matter, Mr. Speaker—that whatever letter the hon. and learned Gentleman sends to me will not satisfy the House of Commons as a whole. It is to the House of Commons that the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to be made to answer between now and Prorogation.

Mr. Waddington: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to take advice. I should be happy to take advice from you, Mr. Speaker. There is no mystery about this. Of course I would not have been able to make the allegations, and I would not have dreamt of making any allegations, had I not been in a position to identify particular cases of abuse. I repeat what I said before: I am happy to take advice from anyone on this, but we should all think about what is the right way to proceed in a matter like this.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not clear that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have taken advice before he made those allegations? Is it not the duty of everyone in the House, especially you, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that we preserve the reputation of the House?

Is it not a serious matter when a Minister of the Crown makes statements alleging abuse of power by hon. Members? Should not the Minister be answerable to the House if the hon. Members are actually giving advice within the law laid down by the Government and carrying out their function of giving the best advice that they possibly can to their constituents on the basis of the existing law?

Would not the honourable and correct course for the hon. and learned Gentleman be for him at least to make a statement about what he thinks the offences and abuses are and to go further and name the hon. Members who he thinks are responsible and face questioning in the House?

Mr. Faulds: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister clearly made the implication that some of us might be embarrassed by the publication of letters that we had never thought would be published. The Minister has my total permission to publish any letter that I have written to him on any immigration case.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I have an assurance from you that it is right and proper for my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office to seek advice from hon. Members who have written letters in confidence to him about constituents before names are released? Surely my hon. and learned Friend is doing just that. I cannot see what the fuss is about.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not evident that the matter cannot be properly dealt with on a point of order? It is impossible on points of order to continue to put questions to the Minister, and many hon. Members in different parts of the House have every right to put questions. Surely the right way for us to proceed is to follow the request made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). The Minister responsible should come to the House; and, in the light of the way in which the Minister of State has dealt with the matter, I suggest that the only proper course is for the Home Secretary to come to the House and make a statement on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: That is a typically wise suggestion. I think that we should leave the matter there.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No; I am taking a different point of order.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. Against the background of circumstances of which you had knowledge this morning, may I put it to you that you may be at a disadvantage in not knowing that the last two RAF personnel defendants have been acquitted at the Old Bailey. Therefore, does it not behove either the Secretary of State for Defence or the Attorney-General to come to the House to explain the background of that £4·5 million, 119-day trial, which is a matter of considerable public concern?

Mr. Speaker: I was not aware of that information, but the Leader of the House is present and I am sure that he will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take one more point of order, but I think that the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has already made the wisest suggestion.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, but this matter regarding hon. Members mentioning unnamed other hon. Members is a matter for you, Mr. Speaker. I should like you to take into account what has happened in the past.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) said outside the House several years ago that there were certain hon. Members for hire, he was taken before the Privileges Committee. That was a matter for you.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) was the hon. Member for Colne Valley in the 1960s and said that certain hon. Members were drunk, he had to go before the Privileges Committee, because he was not prepared to name specific hon. Members.

On this occasion, not a Back Bencher, but a Minister of the Crown has said, in the same sort of context, exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw said about some other hon. Members and without naming them. Therefore, I suggest that that is a matter for the Privileges Committee.

In both previous cases, the hon. Members concerned had to go before the Privileges Committee and finally withdraw their allegations. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that, contrary to the advice that you have already been given, this is a matter for the Privileges Committee and the Minister should be sent before it to name the hon. Members or withdraw the allegations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. Gentleman can know what advice I was given. If he is alleging a matter of privilege, he should write to me and put the case in the usual way. That is the rule, and he knows it.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order involves both the procedures of the House and the Minister of State, Home Office.

On Monday 21 October, I submitted nine separate questions about visitors from Bangladesh for written priority answer. I submitted those questions to the Home Secretary, but on Thursday 24 October I received a reply from the Minister of State to all nine questions, which stated simply, "I shall reply as soon as possible". I make no complaint about that, because it is a familiar reply to questions before the information is available to Ministers.

However, the very next morning, on Friday 25 October, it was reported to me — and I have subsequently checked the tape—that the same Minister of State, in the BBC radio programme "Today", volunteered the precise information that I had requested in one of the nine questions to which I still await replies.

This raises questions about the Minister's conduct and the rights of Members on which I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker. First, is it not plain that the Minister misled the House in his written reply? He clearly had the information for which he was asked and he clearly did not reply as soon as possible, as he said he would. Indeed, he has not yet replied to the questions put down by me seven days ago. If the Minister had been a visitor from Bangladesh and had answered questions in such a way at Heathrow, he would have been put on the next plane home.

Secondly, if a Minister is asked a question in the House, is it not an abuse for that Minister deliberately to withhold the information that he possesses?

Finally, is it not a gross discourtesy for the Minister to release to the BBC, and through it to the press, the same information that he withheld from a Member of the House and is it not in direct conflict with the advice that you have consistently given to Ministers?

Mr. Speaker: What the right hon. Gentleman has said is not exactly a matter for me. It is a matter for the Government and for the Minister concerned, who is here.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I certainly meant no discourtesy to the right hon. Gentleman. He will recall that he put down a large number of interlinked questions. I cannot remember whether it was tabled yesterday or whether it has been tabled now, but what was obviously required and what was considered to be most convenient to the right hon. Gentleman was to put down one answer to all those questions.

Mr. Shore: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must make it perfectly plain that they were separate questions which deserve and should have separate replies. One of those replies was clearly available to the Minister of State when he refrained from giving it on Thursday afternoon.

QE2 (Renovation Contract)

3.48 pm

Dr. Norman A Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement reported on Friday of the Cundard shipping company to award a contract for the re-engining and renovation of the QE2 to the West German shipyard Lloyd-Werft."

In view of the imminent Prorogation of the House, time should be found to debate this specific and important matter before Wednesday. The matter is specific in that the order, worth £80 million, will do further injury to the United Kingdom shipbuilding and marine engineering industry. That industry has experienced remorseless decline, which is intensified by the decisions of British shipping companies and other domestic maritime agencies to place orders with foreign yards.

During the 20 years since the QE2 was launched on the Clyde, we have lost more than 80,000 jobs in our shipbuilding and engineering industries. If the decline continues, we shall lose the merchant shipbuilding sector of the industry and the last remnant of the marine engineering industry.

The matter is urgent because we need to examine closely the reasons for the reluctance, or failure, of companies such as Cunard to place orders with United Kingdom yards.

Finally, the nine new engines which the QE2 is to have could be constructed in United Kingdom marine engineering plants, in Belfast, my constituency or on the Tyne. Indeed, it is conceivable that the whole operation could have been carried out on the lower reaches of the Clyde. Cunard did not ask a single United Kingdom marine engine builder to bid for the manufacture of the nine engines. That part of the order is worth £60 million.

The issue causes deep anxiety to the shipbuilding industries of Belfast, the Tyne, the Mersey and the Clyde. I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will give sympathetic consideration to my request.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, (Dr. Godman) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement reported on Friday of the Cunard shipping company to award a contract for the re-engining and renovation of the QE2 to the West German shipyard Lloyd-Werft."

I fully understand the importance of the matter to the hon. Gentleman and his constituents. I listened carefully to what he said, but I do not consider that the matter is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Immigration Control

3.52 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely, "immigration control."

Such a debate would allow the Government to give the House information on three important matters. First, it would enable the Government to confirm or deny reports that they are planning to introduce visa requirements for visitors coming to Britain from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan. Yesterday The Sunday Times reported:

"The Home Office is considering imposing visa requirements on visitors entering Britain from some Asian and black Commonwealth countries. The move is being canvassed in Whitehall as a means of clearing the immigration bottleneck at London's Heathrow airport.

Bangladesh is the country causing immigration officers most concern at present. It is widely felt that if visas are introduced for Bangladeshi visitors other Commonwealth countries in the Indian sub-continent and north Africa will follow."

Secondly, such a debate would allow the Government to explain to the House their action to resolve the crisis within the immigration service that is primarily caused by staff shortages, which the Government refuse to remedy. The Sunday Times referred to the crisis at Heathrow as being a reason why the Government are considering the introduction of visa requirements for visitors to Britain. The Guardian today confirms that the introduction of visas for visitors from Commonwealth countries was suggested in reports at the weekend. Last night a spokesman for the Home Office said that the matter was under consideration, and that was confirmed later by another spokesman for the Home Office.

Thirdly, the debate would give the Minister of State, —who I am glad to see has returned to the Chamber and taken his place on the Treasury Front Bench—an opportunity to substantiate or withdraw the serious allegations that he made in the House on Thursday. The evident concern that they caused has been reflected by the numerous points of order that have been raised this afternoon.

You, Mr. Speaker, showed sympathy with the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) that the Home Secretary should make a statement. An emergency debate would provide an excellent opportunity for the Home Secretary to tell the House whether the Government are planning to introduce visas for visitors coming from Bangladesh and shortly from other New Commonwealth countries and Pakistan. Such a debate would also provide an opportunity for the right hon. Gentleman to tell us what action is being taken to deal with the administrative crisis within the immigration service.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that many hon. Members, including yourself, were deeply concerned when the Government chose over the Whitsun Bank Holiday to introduce visas for visitors seeking to come here from Sri Lanka. You will remember also that many hon. Members were concerned by the introduction of entry clearance fees for all people seeking visas to come to Britain for settlement. The fees were slipped through by the Government during the Christmas recess.

I suspect, other hon. Members suspect and many individuals and organisations outside the House who represent the interests of ethnic minorities suspect that the Government are planning visas for Bangladesh visitors coming to Britain and that they will do so during the period which starts on Wednesday, when the House will not be sitting, and prior to the new Session.

To avoid any recriminations that will ensue if the Government act in that way, I suggest that the best course of action for the Government would be to reassure the House as to their intentions for the extension of visa requirements during a debate which obviously is for you to grant, Mr. Speaker. The Government would have an opportunity to provide a full explanation and to take up the serious allegations which were made by the Minister on Thursday. They would be able to tell us what action they are taking to deal with the immigration crisis at Heathrow and other ports of entry throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely, "immigration control".

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. As he knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the business already set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter which he has raised meets all the criteria that are laid down in the Standing Order and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Orders of the Day

Insolvency Bill

Lords amendments to certain Commons amendments and Lords consequential amendments considered.

The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons:

After clause 2, insert the following new clause—

Reference to Tribunal:

' .—(1) A person on whom a notice is served under section [Notices] (2) above may within twenty-eight days after the date of service give written notice to the relevant authority requiring the case to be referred to the Tribunal referred to in subsection (6) below.

(2) Where a requirement is made in accordance with subsection (1) above, then, unless the relevant authority within the period there mentioned—

(a) decides to grant the application or, as the case may be, decides not to withdraw the authorisation; and

(b) gives written notice of that fact to the person by whom the requirement was made, it shall refer the case to the Tribunal.

(3) On a reference under this section the Tribunal shall—

(a) investigate the case; and

(b) make a report to the relevant authority stating what would in their opinion be the appropriate decision in the matter and the reasons for that opinion; and it shall be the duty of the relevant authority to decide the matter accordingly.

(4) The Tribunal shall send a copy of the report to the applicant or, as the case may be, the holder of the authorisation; and the relevant authority shall serve him with a written notice of the decision made by it in accordance with the report.

(5) The relevant authority may, if it thinks fit, publish the report of the Tribunal.

(6) For the purposes of this section there shall be a tribunal—

(a) which shall be known as the Insolvency Practitioners Tribunal (in this Part referred to as "the Tribunal"); and

(b) in relation to which the provisions of the Schedule 1 to this Act shall apply.'

Lords amendment: No. 1, in line 2, leave out from beginning to "give" in line 4 and insert—

" .—(1) Where a person is served with a notice under section (Notices) (2) above, he may—

(a) at any time within twenty-eight days after the date of the service of the notice; or

(b) at any time after the making by him of any representations in accordance with section (Right to make Representations) above, and before the end of the period of twenty-eight days after the date of the service on him of a notice by the relevant authority that the relevant authority does not propose to alter its decision in consequence of the representations,"

3.57 pm

The Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 5 and 74.

Mr. Howard: Lords amendments Nos 1 to 5 inclusive give effect to an undertaking which was given to the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) when the Bill was considered on Report. They provide that, where the relevant authority has given notice that it intends to refuse or revoke an authorisation to act as an insolvency practitioner and the person concerned within 14 days makes written representations to the relevant authority as to why it should not, the time limits on the period in which that person may require the case to be referred to the insolvency practitioners tribunal shall not begin to run until he has been made aware that his written representations have been rejected.

Lords amendment No. 74 ensures that members of the tribunal are subject to equivalent parliamentary disqualification in Northern Ireland as in Great Britain.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I welcome the Under-Secretary of State to the deliberations of this small and select group which has lived with the Bill for a long time. The group is becoming smaller and more select by the minute.

The Under-Secretary of State arrives at a rather late stage. We have spent a great deal of time on this measure. It has been something of a marathon, and I think that we can offer the hon. and learned Gentleman nothing more than a gentle canter down the finishing straight. He arrives at a moment when he can perhaps make his own small contribution to what might well become an achievement to be recorded in the "Guinness Book of Records". I believe that the number of amendments tabled to the Bill throughout its stages in both Houses is likely to exceed 1,200. The Under-Secretary of State will move even more amendments today and thereby add his name to that record-breaking achievement. I am not sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman would wish to be associated with that sort of achievement.

Despite the scale of the deliberations and the amendments which have been tabled and passed, I believe that many hon. Members and people outside the House would regard the measure as still being seriously deficient. Although I would certainly claim that in many respects it is a better measure than when it first appeared, nevertheless I agree with those, such as the National Consumer Council, the CBI and the Institute of Directors, who have all characterised the Bill as a missed opportunity and one that on present form is unlikely to recur for perhaps another 100 years unless perhaps a Government of a different persuasion were to see the need to introduce further reforms.

I thank the Under-Secretary of State for the way in which his officials have marshalled the material. It has been done in an extremely helpful and useful way, and I am sure that hon. Members would wish to express their appreciation to the hon. and learned Gentleman and his officials. We could well have wished that the matters that are being brought back to us from another place were of more substance and dealt with some of the remaining pressing concerns about the framework and shape of the Bill. Unfortunately, that is not the case. The matters with which we must deal this afternoon are essentially drafting and technical in almost every case, and so they will not detain us for long. I do not believe that this first group of amendments will detain us long either.

I welcome the fact that the Government have met the undertaking that they gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). The Opposition are pleased with this group of amendments.

Mr. Howard: I thank the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) for his welcome, which I very much appreciate, and for his kind remarks about the way in which departmental officials had marshalled the information. I am particularly pleased to see with us this afternoon my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) who is entitled to the credit for this legislation and who undertook the considerable work of piloting the Bill through the House.

The hon. Member for Dagenham referred to the number of amendments that have been tabled. I suggest that they show more than anything else the Government's readiness to listen to the suggestions on how it could be improved that have been made during the passage of the Bill. The Bill has been improved.

Mr. Gould: I entirely accept that the Government have listened to some effect. Many of us would make the point, however, that it is a pity that they did not listen a little earlier when they might well have published a draft Bill that could have avoided many of the difficulties that we subsequently encountered.

Mr. Howard: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not like the door to shut on consultation at any stage. It is right, especially with a measure of this type, that consultation should be a continuing process. Of course it has not proved possible to satisfy everyone, but such a measure involves a delicate balance of interests and, inevitably, some people will be disappointed at the outcome. I commend the amendments to the House as striking the right balance.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to.

The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons:

After Clause 10 insert the following new clause:—

Restriction on use of company names:

'(1) This section applies to a person where a company ("the relevant company") has gone into insolvent liquidation and he was a director or shadow director of the company at any time in the period of twelve months ending with the day before it went into liquidation; and for the purposes of this section a name is a prohibited name in relation to such a person if—

(a) it is a name by which the relevant company was known at any time in the said period; or

(b) it is a name which is so similar to a name falling within paragraph (a) above as to suggest an association with the relevant company.

(2) Except with the leave of the court a person to whom this section applies shall not at any time in the period of five years beginning with the day on which the relevant company went into liquidation—

(a) be a director of any other company that is known by a prohibited name; or

(b) in any way, whether directly or indirectly, be concerned or take part in the promotion, formation or management of any such company; or

(c) in any way, whether directly or indirectly, be concerned or take part in the carrying on of a business carried on (otherwise than by a company) under a prohibited name.

(3) If a person acts in contravention of this section he shall, in respect of each offence, be liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine or to both.

(4) In subsection (2) above "the court" means any court having jurisdiction to wind up companies; and on an application for leave under that subsection, the Secretary of State or the official receiver may appear and call the attention of the court to any matters which seem to him to be relevant.

(5) References in this section, in relation to any time, to a name by which a company is known are references to the name of the company at that time or to any name under which the company carries on business at that time.

(6) For the purposes of this section a company goes into insolvent liquidation if it goes into liquidation at a time when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts and other liabilities and the expenses of the winding up.

(7) In this section "company" includes a company which may be wound up under Part XXI of the 1985 Act.'

Lords amendment: No. 6, line 13, after "court" insert "or in such circumstances as may be prescribed"

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The new clause was introduced into the Bill in this House but reservations were expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and by practitioners that the provisions could adversely affect the sale of businesses or parts of businesses as going concerns by administrative receivers, administrators and liquidators. The amendment meets that criticism by allowing exemption from the provisions in certain circumstances, which will be prescribed in the rules. Such circumstances will be formulated following discussions in due course with practitioners but will concern sales by administrative receivers, administrators and liquidators who will be under a duty to obtain certain undertakings from the purchasers which will ensure that those subsequently dealing with the new company are adequately informed about the circumstances in which it is using the relevant name and are not misled. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Gould: I am content to accept the amendment. It goes some way towards meeting the proper concern expressed in Committee about the difficulties that the pre-existing conditions might well have posed to administrators and others. I observe only that this is yet one further example of detailed provisions being siphoned off into the rules, which we have yet to see. I understand why that has been done on this occasion, but it has been a notable and perhaps unfortunate feature of the Bill that so much of what we need to know about the changes to be made to insolvency law has been left as a matter for regulation.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I very much agree with the latter comments of the hon. Member for Dagenham, (Mr. Gould). I also warmly welcome my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) to the Front Bench; and I pay warm tribute to the previous Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher). My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central had just as much trouble as we did in trying to absorb the 450 amendments tabled in Standing Committee and the 250 amendments tabled on Report and he deserves as much credit as anyone for the exhaustive way in which we have dealt with the Bill. There is no doubt that he will have a willing place in any firm of insolvency practitioners, because there are probably few people who know as much as he does about the subject, although he did not know much to start with.

I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend the present Under-Secretary of State for what he has said about this amendment. Concern was expressed by practitioners that the requirement that court leave was to be obtained could inhibit sales of businesses by insolvency practitioners. After all, the name was often the only valuable asset which was left. Court leave would have not only inhibited the sale of the name but limited the money available for creditors.

Practitoners welcome the amendment which provides that court leave will not be needed in circumstances to be prescribed. This at least opens the door and allows the name to be sold when it is considered safe. My hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State said that these circumstances would include sales by insolvency practitioners, provided certain undertakings were given by purchasers. The nature of these undertakings will require careful consideration. I hope that adequate time will be given for this and the very large number of other matters to be dealt with by the rules to be considered by practitioners. I beg my hon. and learned Friend to give practitioners sufficient time to consider these rules. Members of Parliament may be given two days' notice of many complicated amendments; practitioners need much more time. I suggest that there should be three or four months' discussion to ensure that the rules are workable when they eventually become law.

Mr. Howard: I confirm that it is our intention to consult practitioners before we finally draw up the rules. I would not wish to be held to a time limit, but it is our intention to give them every opportunity to comment and to consider the rules in their final form before they come into force.

Question put and agreed to.

Commons amendment: Insert new clause—Challenge of decisions

'. — (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, an application to the court may be made by any of the persons specified in subsection (2) below, on one or both of the following grounds, namely—

(a) that a composition or scheme approved at the meetings summoned under section (Summoning of meetings) above unfairly prejudices the interests of a creditor, member or contributory of the company;

(b) that there has been some material irregularity at or in relation to either of the meetings.

(2) The persons who shall be entitled to make an application under this section shall be—

(a) a person entitled, in accordance with the rules, to vote at either of the meetings;

(b) the nominee or any person who has replaced him under section (Report by nominee who is not liquidator or administrator) (3) or (Decisions of meetings) (2) above; and

(c) if the company is being wound up or an administration order is in force in relation to the company, the liquidator or administrator of the company.

(3) An application under this section shall not be made after the end of the period of twenty-eight days beginning with the first day on which each of the reports required by section (Decisions of meetings) (6) above has been made to the court.

(4) Where on an application under this section the court is satisfied as to either of the grounds mentioned in subsection (1) above, it may do one or both of the following, namely—

(a) revoke or suspend the approvals given by the meetings or, in a case falling within subsection (1)(b) above, any approval given by the meeting in question;

(b) give a direction to any person for the summoning of further meetings to consider any revised proposal the person who made the original proposal may make or, in a case falling within subsection (1)(b) above, a further company or, as the case may be, creditors' meeting to reconsider the original proposal.

(5) Where at any time after giving a direction under subsection (4)(b) above for the summoning of meetings to consider a revised proposal the court is satisfied that the person who made the original proposal does not intend to submit a revised proposal, the court shall revoke the direction and revoke or suspend any approval given at the previous meetings.

(6) In any case where the court, on an application made under this section with respect to any meeting, gives a direction under subsection (4)(b) above or revokes or suspends an approval under subsection (4)(a) or (5) above, the court may give such supplemental directions as it thinks fit and, in particular, directions with respect to things done since the meeting under any composition or scheme approved by the meetings.

(7) Except in pursuance of the preceding provisions of this section, an approval given at a meeting summoned under section (Summoning of meetings) above shall not be invalidated by any irregularity at or in relation to the meeting.'

Lords amendment: No. 7, in subsection (6), at end leave out "meetings" and insert "meeting".

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 8 to 11.

Mr. Howard: This group of amendments relates to the voluntary arrangement procedure for companies. Amendments Nos. 8 and 9 will enable the court in appropriate cases at the time it makes a winding up order to appoint as liquidator of a company either the official receiver or a person who has previously been acting as the supervisor of a voluntary arrangement in relation to that company. Similar provisions were incorporated into the Bill at an earlier stage where bankruptcy follows an individual voluntary arrangement and where a compulsory liquidation follows the appointment of an administrator.

Amendments Nos. 9A and 10A ensure that persons bound by a voluntary arrangement are given prompt notice when the supervisor considers his task is complete and also that they shall receive a full report on the administration of the scheme of composition. Such persons may of course challenge the acts of a supervisor before the court.

When framing the rules which will flow from the enabling provisions, it is our intention not only to provide that notice supported by relevant information is given within 28 days of a supervisor completing his work, but for a penalty to be imposed for non-compliance.

Amendment No. 11 repeals section 601 of the Companies Act 1985. That section, which provided a means of effecting a binding arrangement with creditors within a voluntary winding up, has been little used and is made redundant by the new more flexible company voluntary arrangement procedure now contained in chapter 1A of part II of the Bill. Consequential thereon is amendment No. 10 which substitutes reference to a corporate voluntary arrangement for reference to a binding arrangement under section 601 in relation to provisions governing the giving of financial assistance under section 153(3) of the principal Act.

Amendment No. 7 corrects a drafting error.

I commend acceptance of the amendments to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to.

Clause 15

EFFECT OF APPLICATION

Lords amendment: No. 12, in line 3, leave out from "or" to the end of line 5 and insert

"continued and references to distress being levied shall be omitted."

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 13 to 27.

Mr. Howard: Amendment No. 64 made by the House was intended to translate into Scottish legal terminology what is meant by the reference in clauses 15 and 16 to execution being "commenced or continued" and to "distress being levied". The translation, however, went further than intended and the proposed amendment to it, amendment No. 12, ensures that it has a similar effect in Scotland as in England and Wales.

Amendments Nos. 13 to 17 are designed to meet concern on the part of insolvency practitioners that, after displacement by an administrator, receivers might still be held to be liable to pay preferential debts. Amendment No. 17 makes it clear that they are not liable once displaced, although they continue to be liable for their actions while in office.

Amendments Nos. 18 and 19 both make further refinements to the Bill's provisions. The first of them enables the company or the directors, as well as a continuing administrator, a committee of creditors or creditors of the company, to apply to the court for an order to fill a vacancy in the office of administrator. The second, amendment No. 19, which was made in response to comments by those who have been consulted, brings administration into line with the winding-up code and receiverships which provide statutory sanction for the giving of directions by the court to compulsory liquidators, receivers and debenture holders.

Amendment No. 72 introduced a new clause that entitled the administrator to exercise his powers, including his power of disposal, in relation to property covered by a debenture conveying a floating charge capable of leading to the appointment of an administrative receiver, property covered by any fixed charges held by the debenture holder and book debts covered by a charge. The clause preserved the security over such property by providing that any existing security should "follow" the proceeds of property disposed of as if the security, whatever its original nature, were a crystallised or attached floating charge.

However, we have received strong representations from financial institutions and practitioners and the Government are persuaded that it would be unjust for fixed charges held by a person who also has a floating charge and those over book debts to be dealt with differently from those held by other fixed chargeholders. Amendment No. 20 therefore removes from subsection (1) property subject to fixed charges held by a floating chargeholder and fixed charges over book debts. The administrator must therefore apply to the court for authorisation to dispose of property subject to such charges. He will remain entitled to dispose of assets subject to floating charges.

To remedy a defect in subsection (4), amendment No. 21 transfers the security holder's priority to any property representing, directly or indirectly, the charged property disposed of. Thus, for example, if the administrator sells charged plant and machinery, the chargeholder's security would attach to the moneys obtained from the sale and then to any asset that those moneys might be converted into.

I make no apology for emphasising that amendment No. 20 effects a substantial change in the manner in which an administrator will conduct the business of the company. We have accepted the strong representations of financial institutions and insolvency practitioners that, in its unamended state, the clause puts the interests of the secured financial creditors at very great risk by enabling the administrator to use their secured assets for trading funds. They saw themselves as being compelled in effect to make "forced loans" to someone over whom they had no control. In such circumstances, where possible, they would always appoint an administrative receiver to obtain control of the secured assets even though that might destroy the company's chances of rehabilitation.

The widespread adoption of that attitude would make the administration procedure unworkable and we sought by the amendment to meet the fears expressed. We accept in practice that the administrator will, in most cases, need to obtain finance for trading from a company's bankers, but we anticipate that the institutions, having supported or consented to the appointment of the administrator, will play an important role in the achievement of the purposes of the administration and provide on sensible terms the finance required. We trust that the changes in the procedure will improve its acceptability to the present structure of financing business in this country and provide a useful additional means of rehabilitating enterprises that would otherwise be destroyed.

[Mr. Howard]

Finally, amendment No. 22 is a technical amendment which makes it clear that, in Scotland, where any hire purchase goods are disposed of by the administrator, the disposal has the effect of extinguishing any of the rights of the hire purchase owner in the goods. The hire purchase owner would, of course, still have rights to the net value of the goods by virtue of subsection (5) of the new clause inserted by amendment No. 72.

Amendments Nos. 23 to 27 inclusive are all minor drafting and technical amendments.

Mr. Gould: I am happy to give a general welcome to this group of amendments.

I wish to say only one small word of commendation in respect of amendment No. 20. In the light of the representations that the Minister has received, he was right to move swiftly to make sure that the administration procedure, which I regard as one of the most constructive new features of the Bill, was not jeopardised. Given the hon. and learned Gentleman's explanation of the circumstances as they might have been affected by the Bill as drafted, when creditors with fixed charges might immediately have appointed an adminstrative receiver rather than allow an administration order to be made, the Minister's hon. Friends in another place were right to table the amendment and effect the change. It is important that the administration order procedure is given a fair wind.

Mr. Hanley: I believe that it would be wise to pay tribute to the many bodies that consulted the Minister and that the Minister consulted over the past few months during the summer recess. I am sure that the House will bear with me if I mention the names of the eight associations because they are important particularly in the development of the amendments that we are now discussing. The Department consulted the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, the Association of Certified Accountants, the Insolvency Practitioners Association, the Law Society, the Law Society of Scotland and the Committee of London and Scottish Bankers, the latter having the greatest effect on amendment No. 20, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

It is vital that consultation takes place on technical matters of this sort. I echo the view of the hon. Member for Dagenham that if only a draft Bill had been put forward, many of the 1,000 amendments, in a 200-clause Bill—it is only a 200-clause Bill—would have been avoided. I know that it takes time to formulate a draft Bill, but it requires the confidence of the Government in the House to deal non-politically with matters of technical content. Therefore, if a draft Bill had been devised for the matter, many of the embarrassments over the past months might have been avoided.

However, the consultation, albeit late, has taken place. I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for allowing changes before Lords amendments. The Lords have changed the Bill from what was very much a disappointing if not an impossible Bill to work into a Bill that has many good chances of surviving in future. It may survive with amendment in future, but we can give it a fair wind.

With regard to amendment No. 20, in commenting on the provisions concerning administrators as they left this House, many practitioners noted that any banks which held fixed and floating charge security were not likely to allow the appointment of an administrator. It was a great shame, because the administrator is one of the great hopes for saving many businesses. This was because of the effect that they would have had on their fixed charge security, and who could have blamed them?

The amendments made in the other place have brought major changes to administration orders. The administrator is not the animal that he was when he left this House, and I am grateful. His dominion is now only over floating charged assets. That allays the fears of the financial institutions but it leaves considerable uncertainty as to where an administrator's cash flow is to come from. Where there is a fixed charge on his fixed assets, that is one thing, but where there is a fixed charge on book debts, which is increasingly the case, one wonders where the administrator's funds will come from. Therefore, the practitioners in insolvency can give the amendment only a qualified welcome. The pendulum has swung too often over the procedure for us to know whether it is resting in exactly the right place.

Mr. Howard: I thank the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) for the welcome that they have given to the amendments. In particular, I associate myself and the Government with the tribute paid by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes to the various bodies which have participated in the extensive consultation that has taken place on the contents of the Bill in general and on these clauses in particular.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 13 to 27 agreed to.

Clause 37

VACATION OF OFFICE

Lords amendment: No. 28, in line 16, after "company" insert "without reasonable excuse".

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 29 to 33 and 76.

Mr. Howard: The amendments fall into two categories, those which deal with administrative receiver and receiver provisions in England and Wales—amendments Nos. 28 and 76—and those which refine the provisions for receivers in Scotland—amendments Nos. 29 to 33.

Dealing first with the amendments relating to England and Wales, amendment No. 28 ensures that an administrative receiver will not commit an offence under clause 37(5) if he has a reasonable excuse for not sending the notice of his vacation of office to the registrar of companies, and is in line with other provisions of the Bill. Amendment No. 76 is a drafting amendment.

With regard to the five amendments to the Scottish provisions, amendments Nos. 29 and 33 are both minor drafting amendments. Amendment No. 30 removes a contradictory qualification on the Scottish receiver's personal liability by removing the reference to section 473(1) of the Companies Act 1985 in section 473(2) of that Act. The consequential amendment No. 31 inserts the relevant words into the repeal schedule to the Bill. Amendment No. 32 makes a minor consequential amendment to section 477 of the Companies Act 1985 following the bringing of the receiver's powers to dispose of any interest in property subject to a security into line with those for England and Wales.

Mr. Hanley: There is nothing with which I disagree in this group of amendments. However, in the other place there was concern that the Bill did not make clear the position of practitioners with regard to contracts of employment after the 14-day period of grace in respect of adoption by omission had elapsed. In fact, it was I who mentioned the matter to the then Minister, and I was followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), who very much regrets his absence today on parliamentary business.

During the debate in the other place the Lord Advocate tried to put the minds of practitioners at rest by stating:

"Where, for example, the contract is not discovered for a month after appointment, the court will not deem adoption to take place by that fact alone."

With the greatest respect to the Lord Advocate, how can he say what the courts will or will not deem to be the case? It was my understanding—I may be wrong—that courts are not bound by the intention of Ministers in describing legislation. Therefore, if it is the intention that the legislation should not catch such circumstances, surely the amendment should have said so, and the Bill itself should be clearer, rather than hoping what judges might or might not take as being the proper interpretation of the clause.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is correct when he says that the courts are not bound by the intentions or, indeed, the observations of Ministers. Nevertheless, in assessing the likely effect and impact of legislation, Ministers are entitled to give the House guidance. The guidance given by the Lord Advocate was guidance given on the basis of my right hon. and learned Friend's experience and expertise in the branch of the law that is relevant to a consideration of the likely effect of the clause to which my hon. Friend has referred. He was not giving any guarantee as to the way in which the clause would be interpreted by the courts; he was giving another place the benefit of his experience and expertise. It was on that basis that another place was content with the clause as drafted, and it is on that basis that I commend it to my hon. Friend and to the House.

MEETING OF CREDITORS IN CREDITORS' VOLUNTARY WINDING-UP.

Lords amendment: No. 34, in line 9, leave out

"two business days stated in the notice and falling"

and insert

"the two business days falling next".

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 41 to 48, 70 to 73, 75, and 77 to 79.

Mr. Howard: Amendment No. 34 is the first of a group of amendments consisting of drafting and technical amendments relating to winding-up, bankruptcy and miscellaneous matters. They either improve upon and give greater clarity to the Bill or merely involve the re-enactment of current provisions in insolvency legislation.

The amendments fall into four categories: provisions which deal with winding-up—amendments Nos. 34, 75 and 77; definitions—amendments Nos. 41, 43 and 44; bankruptcy—amendments Nos. 42, 45, 46, 47, 48 and 79; and miscellaneous clauses—amendments Nos. 71, 72, 73 and 78.

Should the House so desire, I am in a position to expand on any individual amendment. Failing that, I do not intend to take up time in going into detail on those matters, and commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Hanley: With regard to amendment No. 77, the Commons amendment No. 458 introduced a new subsection (1A) to section 518 of the Companies Act 1985 by which a company is also deemed unable to pay its debts if the value of its assets is less than its liabilities, taking into account its contingent and prospective liabilities. Practitioners have commented that the amendment introduced a balance sheet test to accompany the existing cash flow test, with which we all agree.

In the debate in the other place the Minister stated that the Commons amendment does not change the law but only gives effect to the way in which the courts have interpreted section 518 of the Companies Act 1985. In support of that contention, the Minister quoted Mr. Justice Nourse in Re: Bond Jewellers, when he said:

"what I am required to do is to take into account the contingent and prospective liabilities. That cannot mean that I must simply add them up and strike a balance against assets."

It remains the fear of insolvency practitioners that that is precisely what the new subsection (1A) of section 518 will require the courts to do. It is alarming that such a fundamental matter should remain a matter of such uncertainty at this stage. May I invite my hon. and learned Friend to seek further counsel on this matter? It is fundamental to the definition of insolvency to know exactly what assets are meant to cover what liabilities.

Mr. Howard: As I understand it, the point made by my hon. Friend relates to an amendment that was considered in the other place but not to an amendment made by another place in relation to the business before the House this afternoon. It does not, therefore, arise for consideration this afternoon and, in any event, I would not wish to add anything to the words of the learned judge cited both in another place and by my hon. Friend.

TRANSACTIONS AT AN UNDERVALUE AND PREFERENCES (ENGLAND AND WALES)

Lords amendment: No. 35, in line 5, leave out "in the ordinary course of" and insert "for the purpose of carrying on".

4.30 pm

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 36 and 57 to 59.

Mr. Howard: These amendments modify the provisions of the Bill relating to preferences given to creditors and transactions carried out at an undervalue, both in winding up and in bankruptcy.

Amendment No. 35 has been made as a result of representations received from the Law Society. The expression in relation to a company's business has been replaced by the expression

"in the ordinary course of"

"for the purpose of carrying on",

so that it is clear that one-off transactions in genuine special circumstances—for example, rescue operations — are not automatically caught by the undervalue transaction provisions.

Amendments Nos. 36 and 59, which have been made following representations from both the Law Society and the practitioners, ensure that employees of a bankrupt or insolvent company are not regarded as connected persons or associates for the purposes of preferences and undervalue transactions. Here we have in mind instances where persons are connected solely because of their employment. Those who are also directors or officers of a company will still be treated as connected persons.

It was not intended that the normal receipt by employees of wages and related benefits should be subject to undue scrutiny. These amendments provide that, in relation to someone who is an employee only, transactions with him will be reviewable, as they are under the present law, for a six-month rather than a two-year period. There will be no presumption that a payment to such persons is a preference and, as regards transactions at an undervalue, they will not be required to demonstrate, in order to validate the transactions, that the company or individual was insolvent.

Amendments Nos. 57 and 58 insert necessary drafting changes consequential upon Commons amendment No. 333.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Gould: Despite my best efforts and arguments, the Government and the Minister resolutely refused to accept amendments that I tabled in Committee which would have given effect to and recognised the special interest that employees have in the continuing viability of a company, particularly under the administration order procedure. I am glad to see that in this tiny respect, in the ground covered by amendments Nos. 36 and 59, there is some recognition of the special position of employees. I welcome those amendments, but I would prefer to have seen some concession on the more substantial ground.

AVOIDANCE OF CERTAIN FLOATING CHARGES

Lords amendment: No. 37, in page 70, line 2, after "charge" insert—

"(aa) the value of so much of that consideration as consists of the discharge or reduction, at the same time as, or after, the creation of the charge, of any debt of the company;"

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 38 to 40.

Mr. Howard: It has been established in the 1965 cases of the Yeovil Glove Company Ltd. and Thomas Mortimer Ltd. that, where a company instructs a third party to make a payment to a creditor of the company, the payment is deemed to have been made to the company. The provisions of clause 87 in no way alter the existing legislation. Our initial view was that, in the light of the case law, there was no need to deal with the matter in the clause. However, we reconsidered the position and concluded that there was no overriding objection to specifying the position in the statute, as was desired by a noble Lord in another place and by certain of those with whom we consulted. These amendments achieve that purpose.

POWERS OF COURT IN RESPECT OF DISCLAIMED PROPERTY

Lords amendment: No. 49, in line 3, leave out

"in occupation of or claiming a right"

and insert

"who at the time when the bankruptcy petition was presented was in occupation of or entitled".

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be conveniet to take Lords amendments Nos. 50 to 56.

Mr. Howard: Amendments Nos. 49 to 56 improve the clarity of the provisions which deal with the bankrupt's home. They are mainly drafting improvements, but they also provide that, in line with other provisions in insolvency law — for example, clause 113 — matters occurring after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition are not to count for the purpose of these provisions. Therefore, any person claiming a right to reside in the property, either for the purposes of the new clauses or in connection with the rights conferred on occupants under the disclaimer provisions, must have had a right of occupation at the date of the bankruptcy petition. This is to prevent the debtor, realising that his bankruptcy is likely, from trying to manoeuvre himself into an artificially advantageous position.

I commend the amendments to the House.

New Clause

COOPERATION BETWEEN COURTS EXERCISING JURISDICTION IN RELATION TO INSOLVENCY LAW

Lords amendment: No. 60, in line 7, leave out from beginning to "shall" in line 8 and insert

"; but, without prejudice to the following provisions of this section, nothing in this subsection".

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 61 to 69 and 73A.

Mr. Howard: Amendments Nos. 60 to 63 and 63A enable provisions to be made in subordinate legislation to assist the working of the new inter-jurisdictional clause, introduced by Commons amendment No. 383, and to make it easier for courts to assist insolvency practitioners in their duties.

Following consultation with the authorities of the three United Kingdom jurisdictions, it appears that provisions need to be made so that, where property exists in one jurisdiction but the insolvency procedures are in another, such property can be protected and claimed for the benefit of the insolvent estate's creditors but without automatic vesting provisions in relation to property in another jurisdiction, which can create serious anomalies — for example, in relation to innocent third parties who purchase land without notice of the bankruptcy of the vendor.

Amendments Nos. 64 to 69 and 73A are consequential on the previous amendments. The whole group can be said to rationalise the provisions of the insolvency law in the three United Kingdom jurisdictions and the relationships between them.

Mr. Hanley: Practitioners broadly agree on and are very grateful for the alterations that have been made.

On the commencement dates of the legislation as a whole, in another place the Minister observed that no decision had been taken on a target date for the various commencement orders. Can my hon. and learned Friend tell us at least when the date is likely to be—this year, next year or 1987? He noted that, although the greater part of the Bill is designed to be brought into effect at the same time, some of the provisions are free standing, such as those relating to the disqualification of directors, so desperately needed, which I believe now, following this Bill, might well work, and the attachment of personal liability for wrongful trading. It seems that those free standing provisions may be brought into effect at an earlier date. I believe that when they will be brought into effect should be known well in advance so that proper advice can be taken. Can my hon. and learned Friend give that assurance?

Secondly, in another place the Minister stated that the Government had no intention of introducing amending insolvency legislation in the forthcoming Session. I beg my hon. and learned Friend not to have a closed mind. My hon. and learned Friend will know, as his predecessor learnt, that insolvency law is a highly specialised and extremely complex matter. Despite all the changes, there is no guarantee that every matter is now right. Some would guess to the contrary. The Government should monitor the effect of the legislation as soon as possible and, if required, amendment should be made without promises that no amending legislation will occur next Session.

Lastly, on the rules, I regard the passing of the Bill without knowing the rules as not unlike being asked whether one is Jewish without knowing the contents of the 10 commandments. Consultation needs time. Practitioners are not full-time legislators.

I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend would wish to acknowledge the assistance of practitoners, so freely and generously given, and to obtain the full benefit of their assistance on the many vital aspects which may be dealt with by way of secondary legislation.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I should like to add my support to some of the points made by the hon. Members for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box.

From my observation, it was not only the Minister's predecessor who made a contribution to the proceedings on the Bill, but, if I may say in a non-partisan way, the hon. Members for Dagenham, for Richmond and Barnes and for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), and they should be commended.

Many of us who pressed for the Bill thought that it would have a speedy and uncomplicated passage through the two Houses of Parliament. We now know how wrong that hope was. The Bill was introduced in another place on 10 December 1984. Since then, as the hon. Member for Dagenham said, there have been more than 1,200 amendments, which we understand is a parliamentary record. The Bill was brought from the other place on 16 April 1985 and had its Second Reading in this House on 30 April. It has spent almost 35 hours in Committee. Cork was established in January 1977, which is a considerable time ago. One would have hoped that there would have been sufficient time for Government Departments and others to have given it adequate consideration. It is most regrettable that the House was placed in the predicament of having to deal with so many amendments because of the way that the Government introduced the Bill.

I hope that the Minister and his officials will respond to the appeal made by the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes, because the Bill, without the rules, is only half a Bill. I hope that they will learn a lesson from recent months and consult widely and seek to reach as broad agreement as possible on the content of those rules. We all realise that there is a balance of arguments and interests to be reached, but I hope that the Government, in the coming weeks and months, will consult widely to ensure that the rules are as acceptable as possible to those who have daily to deal with the legislation.

Most of us wanted to see the legislation on the statute book because we were aware that a great deal of damage was being done to a large section of industry due to the inadequacy of the law. Despite some of the deficiencies that undoubtedly still exist in the statute, it will overcome some of the problems that were faced by the profession and by those industries that went to the wall and were made bankrupt. If the new procedure had been in operation, they would not have done so.

4.45 pm

Mr. Howard: I thank the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) for his kind welcome to me, and associate myself with the tribute that he paid to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley).

My hon. Friend mentioned a number of points, and I shall endeavour to respond to them. I cannot be precise about commencement dates at this stage. I do not imagine——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister need feel under no obligation to respond to matters that went beyond the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to you for that reminder, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am anxious to be as helpful as possible to my hon. Friend.

[Mr. Howard]

The most likely date for commencement is 1986. I can give an assurance that notice of the bringing into effect of any of the free standing provisions to which my hon. Friend referred will be given well in advance. Although I do not resile from what was said in another place—that it was not the Government's intention to introduce any amendment to this legislation—I hope that everything that I have said this afternoon makes it clear that these matters will not be approached with closed minds. Of course, the operation of the legislation will be monitored, and what my hon. Friend has said will be taken to heart.

Lords amendments in lieu of certain Commons amendments, Lords amendments to certain other Commons amendments, and Lords consequential amendments considered.

Clause 7

MEANING OF APPARENT INSOLVENCY

The Lords have disagreed to the amendments made by the Commons in page 8, line 14, leave out from 'debt' to 'has' in line 16 and insert

'of (or debts the aggregate of which is) a relevant amount,'.

page 8, line 23, at end insert—

'(1A) In subsection (1)(d) above, "a relevant amount" means not less than—

(a) £750; or

(b) such sum as may be prescribed.'.

and have made the following amendments to the Bill in lieu thereof:

Amendment No. 1, in page 8, line 14, after second "a" insert "liquid".

Amendment No. 2, in page 8, line 15, after "amounts" insert

"(or liquid debts which in aggregate amount)".

4.46 pm

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): I beg to move, That this House doth not insist upon the amendments made by the Commons to page 8, line 14 and page 8 line 23 and that the House doth agree to amendments Nos. 1 and 2, made by the Lords in lieu of those amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 4.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 have the effect of providing that a creditor will only be able to use the procedure under clause 7(1)(d) if the debts making up his £750 are liquid debts. The meaning of the term "liquid debt" is a matter for the common law. In essence it means a debt that is of a certain settled amount which is constituted in writing by decree or probative document or is admitted by the debtor. This will constitute a considerable safeguard for the debtor and was suggested by the Scottish Consumer Council.

Amendment No. 4 restores the position to what it was previously. It makes it clear that the debtor need only deny that there is a debt or that the sum claimed by the creditor is immediately payable. That simplifies the position for the debtor.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The Opposition are happy and content to accept the Government's position not just on this amendment but on all the amendments selected. I am sure that the Scottish Consumer Council would wish me to pass its thanks to the Solicitor-General for the considerate way in which he has studied their representations. That is true of representations made by various other organisations. When we discussed the Insolvency Bill I said to myself—I can put it on record now—that the miracle is that both the Bills have reached this happy state today, because both Bills were in Committee at the same time. One was subject to amendment as a result of what was happening to the other and at one stage no one would have believed that the Government or anyone else—I do not say this critically—could have produced the sensible proposals that are contained in the Bill.

Lords amendment No. 3: The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons in

Leave out "recorded delivery" and insert "personal service by an officer of court"

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) for his remarks on Lords amendment No. 1. What I have to say about this amendment will be in the same category. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, there were a number of difficulties in Committee when we had two sets of important changes to this area of law proceedings in parallel. It is a matter of enormous relief, not only to myself but to the draftsmen of the Bill, that we should have reached this stage of the Bill today.

This amendment alters the method by which a demand under clause 7(1)(d) will have to be served upon a debtor from one of service by recorded delivery to one of personal service by an officer of court. This is to ensure that a debtor is capable of being constituted apparently insolvent by this method only if he has personally received the statutory demand. In making this change, we have taken due account of the points raised on Report by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). The requirement of personal service will help to alert the debtor to the seriousness of a demand under this provision. I hope that this change will allay many of the anxieties expressed by the Opposition.

The procedure introduced under clause 7(1)(d) will nevertheless remain a technique that could be used successfully in bankruptcy law in Scotland and from time to time avoid unnecessary expense, allowing what remains of a debtor's estate to be readily distributed among the creditors.

Mr. Ewing: I welcome the remarks of the Solicitor-General and proffer the apologies of my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) who is absent on Council of Europe business but who particularly asked me to welcome this provision. Although it may seem a minor provision and may not be used very often, it is nevertheless very important in situations where the apparent insolvency of the debtor has to be established by a particular method.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Govan as well as the Institute of Chartered Accountants regarded it as important that the recipient should be conscious that he was receiving a notification that would establish his insolvency. The original proposal for notification by recorded delivery letter seemed to leave something to be desired. We are therefore grateful to the Government for going along the path suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and requiring that an officer should serve the notice. The recipient will thus be fully conscious of the importance of the notification. I am grateful to the Solicitor-General for agreeing to these proposals.

page 31, line 10, leave out 'to the same effect' and insert

'; but any right or interest acquired for value before the registration or publication shall not be prejudiced by the effect of the act and warrant or by such registration or publication.'.

and have made the following amendments to the Bill in lieu thereof:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 7.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth not insist upon the amendments made by the Commons in page 31, line 7, and in page 31, line 10, but that the House doth agree to amendments Nos. 6 and 7 to the Bill made by the Lords in lieu of those amendments.

The purpose of the amendments is to restrict to Scotland clauses 30 and 37, which provide for the vesting of the debtor's estate in, and the ingathering of the estate by, the permanent trustee. As my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate discussed in some detail when introducing these amendments in another place, they have arisen because of apparent practical difficulty in applying the principle of universal vesting of a debtor's estate in the permanent trustee in other parts of the United Kingdom outwith Scotland. This practical difficulty has been resolved by means of new provisions in the Insolvency Bill which will allow for regulations to provide that the permanent trustee will have the same rights in relation to property in England, Wales and Northern Ireland as he would if he had been appointed a trustee in bankrupty under the law of any of those countries.

These new provisions will have the effect of putting a permanent trustee in a Scottish sequestration in a stronger position than if he had simply to rely on clause 30 extending to other parts of the United Kingdom outwith Scotland. It also ensures that due account is taken of the position under local law where the property is situated and that there is reciprocity between all parts of the United Kingdom.

INTERPRETATION

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 9, in clause 17, page 17, line 37, leave out

" , or the barring of the effect of any enactment or rule of law relating to the limitation of actions in any part of the United Kingdom,"

No. 10, in clause 72, page 69, line 2, leave out "17(5)"

No. 11, page 69, line 3, leave out "and 52" and insert "52 and 68(5)"

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Amendment No. 8 clarifies those provisions in the Bill that bar the effect of any enactment or rule of law relating to the limitation of actions in any part of the United Kingdom. It provides that what is meant by the presentation of the petition for sequestration or the submission of a claim barring the effect of such enactments or rule of law is that they should have the same effect as an effective acknowledgment of the creditor's claim.

Lords amendments Nos. 9, 10 and 11 are consequential and remove the provision in clause 17(5) which saves the effect of the interruption of the limitation period on the recall of the sequestration. This is because it is considered unnecessary to do so in English law. They also have the effect of extending the effect of clause 68(5) to other parts of the United Kingdom outwith Scotland.

No. 14, in line 41, leave out "Schedule 3" and insert "Schedule 4".

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Amendments Nos. 12 and 13 have the effect of deleting the amendments which it was proposed to make to the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 in the interim period between the commencement of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Bill and the Insolvency Bill. These amendments are no longer required because it is not now intended to make them until the equivalent provisions in the Insolvency Bill relating to Crown preferences commence.

The third change to this amendment is consequential upon the renumbering of the schedule to the Insolvency Bill relating to Crown preferences.

Mr. Ewing: I thank the Solicitor-General for accepting these important amendments as it seemed unwise to proceed in the way in which the Government had intended to proceed. We are therefore grateful for the Government's change of mind.

It may seem to be an early Christmas for the Solicitor-General, but I end as I began by saying that we now have a sensible and operable piece of legislation because the Solicitor-General and his ministerial colleagues very generously exchanged with us not only notes on clauses but notes on amendments, which we found most helpful. I place on record my thanks to the Solicitor-General for the way in which he conducted the Committee stage of the Bill.

RECTIFICATION OF DEFECTIVELY EXPRESSED DOCUMENTS

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 7, line 38, at end insert

"and contain a description of the land to which the application relates"

5 pm

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 50, in page 44, line 25, at end insert—

"Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1868 (c. 101)

. In section 159 (litigiosity not to begin before date of registration in Register of Inhibitions and Adjudications of notice of summons) after the word "summons", where thirdly occurring, there shall be inserted the words "and contain a description of the lands to which the summons relates".

. In Schedule RR (form of notice of summons) after the word "signeting]" there shall be inserted the words "The Summons relates to [insert description of lands].".."

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: These amendments arise from some concern which was expressed by Opposition peers about the scope of notices of litigiosity under clause 8(8). While the Government were unable to accept the original point, we were persuaded that the present provisions on notices of litigiosity required improvement, and amendments 1 and 50 are designed to achieve this.

At present, clause 8(8), which deals with notices of litigiosity in relation to actions of rectification, merely requires the notice to give the names and designations of the parties to the application and the date when authority for service or citation was granted. This follows the existing provisions in section 159 and schedule RR of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1868 for notices of litigiosity relating to actions for reduction and adjudications. However, lawyers carrying out a search in relation to a transaction involving someone of the same name as a pursuer or defender in, for example, a reduction action already encounter difficulties in ascertaining whether the action affects their client's interest, especially where the name is a common one where only a business or agent's address is given. Even when the relevant party has correctly been identified, confusion may arise where he owns pieces of land other than the one affected by the action. While it will usually be possible for the seller of the land to prove the transaction in question is not struck at by the notice of litigiosity, this will involve more delay and expense. Previously these difficulties had been tolerable, but with the increase in number of entries in the register of inhibitions and adjudications, and the vastly increased volume of searches, the problem is becoming a severe one. Therefore, the amendments provide that notices of litigiosity, both under this Bill and the 1868 Act, shall also give a description of the land to which the summons or application mentioned in the notice relates.

It goes further than the point originally raised by the Opposition and I hope that they support the amendments. I am advised that the amendments enjoy the strong support of the Law Society for Scotland. What started as a minor point has now become a valuable improvement of Scottish law.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I am happy to say that this amendment enjoys the support of the Opposition.

AMENDMENTS OF MATRIMONIAL HOMES (FAMILY PROTECTION) (SCOTLAND) ACT 1981

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 12, line 39, leave out "(1)".

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 3, in page 12, line 40, after "couples)" insert "(a) in subsection (1)".

No. 4, in page 12, line 40, at end insert—

(b) in subsection (6), in the definition of "occupancy rights"

(i) in paragraph (a) for the words from "not" to the end there shall be substituted the words "to continue to occupy the house;" and

(ii) at the end there shall be inserted the words—

"and, without prejudice to the generality of these rights, includes the right to continue to occupy or, as the case may be, to enter and occupy the house together with any child residing with the cohabiting couple"."

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The definition of the occupancy rights of married couples in section 1 of the Amendments of Matrimonial Homes (Family Protection) (Scotland) Act 1981 is amended by clause 13(2) and 13(3) of the Bill. This group of amendments provide that the definition of the occupancy rights of cohabiting couples provided in section 18(6) of the 1981 Act is correspondingly amended. The amendments will make clear that a non-entitled partner's occupancy right is a right to occupy, including all rights normally inherent in the right to occupy, and is not merely a right not to be excluded, and also that the non-entitled partner's right to occupy the house includes the right to have with her any child residing with the cohabiting couple.

This point vexed the Committee, and concern was expressed by the Opposition and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). I hope that, without prejudice to the generality of the rights, the right to continue to occupy also allows for and includes the right to enter and occupy the house together with any child residing. I hope that this puts the point beyond doubt. Certainly it was not one of controversy for Members on either side of the Committee, but there was anxiety that we should make clear what rights were allowed for.

SMALL CLAIMS PROCEEDINGS

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 16, line 8, leave out from beginning to end of line 14, and insert—

"18.—(1) For subsection (2) of section 35 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1971 (summary causes) there shall be substituted the following subsection—

"(2) There shall be a form of summary cause process, to be known as a "small claim", which shall be used for the purposes of such descriptions of summary cause proceedings as are prescribed by the Lord Advocate by order"."

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendments:

No. 6, in page 16, line 20, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 8, in page 16, line 23, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 17, in page 17, line 16, leave out "proceedings" and insert "small claim"

No. 18, in page 17, line 18, leave out "proceedings" and insert "small claim"

No. 19, in page 17, line 19, leave out "proceedings" and insert "small claim"

No. 20, in page 17, line 20, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 21, in page 17, line 21, leave out "proceedings" and insert "small claim"

No. 22, in page 17, line 23, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 23, in page 17, line 25, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 24, in page 17, line 27, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 25, in page 17, line 30, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 26, in page 17, line 32, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

No. 28, in page 17, line 44, leave out "small claims proceedings" and insert "a small claim"

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The purpose of the first and main amendment of this group is to make clear that there will be a new procedure, within the existing summary cause procedure, which will be known as a "small claim". This procedure will be mandatory for all those proceedings which qualify as a "small claim". These cases will be prescribed in an order which will set out those descriptions of summary causes which are to be treated as small claims and their financial limit. Under a later amendment this order will be subject to affirmative resolution. Cases which fall outside those descriptions and above that financial limit will be dealt with under the present summary cause procedure. This amendment also replaces the term "small claims proceedings" with the more succinct "small claim".

The remaining amendments are consequential.

Although in the legislation the description of this new procedure was "small claims proceedings", even in Committee those who were involved, such as the Scottish Consumer Council and the Law Society, are already calling it "small claims" and for that reason it would seem sensible to agree to a change which follows a usage which has probably already become established.

Mr. Ewing: It always amazes me that we spend an hour or two in Committee trying to find a new description or a new procedure. The term "procedure" is commonly understood and, lo and behold, for this Bill we have found the new terms simply by dropping the word procedure. I am grateful to the Solicitor-General for accepting what was obvious to everyone else in Committee.

Lords amendment No. 6 made.

Lords amendment: No. 7, in page 16, line 20, at end insert—

"(4) An order under subsection (2) above shall be by statutory instrument but shall not be made unless a draft of it has been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament."

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 14 in page 17, line 3, leave out "made".

No. 15, in page 17, line 4, leave out from "instrument" to end of line 6 and insert

"but shall not be made unless a draft of it has been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.".

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The orders which the Lord Advocate will make under the new subsection (2) in section 35 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1971 and under subsection (4) of the new section 36B of the 1971 Act are at present subject to negative resolution procedure. These orders will set out the descriptions of summary cause proceedings to be dealt with as small claims, their financial limits, and the limits relating to awards of limited or no expenses. Lord Wilson of Langside, in Committee, proposed that instead affirmative resolution was appropriate for such orders. After consideration, the Government agreed that affirmative resolution procedure of a draft of the proposed orders was more appropriate in view of the general importance and interest of the subject matter of these orders.

Mr. Ewing: I left the burden of my remarks to this group of amendments because the definition and explanation of the limits that are to be embodied in the new small claims are important. In Committee and in the latter stages of the Bill's passage there has been substantial debate on the limits that are to be set. The small claims process can be introduced only when there are statutory instruments showing the limits that the Government intend to apply. When we questioned the Solicitor-General, he seemed hesitant about the timing of the introduction of the statutory instruments and the limits.

The limits of the small claims and the question of no damages and no expense are crucial to the introduction of the system. I hope that the Minister will give us some idea how early in the new Session the statutory instruments will be introduced as they are crucial to the implementation of the system.

I received an invitation, as no doubt did the Minister, from the Scottish Consumer Council to celebrate the introduction of small claims. That is a bit premature because it cannot be introduced until we know the limits. I hope that the Solicitor-General will be able to say something about that.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am tempted to embark upon some consideration about what might be the appropriate financial limits or the limits to be fixed in relation to limited or no expenses. In view of what I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept as a worthwhile concession in the direction that such matters should be subject to affirmative resolution, a more appropriate moment or consideration of such issues is in the event of the established financial limits proving unsatisfactory to hon. Members. I hope that they will not be unsatisfactory and it is better to leave the matter until the time that they are introduced.

I am not saying that there will be any marked delay in introducing them, but it would be daft to introduce a limit which eventually proved to be too low. I appreciate, and my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate appreciates, that there is a desire to see the limits fixed at a relatively high level. We have received a number of representations from some bodies which show that there could be problems if limits are fixed too high. It would be fair to say that there is concern that they should be fixed on the high side, but it would be wrong to tell the House that representations have gone all one way because that is not the case.

It is churlish of the hon. Gentleman to say that the invitation extended to him and to me to celebrate the introduction of the small claim is in some way premature. The Scottish Consumer Council clearly does not think so, and, after he has enjoyed its hospitality on Friday, I hope that he too will not think so.

Lords amendment: No. 9, in page 16, line 25, at end insert "or".

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment makes clear that paragraphs (a) and (b) in the new section 36A describe three different types of pursuers, each of whom is ineligible for the services of the sheriff clerk in the service of the small claims summons, as they are not acting in an individual capacity. The three categories are, first, a partnership; second, a body corporate, such as a company; and, third, a pursuer acting in a representative capacity, such as that of a trustee. All this amendment does is make it clear they are not entitled to those services.

Lords amendment: No. 12, in page 16, leave out lines 38 to 43 and insert

"to a party to a small claim—

(a) who being a defender—

(i) has not stated a defence; or

(ii) having stated a defence, has not proceeded with a defence, has not acted in good faith as to its merits; or

(b) on whose part there has been unreasonable conduct in relation to the proceedings or the claim".

5.15 pm

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment seeks to make clear the circumstances in which a party to a small claims action, particularly a defender, will lose the benefit of the special provisions relating to expenses whereby no, or a limited amount of, expenses may be awarded against an unsuccessful party. Where the benefit is lost, the normal rules for award of expenses in summary causes would apply. The wording takes account of criticisms made of the original wording by Lord Morton of Shuna.

Subsection (3) of new section 36B sets out the circumstances in which the normal rules for awarding expenses are to apply, first, in paragraph (a)(i) where the defender has offered no defence. This takes account of the fact that at present summary cause is used extensively for the routine collection of debts. It would be inequitable for the successful pursuer not to have expenses awarded to him in cases where there is no defence to a claim, since otherwise there would be a temptation for debtors not to pay their bills in the hope that the creditor would be discouraged from suing to recover the debt by the prospect of incurring expenses part or all of which could not be recovered.

The second circumstance is in paragraph (a)(ii) which preserves the existing provision whereby a defender is not to benefit if he states a case but proceeds no further with it. This is intended to prevent a defender lodging a skeletal or spurious defence simply to take advantage of the special rules on expenses. The third circumstance is in paragraph (a)(iii) which covers the possibility of the defender stating a defence and proceeding with it, but the defence itself is spurious and has clearly been presented in bad faith merely to take advantage of the special expenses provisions.

Lords amendment: No. 13, in page 17, line 1, leave out "(c)" and insert

"; nor do they apply".

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Paragraph (5) of new section 36B(3) excludes from the special expenses provisions any party, either pursuer or defender, who acted unreasonably either during the proceedings or in relation to the claim itself. This would cover cases where it was clear that there was no proper claim to bring to court, or where a party had been acting in a dilatory manner or in bad faith.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This amendment in clause 18(3)(b) is to make clear that the decisions of the sheriff relating to remits made under section 37(3)(a) of the 1971 Act, which are not to be capable of review, are those under subsection (2A), (2B) or (2C) of section 37(3) of the 1971 Act. The present drafting in the clause might imply that the decisions relating to remits may be made only where all three of these subsections are involved, which would not be the case.

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS ABOUT DETENTION OF CHILDREN

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This amendment deletes the change to section 42(3) of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 made by clause 25(1) (a). The effect of paragraph 25*(a)* is subsumed in paragraph 25*(b), and paragraph 25(a)* is therefore redundant.

Lords amendment: No. 31, in page 24, line 10, leave out "valuation" and insert "variation".

This is a drafting amendment to correct an error in the wording. The corrected wording ensures that, once the formula for valuing sheep stock at the end of a tenancy has been updated, the updated formula can be used only in new leases. It does this by tying the date of the lease to the date of the variation of the formula rather than to the date of the valuation.

Clause 39

FINES IN RESPECT OF DRUG OFFENCES

Lords amendment: No. 32, in page 32, line 24, after "made" insert "by the offender"

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 33, in page 32, line 25, leave out "the accused" and insert "he"

No. 35, in page 33, line 10, leave out "accused" and insert "offender"

Mr. MacKay: Amendments Nos. 32 and 33 meet a point raised by the noble and learned Lord Morton of Shuna in another place. They are intended to put it beyond doubt that in cases where an offender convicted of a drug trafficking crime is sentenced by virtue of clause 39 to a fine in addition to a term of imprisonment or detention, the court should bear in mind only the profits which the accused himself has made from the crime and not, for example, profits made by a co-accused.

As for amendment No. 35, new subsection 193B(5) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 as inserted by clause 39 as presently drafted contains a reference to the "accused". As this subsection relates to a person who has already been convicted, this reference is not strictly accurate. The subsection should instead refer to an "offender".

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I do not intend to detain the House for long. I welcome the minor clarification as a result of the efforts of another place on what can be taken into account in deciding where a fine is appropriate under clause 39. The Minister will know from our debates in Committee that we have some doubts about the lack of definition, and that there was some confusion. It was one of those occasions on which we had a change of Minister halfway through our considerations of the Bill, and there was a distinct difference of opinion, or emphasis, between the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) and the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) as to exactly what criteria the courts should apply. No doubt the courts will make up their own minds, as they so often do, irrespective of what may be said by either of the two junior Ministers at the Scottish Office.

We shall watch this matter with curiosity and interest. While we are all totally committed to the campaign to control drug trafficking, I am not as convinced as the Ministers seem to be that this legislation will make an important or particularly significant impact.

Lords amendment: No. 34, in page 32, line 28, leave out from "in" to "the" in line 30 and insert

"paragraphs (a) to (c) of subsection (4) or any offence mentioned in paragraphs (d) to (g) of that subsection where such latter offence involves a controlled drug as defined in section 2(1)(a) of"

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The purpose of this amendment is to extend the measures to be introduced by clause 39 to cover offences involving all categories of controlled drugs as defined in the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. In doing so it meets and expands upon an amendment tabled at Lords Committee stage by the noble and learned Lord Morton of Shuna, which sought to extend the provisions to include class B drugs. However, the present amendment extends the clause still further to cover all controlled drugs.

As it left this House, clause 39 provided that anyone convicted of a drug trafficking crime involving class A drugs was to be liable to be fined in addition to a custodial sentence unless it was considered inappropriate to do so.

[Mr. John MacKay]

It was originally decided that the new measures introduced by clause 39 should be restricted to class A drugs to be consistent with the measures in what is now the Controlled Drugs (Penalties) Act 1985, which increased the maximum penalty for drug trafficking offences involving class A drugs from 14 years to life imprisonment, and to reflect the especially pernicious nature of class A drugs.

However, the Government recognise that large profits can also be derived from other controlled drugs in classes B and C. For example, one of the class B drugs is cannabis and large profits can be made from it. Following further consideration, it has been decided to extend the scope of the existing provisions to cover all categories of controlled drugs.

No. 45, in clause 59, in page 41, line 7, at end insert—

"( ) Schedule (Transitional provisions) to this Act shall have effect for the purpose of making transitional provision."

No. 57, after schedule 2, insert the following new schedule—

"SCHEDULE

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Section 36

1. Sections 141A, 141B, 346A and 346B of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 do not apply in relation to a trial which has commenced before the coming into force of those sections; and, for the purpose of this paragraph, a trial shall be taken to commence—

(a) in the case of summary proceedings, when the oath is administered to the jury;

(b) in the case of summary proceedings, when the first witness is sworn.

Section 38

2. The amendment to section 120 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 effected by section 38 of this Act has no effect in relation to proceedings in which the complaint was served on the accused before the coming into force of section 38 of this Act.

Section 39

3. Section 193B of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 shall not affect the punishment for an offence committed before the coming into force of section 39 of this Act.

4. The amendments to section 407(1A) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 effected by section 40 of this Act have no effect in relation to fines imposed in respect of offences committed before the coming into force of section 40 of this Act."

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Clauses 36 and 38 change the rules on admissibility of evidence in court proceedings for sexual offences and vehicle licensing offences, while clauses 39 and 40 change the penalties which can be imposed for an offence in certain circumstances. Clearly it would be unacceptable for the rules of evidence to be changed during the course of a trial. Equally it would be unjust, and contrary to article 7 of the European Convention on Human rights, if the penalty for an offence could be retrospectively increased or an additional penalty imposed. The new schedule of transitional provisions therefore provides that clause 36 shall not apply to trials, and clause 38 shall not apply to proceedings, commenced before they come into force. Similarly, clauses 39 and 40 cannot change penalties for offences committed before they came into force. The new schedule is governed by clause 60, and as a consequential to the new schedule the existing transitional provision in clause 40(2) is deleted.

SUPERVISION OF CHILDREN RELEASED AFTER DETENTION

Lords amendment: No. 40, in page 36, line 8, after "terms" insert

(a) the Parole Board for Scotland so recommends; or

(b) it appears to him to be in the public interest to do so before consultation with the Board is practicable,"

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments.

No. 41, in page 36, line 11, at end insert—

"( ) The Secretary of State shall inform a person recalled under subsection (5) above of the reasons for his recall, so that the person may make representations in writing with respect to his recall to the Parole Board for Scotland; and the Board may, on receipt of such representations, require the Secretary of State to release him forthwith."

No. 42, in page 36, line 23, at end insert—

"(2) In section 12 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1963 (supervision of persons released from young offenders' institution)—

(a) in subsection (7) after the word "above", where first occurring, there shall be inserted ("and either—

(a) the Parole Board for Scotland so recommends; or

(b) it appears to him to be in the public interest to do so before consultation with the Board is practicable,");

(b) after that subsection there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(7A) The Secretary of State shall inform a person recalled under subsection (7) above of the reasons for his recall, so that the person may make representations in writing with respect to his recall to the Parole Board for Scotland; and the Board may, on receipt of such representations, require the Secretary of State to release him forthwith."; and

((c) in subsection (9)—

(i) for the words "that person" there shall be substituted the words "a person released under subsection (7A) above or this subsection"; and

(ii) after the word "under", where secondly occurring, there shall be inserted the words "subsection (7A) above or"."

Mr. MacKay: These amendments, which were prepared in response to points made in another place by Lord Morton of Shuna, seek to involve the Parole Board for Scotland in the recall procedure for children who have been released on supervision at the end of their sentence. The board is of course already involved, by virtue of section 206(5) and (6) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975, in those cases where release occurs before the end of sentence. These amendments provide for the board similarly to be involved in the case of children released at the end of sentence. The Secretary of State will thus recall children who have broken their supervision conditions only on the board's recommendation, or where he believes the public interest requires recall before it is practicable to consult the board. He must give reasons for the recall and the person recalled can make representations to the board. The board will have power on receiving such representations to order the Secretary of State to release the child immediately.

If we provide these safeguards for children released subject to supervision, it is only fair and consistent to provide similar safeguards for young offenders released under supervision under section 12 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1963. The amendments therefore provide for the board to be similarly involved in the procedure for the recall of these young offenders.

I would add that the board has similar functions already, under section 62 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, in relation to recall of prisoners or young offenders released on licence. These amendments are thus applying well-established machinery and ensuring consistency of procedure.

5.30 pm

Mr. Ewing: The Minister is right in saying that the amendments apply consistency of procedure, but they also widen the scope of the work of the parole board. At the moment its work is limited to young offenders and adult prisoners released on licence and subject to recall if they breach the licence conditions. I want to put down a marker with the Minister, because there is growing concern, which I share, about the length of time the parole board is taking to consider cases for parole—the main burden of its work. Evidence is emerging that the period is getting even longer.

I am strongly in favour of what the Minister has defined. If we put an additional burden on the parole board, we must will to it the means to carry out the duties imposed on it by the House. I hope that the Minister will keep that firmly in mind. The Minister stressed the point about immediacy. There is little point in saying to a child or a young offender at the end of his sentence that he can appeal to the parole board if the power of the parole board to release him immediately is frustrated because of lack of facilities to consider cases urgently. We warmly welcome the amendments.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I, too, welcome the amendment. Given the structure and constitutional resources of the parole board, is the Minister in a position to predict how long it would take to assess representations and make an instruction to the Secretary of State?

Mr. John MacKay: I could not give to the House the kind of answer requested by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). I will watch the matter carefully. In practice, only a few cases will be under consideration in each year because most offenders are released before the end of their sentence. Therefore, if they have to come before the parole board, they are doing so already, so to speak. There are only a few cases which come into the category of supervision after the end of their sentence. Having said that, I can assure the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) that I will watch the matter carefully.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 41 and 42 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 43, after clause 54, insert the following new clause—

"Power of Commissioner for Local Administration to investigate Scottish Special Housing Association and new town development corporations

"(1) In section 23 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1975 (authorities subject to investigation)—

(a) in subsection (1) there shall be added at the end the words—

"(g) the Scottish Special Housing Association;

(h) subject to subsection (2A) below, any development corporation established under an order made, or having effect as if made under the New Towns (Scotland) Act 1968 (in this section and section 24 of this Act referred to as a "new town development corporation");"; and

(b) after subsection (2) there shall be added the following subsection—

"(2A) The application of this Part of this Act to any new town development corporation by virtue of subsection (1)(h) above extends only to the Corporation's functions in relation to housing.".

(2) In section 24 of that Act (matters subject to investigation)—

(a) after subsection (3) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

(b) in subsection (4) after the word "concerned" there shall be inserted the words "or, in the case of the Scottish Special Housing Association or a new town development corporation, to the commissioner"."

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, we may take Lords amendment No. 59, in the Title, in line 4, after "children" insert

"the functions of the Commissioner for Local Administration;"

Mr. MacKay: The purpose of the new clause is to extend the jurisdiction of the Commissioner for Local Administration to the Scottish Special Housing

[Mr. MacKay]

Association and to the housing functions of the new town development corporations. Both the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), whom I see stirring in his seat, and Lord Morton of Shuna put forward similar proposals in the respective Committee stages. Those of us who were members of the Committee can recall the interesting debate on the subject.

My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I explained then that the Government were still considering various aspects of these innovations and undertook to bring forward, if at all possible, a new clause for inclusion at a later stage of the Bill's progress. This amendment fulfils that undertaking. Since this is a new subject, there is a consequential amendment to the Long Title of the Bill.

Mr. Dewar: This is indeed a small but welcome sign of flexibility by the Government. When Lord Cameron of Lochbroom came into our midst, I did not think that I would see him as the wind of change in person—a radical reformer storming the ramparts on behalf of open government. I guess—I base this purely on objective memories of the speeches made by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) in Committee—that the Lord Advocate has turned out to be a persuasive and formidable ally.

There is a long history to the amendment. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) who, many months ago, first tried to persuade the Government of the value of the change. I remember an exchange during the passage of the New Towns Act 1980 in which he attempted to persuade the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment that an extension of the powers of the local government ombudsman would be welcome and sensible. Understandably, he was told by the English Minister that it should be brought up when an appropriate occasion arose. Of course, an appropriate occasion arose with the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

I think that I am entitled to be vaguely curious as to why my amendment, which was straighforward, was formidably and persistently opposed by Ministers earlier. There was no suggestion that there was a minor drafting error that required a new version of the amendment; we were told that it was not on. When my noble Friend Lord Morton of Shuna introduced a similar amendment in another place, again it was opposed. Therefore, it came as something of a surprise to us when this popped up at a very late stage, the Report stage in another place, and has now found its way to us.

However, it is not for me to be ungracious. [Interruption.] The Solicitor-General for Scotland had better wait. Anticipating the coming Session, I think that we may have another law reform Bill, so he had better not encourage me too much at this stage.

This is a minor but useful change. There is no conceivable reason why the ombudsman's powers should not apply to housing complaints about the Scottish Special Housing Association and new town development corporations. That has been the view for a long time of myself and my colleagues. I know that it is also the view of the ombudsman, because he was courteous enough to explain that not just to Labour Members of Parliament but to the Members of Parliament from other parties. It is good that the little anomaly has been overcome with the introduction of this logical extension to the ombudsman's powers.

It leaves other ends which are perhaps more difficult of solution. The most outstanding, with which the Minister will be familiar, is the need, in the opinion of the ombudsman and of some other people, to consider problems of enforcement and the relationship between a local authority and the ombudsman in the implementation of his decision. In one or two worrying cases in recent years authorities have begged to differ from the ombudsman, and no action has followed a definitive ruling by that official. That is a much more prickly and sensitive area which will have to be considered soon.

The simple amendment before us is a matter for comment because it has taken so long and because it pops up at this stage as a Government amendment, unexplained and unheralded at earlier stages, despite the best efforts of Opposition Members. However, sinners repent. That may be overstating it. I am sure that the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute is spotless in—I was about to say his personal habits, but that might be misinterpreted. No doubt he is well intentioned in all things. I am glad that he has worked his way round to agreeing with me and my hon. Friends on this matter.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said that he was surprised that the amendment had come before the House, but the House is full of surprises, and the events of last week make me something of an authority on surprises.

I welcome the Lords amendment which comes a long time after the press release in which the Scottish Office said that it would be presenting the amendment. I note the pleasure on the face of the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who had a difficult time explaining to me why it was not appropriate to introduce such a provision into the New Towns Act 1980. However, we have finally got there, and I am glad that the Government accepted the advice of my noble Friend Lord Morton of Shuna.

The amendment will be particularly welcome in new towns where the development corporations are the largest housing authorities, and it will be very welcome in my constituency. I do not expect there to be many complaints to the ombudsman, because the housing authorities in the new towns are generally well run, but some people fall out of the system and the amendment will give tenants a right to go to the ombudsman. It is proper that tenants' rights should be extended.

Question put and agreed to.

PART II"

No. 49, in page 42, line 41, after "solicitor" insert "or incorporated practice".

No. 60, in the Title, line 4, after "children;" insert "solicitors;".

I have to inform the House that amendment No. 48 involves privilege.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The amendments are simple in essence and introduce a matter of some novelty in Scotland. They allow Scottish solicitors to incorporate themselves into companies under the Companies Acts, instead of being able to practise only as individuals or in partnership. Similar provision has already been made for English solicitors in the Administration of Justice Bill, and these amendments have the support of the Law Society of Scotland.

Hon. Members may wonder why such a simple change requires such lengthy amendments. It is because it seemed sensible to go through each provision of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980 making clear to what extent it is to apply to the new incorporated practices, and hon. Members will have noted that most of the amendments are variations on the theme after "solicitor", insert "or incorporated practice". We have also decided to proceed by amending the 1980 Act rather than producing separate, free standing provisions, so that almost all provisions on Scottish solicitors will be found in a single Act. The 1980 Act will, of course, be reprinted with the amendments in "Statutes in Force" and will also be easily available in its revised form to Scottish practitioners in the "Parliament House Book". Because of the length of the provisions, an amendment has been tabled to include a reference to solicitors in the Long Title.

The amendments provide that the incorporated practices, although not themselves solicitors, will in general be able to do the things which a solicitor can—other, of course, than such things as appearing in court which, by their nature, require an individual. The shareholders and directors of the incorporated practices will generally have to be practising solicitors and will, therefore, be persons who are subject to professional discipline as individuals. It will be an offence to pretend to be an incorporated practice as it is at present to pretend to be a qualified solicitor.

Incorporated practices will be subject to the same disciplinary procedures and rules, with some modification, on such matters as accounts, as are individual solicitors. They will also have to contribute to the Scottish solicitors guarantee fund and to be covered by idemnity insurance. There will therefore be no diminution in the protection afforded to solicitors' clients whose interests the Government and the Law Society agree must remain paramount.

The matter was not debated in detail in this House, either in Committee or on Report, but in view of the provisions that have already been made for England and Wales and of the considerable consideration that has already been given to the issue by the Law Society of Scotland, I hope that the amendments commend themselves to the House. It may seem odd to bring in such lengthy amendments at this stage, but this is a worthwhile opportunity to seize, and I know that it is much appreciated by the Law Society of Scotland.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 45 agreed to.

Clause 59

CITATION, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Lords amendment: No. 46, in page 41, line 9, after "54" insert

"(Amendments of certain controls in relation to the provision of pharmaceutical services)"

5.45 pm

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, we may take the following Lords amendments: No. 61, in the Title, line 5, leave out "and".

No. 62, in the Title, line 5, after "stocks" insert "and the control of pharmaceutical services".

Mr. MacKay: The amendments were consequential to a new clause on pharmaceutical services which was inserted in another place and subsequently deleted. The amendments therefore no longer serve any purpose and should also be deleted.

Mr. Ewing: I expected a much better and more extensive explanation from the Minister. Perhaps he had to drop his children off at school today and did not have time to get properly briefed on the background to this matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) thanked the Minister for something that had been inserted on Report in another place, and I am grateful to the other place for deleting on Report something that was inserted during the Committee stage there. This is a much more important matter than the Minister conveyed with his few brief and curt remarks. The background must be explained for the benefit of the House and, particularly, the public.

The Government have been negotiating a new contract with the pharmaceutical societies in England and Wales and in Scotland. As part of that, a deal has been struck that pharmacies that dispense fewer than 1,300 prescriptions a month will be subject to a buy-out arrangement which is to be jointly financed by the pharmaceutical societies and the Government. Such an arrangement would have had far-reaching effects in many parts of Scotland and may yet have such effects if the Government introduce primary legislation to implement a contract whose terms we have not yet seen in writing. There are 290 pharmacies in Scotland that dispense fewer than 1,300 prescriptions a month, and most of them are in rural areas.

The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is not present. I do not make a point of that, but it was interesting to note that the day after the Government suffered the defeat that led to the House being recommended to reject these amendments, the hon. Member tabled an early-day motion — which still stands on the Order Paper, supported by a fair number of Tory Members — congratulating the other place on the defeat that it had inflicted on the Govenment and the removal from the Bill of the provisions to which the Ministry briefly referred.

I must make it clear to the Minister that what happened in this case is not acceptable. The Department of Health and Social Security in England and Wales backed away from this proposal, on legal advice. The DHSS had intended to pursue the proposal, but it took legal advice and announced that it would deal with the matter through primary legislation. I took that to mean legislation in the next Session, though that was not stated specifically. The Scottish Office knows full well that the Department of Health and Social Security in England and Wales has been given legal advice against going ahead with it at this stage, and that the matter should be dealt with in primary legislation. Once again, the Scottish Office is prepared to subject the people of Scotland to something from which the Govenment have backed away in England and Wales. In passing, may I say that this seems to be revaluation all over again.

I have made inquiries and tried to obtain a copy of the negotiated contract, but I understand that it is not yet in written form. I am trying to be as gentle as I can with the Minister. But it is important that, as soon as the contract is in written form, copies are placed in the Library so that hon. Members on both sides of the House can see in detail what the contract means for pharmacists in their constituencies. The loss of 290 pharmacies in Scotland is not acceptable.

I am not saying that if and when the legislation is introduced Opposition Members will oppose it root and branch. Although I cannot speak for Conservative Members, I suspect that some will share our view that the legislation will be judged not with regard to the interests of the pharmacists, and even less the interests of the Government's spending programmes, but on its benefit or damage to patients or consumers.

For the past three years Scottish Members—this does not apply to English Members—have been receiving letters from constituents about proposals to close the school of pharmacy at Heriott Watt university. We have sent those letters to Ministers and received the standard reply—that it is part of the Govenment's attempt to cut public expenditure. I accept that answer, but what makes me so angry is the attempt to bring the measure in through the back door. There is a conspiracy between the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain and the Government to limit the number of students entering pharmacy school. That conspiracy has led to proposals for the closure of the school of pharmacy at Heriott Watt university. The contract extends throughout the United Kingdom.

There is a provision to set up pharmacy committees for each area health board in Scotland and for the equivalent in England and Wales. The pharmacy committees are to have extensive powers. The committee will consist of three local pharmacists, three members of the area health board and an independent chairman. How independent is independent? It is difficult to understand who could be an independent chairman in those circumstances. The committees will be all-powerful. The pharmacy committee will decide whether an application to receive a National Health Service contract is granted. The committee will also have the right to lay down conditions and standards that the pharmacist and, I suspect, his premises must meet before the contract is granted. There would be no appeal against the decision of the pharmacy committee.

I appreciate that you have been very tolerant with me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This issue is far too important to be allowed merely to slip past tonight without any comment on the background to the reasons why the Government have urged the House to disagree with the Lords amendments.

I am grateful for the opportunity to alert hon. Members on both sides of the House to what is going on. The legislation will not only affect Labour constituencies. I do not wish to be political about this, which will surprise the Minister, but the strong balance of probability is that it will have a greater and more devastating effect in Conservative constituencies—although it will affect my constituency. I wish to give a warning and fire a shot across the bows of the Minister and his colleagues. By the time this legislation is introduced, the Government will have been forgiven for dragging it in through the back door. It will be judged not on the back-door methods, but on the advantages or disadvantages to the patients who have their prescriptions dispensed at pharmacies.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) is right about the amendments having greater significance than might appear at first, but he is wrong in many other respects.

The amendments have a profound effect on the pharmaceutical business in the whole of the United Kingdom, not only in Scotland. The defeat last week in the other place is a defeat not for the Government but, sadly, for the community and the rural pharmacies. For the past two years the national pharmaceutical negotiating committee in England and Wales and its Scottish equivalent have been negotiating jointly with the Department of Health and Social Security, the Minister for Health and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland.

I am sure you will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that in the small hours of a winter morning, I raised the future of the community and rural pharmacists on an Adjournment debate. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East was not present to hear it. At that time, there was grave concern, as there still is, for the future of the community and rural pharmacists. Pharmacists felt that the negotiations for their future contract were unduly prolonged, that no end was in sight, and that as a result many association members were likely to suffer severe financial hardship and, in some cases, bankruptcy. The negotiations continue. Before the summer recess an agreement was reached between the two negotiating committees in Scotland and in England and Wales with the respective Ministers. A new contract was drawn up that was endorsed overwhelmingly by pharmacists. The contract covered not only remuneration but the service that pharmacists wish to provide to the community. It is absolutely correct to say that the provisions of the new contract would have had an effect on some pharmacists who issued fewer than 16,000 scrips a year. As the hon. Member for Falkirk, East rightly said, 300 pharmacists would undoubtedly have suffered severely financially. As I understand it, there was no suggestion of an enforced buy-out——.

Mr. Ewing rose——

Mr. Gale: I shall give way in a moment. However, provision was made for compensation for those who wished to leave the business. We know that some small pharmacists actively wished to take that opportunity.

6 pm

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Gentleman covered the point that I wanted to raise in an intervention. It relates to a difference of opinion between us. He speaks of "compensation" while I speak of a "buy-out". The documents from the Scottish Office and other sources make it clear that the buy-out was to be financed jointly by the Government and the Pharmaceutical Society. The Pharmaceutical Society would not have made the contribution expected of it unless its remaining members would receive substantial improvements in their remuneration and income.

Mr. Gale: Like the hon. Gentleman, I, too, must confess that I have not seen the contracts and, therefore, we are both working a little in the dark. However, the representatives of the negotiating committee have assured me that its members were satisfied with the options offered, and that there was to be no compulsion of any kind, but an offer of compensation for those who wished to take it. Nevertheless, I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

In addition to that arrangement, provision was made to deal with a problem which was and still is escalating—the leapfrogging of pharmacists closer to doctors' surgeries. That mitigates heavily against rural pharmacists—exactly those to whom the hon. Gentleman referred. When a pharmacist opens a shop he takes business from another pharmacist half a mile from the surgery, who in turn has a choice either to move closer to the surgery or to go to the wall. The poor rural pharmacist and genuine community pharmacist who provide extremely valuable service—as I serve a partly rural constituency I am well aware of this—are in dire trouble. They came to me mid-winter last year seeking assistance because their foreseeable future, if not destroyed, had been severely threatened by the failure to pass the legislation.

In addition to the agreements, the Department and the Scottish Office decided to introduce through the family practitioner committee and the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee in Scotland regulations to allow those respective committees to license, not existing, but new pharmacies, to put an end to leapfrogging and to prevent the further extension of what is rapidly becoming nonsense for the Health Service and those who seek to practise. This clause would have dealt with that.

A relevant side issue is that the result of the negotiations would have meant a £4 million a year saving for the Health Service. That sum was to be ploughed back into exactly the kind of further benefits which pharmacists wished, and still wish, to provide—counselling services, assistant pharmacists, and other benefits for the entire community, rural and otherwise. That agreement was reached for Scotland, England and Wales prior to the summer recess, and pharmacists confidently expected that those regulations would be in force by now.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Health took further legal advice and decided that he did not have the power to introduce the regulations. My hon. Friend the Scottish Minister with responsibility for health took advantage of the legislation before the House to have introduced in the other place a clause which would at least have given the Scottish Office the power to allow Scottish pharmacists to take the lead, as Scotland so often does. In that way the new contract would at least have been introduced in Scotland. However, because of the machinations of Lord Ross and others the baby has been thrown out with the bath water, and Scottish pharmacists will not only not get their new contract, which has been under negotiation for two years, as has the English and Welsh one, but will not even be brought into line with United Kingdom legislation. As I said, that is a defeat not for the Government, but for pharmacists and, therefore, the communities that they serve.

If my hon. Friend the Minister bumps into the Secretary of State for Social Services, will he mention that hon. Members who represent English and Welsh constituencies are worried at the outcome of the matter, and wait with bated breath to know what new moves will be taken to resolve the negotiating difficulties that pharmacists face? Will my hon. Friend be kind enough to tell the House tonight how he and his Department propose to resolve the problem for the Scottish pharmacists who have been badly let down in another place?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): In the narrow issue before the House I agree with the Minister that we should disagree with the Lords amendment. This is merely a tidying up matter, consequential on the main vote of the other place last week. I am informed that, apart from the Lord Advocate, no one was prepared to speak in favour of the clause.

The hon. Members for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) and for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) told the House why the step taken in the other place was correct. It appears that the Department decided that the matter could not be dealt with during the present Session, and probably required primary legislation, and that Scotland would be bounced into accepting the measure through a late amendment tabled in the other place. Although the matter is being debated this evening, it is not subject to the scrutiny that would have occurred if it had been part of the original Bill. It would have been extensively debated on Second Reading, in Committee—members of the Committee will agree that on the whole our debates were constructive—and on Report before reaching the other place.

The hon. Member for Thanet, North made it clear that the measures were important and wide-ranging. He accepted the principal criticism of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East that the proposals would hit hard pharmacists in sparsely populated rural areas such as the one I represent. In Orkney and Shetland, where there are no pharmacists for many miles, doctors must already dispense prescriptions. I continue to receive letters from those doctors. The limited list has put them in an invidious position, and they find that they must prescribe privately for patients when the drug that a patient requires is not on the list. Many doctors find that wholly unacceptable, and it goes against the grain. That serves to illustrate the important consequences which would have followed had the amendment not been defeated in another place. I believe that it is incumbent on the Minister to tell us what the Government's intentions are and not to leave us with his brief but correct opening remarks.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I shall be brief in speaking in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). The decision that was taken in another place will have far-reaching implications. I shall not deal with Scottish matters because I know that the problems are different there.

If the contract applied to the issuing of new NHS pharmacy contracts, the many small pharmacists who it is thought might lose their pharmacies would be reduced considerably. I know that in England and Wales the numbers are low—they amount to 30 or 40—but the figures that have been quoted for Scotland are extremely high. I accept that there may be special considerations when dealing with Scotland.

It would seem that the problem is acute. The negotiations that have taken place to try to secure agreement on the contracts were approved unanimously by the general council of the Pharmaceutical Society, which included Scottish interests. It is important that we achieve some resolution of what will be an ongoing problem throughout Scotland, England and Wales.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will give us some inkling of the Government's intentions. The objectives are to secure a better use of NHS resources and a properly controlled network of pharmacies throughout the country, and to overcome the difficulties which have developed over the years, especially with rural pharmacies. I hope that my hon. Friend will give a fuller explanation of the Government's legislative plans.

Mr. John MacKay: As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said, I did not say too much in my remarks when asking the House to disagree with the Lords in the amendment. The amendments that we are discussing are extremely small or limited and arise because I am not asking the House to agree with the amendments which were made in another place. Their Lordships chose not to accept the Government's invitation to amend these provisions in a certain way when the Bill was before them.

As there has been a discussion this evening, I shall say a few words about the amendments. My hon. Friends the Members for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) and for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) have a greater grasp of the issue than the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) has decided to keep his options open by telling the House that he was not exactly asking the Opposition to vote against any legislation that will be forthcoming.

The principle of the clause, which was defeated in another place, was to provide the Secretary of State for Scotland with the power to make regulations modifying the health boards' obligation to admit to their pharmaceutical lists every qualified person who asks for admission. That was what the clause provided. If that clause had been passed in another place, any regulations made under it would have been subject to the negative resolution procedure and thus the House would have been able to debate the regulations. I do not think that we were rushing through Parliament a proposal that would have prevented the regulations from being discussed. The regulations were the all-important factor.

I think that all Scottish Members received a letter from the Pharmaceutical General Council of Scotland dated 18 October. Colin Virden, the secretary, wrote:

"the proposals in the Minister's new contract package have the unanimous support of the Pharmaceutical General Council, which represents retail pharmacists throughout Scotland".

Equally, the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, Scottish Department, has confirmed support for the proposed legislation, which it considers would be greatly to the benefit of both the public and the profession in Scotland.

The new contract provides for compensation to small pharmacies which are uneconomical from the point of view of the contractor and from that of the Health Service which are run by pharmacists who wish to terminate their NHS contracts. There would have been provision for compensation. That could have been done, but in the absence of the clause that we invited those in another place to insert there was a danger that someone could have taken compensation and then applied for automatic readmission to the lists. I do not think that hon. Members, especially those on the Opposition Benches, who are for ever telling us how important the Health Service is, would want to see NHS resources used in that wasteful manner.

The Government and the profession have a shared commitment to providing an NHS pharmaceutical service where it best meets the needs of the patients. We believe that the proposed new contract arrangements would have done that. We contend that they would have ensured a network of pharmacies where necessary and in a way that would be desirable for patient care without extravagant use of NHS resources.

The greatest misconception was voiced by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, who said that all rural pharmacies would suffer. That is not so. There would be safeguards covering the financing of essential small pharmacies, which are mainly but not exclusively in rural areas, by means of special funding arrangements. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North said, the idea of making admission to the lists non-automatic was to prevent leapfrogging, which can affect adversely the small pharmacies about which many hon. Members are worried.

Mr. Ewing: I am sure that the Minister would not want to mislead the House. However, he is giving the impression that the arrangements for essential pharmacies are contained in the new contract without explaining that for a considerable time there have been arrangements to finance essential pharmacies through the essential pharmacy allowance. Those arrangements are to continue and they are not part of the new contract. No one should be under any misapprehension about that.

Mr. MacKay: I am not denying that. I did not imply that those arrangements did not exist. However, the accusation has been made that if the new contract came into being the protection of and help for small rural pharmacies would no longer exist. I am saying that that is not true. The financing of essential rural services would be continued by means of special funding arrangements.

My hon. Friends the Members for Thanet, North and for Exeter want to know what the Government intend to do in the situation in which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and I find ourselves. We remain fully committed to the recent agreements on a new NHS contract for community pharmacists. We intend to introduce at the earliest possible opportunity the legislation that is necessary to control entry to the pharmaceutical list. Any new legislation will cover the agreements reached in England and Wales and those in Scotland and Northern Ireland. I cannot predict when it will be possible to introduce such legislation.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 56, in page 48, line 32, at end insert—

"The Representation of the People Act 1985 (c. 50)

28B. In Schedule 4, in paragraph 61*(b)* (amendments of the Representation of the People Act 1983 relating to time limit for prosecutions) after the word "without" there shall be inserted the word "undue"."

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Amendment No. 56 corrects a mistake in paragraph 61*(b)* of schedule 4 to the Representation of the People Act 1985. Amendment No. 47 is consequential to that.

Section 61*(b)* substitutes a new subsection (2) in section 176 of the Representation of the People Act 1983. New section 176(2) refers, in its application to Scotland, to the execution of a warrant "without delay" instead of "without undue delay", which is the wording used in section 331 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 from which the new section is derived. The amendment converts the reference to "without undue delay" to be consistent with the wording in the 1975 Act.

Paragraph 61*(b)* of schedule 4 to the 1985 Act, as enacted, came into operation on 1 October 1985. The amendment to clause 59 of the Bill provides for this amendment to come into operation as soon as practicable after 1 October.

European Communities

6.25 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I beg to move,

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organization) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th July, be approved.

It may be for the convenience of the House if we consider also the following motion:

That the draft European Communities (Immunities and Privileges of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organization) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th July, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: If the House agrees, so be it.

Mr. Rifkind: The North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation—known as NASCO—was established by the convention for the conservation of salmon in the north Atlantic ocean. This convention was opened for signature at Reykjavik on 2 March 1982. NASCO's principal objective is to contribute to the conservation, restoration and rational management of salmon stocks in the north Atlantic, with the aid of the best available scientific information.

The establishment of the organisation was welcomed by the Government as a significant development in the management of salmon stocks in the high seas, thus having a beneficial effect on salmon stocks in our rivers. We have a strong interest in restricting as far as possible catches of salmon originating from our rivers, but caught in the waters of the Faroe islands and Greenland where they feed —the intercepting fisheries. We hope, therefore, that the convention, through NASCO, will enable these fisheries to be carefully managed and preserved.

The location of the headquarters in Edinburgh has also been welcomed by the Government—not only for the benefit to the local economy from holding meetings there, but as a recognition of the importance to the United Kingdom as a whole of salmon fishing as a commercial and recreational resource, particularly in remote areas like the Scottish Highlands where it is so important to the tourist industry. We believe, therefore, that it is highly appropriate that the headquarters is located in Scotland. It is, in fact, the first recognised international organisation to be based in Scotland.

The convention entered into force on 1 October 1983. The European Economic Community is a party to the convention and a member of the organisation, together with Canada, Denmark—in respect of Greenland and the Faroe Islands—Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and the United States. The headquarters agreement with the organisation, which implements article 3 of the convention, was signed on 26 April at its new offices in Rutland square, Edinburgh. It will enter into force when the necessary legislation is in place—in other words, once the two draft orders now under consideration have been made.

As the EC is a party to the convention, it is a Community treaty for the purposes of the European Communities Act 1972. It is proposed that the first draft order before the House—that relating to definition of treaties—should be made under section 1(3) of the 1972 Act specifying the headquarters agreement as a Community treaty. This order provides the basis for the second order — that relating to the immunities and privileges of NASCO provided by the headquarters agreement, which will be made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act. The headquarters agreement implements article 3 of the convention by specifying the privileges and immunities that NASCO is to enjoy in the United Kingdom. This agreement is similar to other headquarters agreements entered into by the United Kingdom with international organisations having their headquarters here—for example, the International Tin Council, the International Lead and Zinc Study Group and the Commonwealth Foundation.

Certain principal privileges and immunities will be conferred. NASCO will be provided with legal capacity, inviolability of archives, exemptions from taxes on income and capital gains, the same rating relief as is accorded to a diplomatic mission, relief from car tax and VAT and exemption from import duties.

The representatives of parties will be provided with immunity from suit and legal process in respect of their official acts and inviolability for official papers and documents.

Staff members of NASCO will be provided with immunity from suit and legal process in respect of their official acts, exemption from income tax, "first arrival" customs privileges and exemption from social security legislation.

Those privileges and immunities are conferred on a strict basis of functional necessity. The House will note that nobody is given the full immunity from jurisdiction of a diplomatic agent.

The House will wish to know that NASCO currently employs only two staff members and both are permanently resident in the United Kingdom.

I believe that NASCO will help protect a valuable and vulnerable resource. Even those among us who are not given to the solitary joys of river fishing will recognise that the disappearance of the salmon from our rivers would represent an irreparable loss; not only in terms of wildlife conservation, important though that is, but for the incalculable effect it would have on commercial salmon fisheries and on tourism in the remotest parts of the land where the local people rely even more heavily on incomes earned during the tourist season. If one takes away the fish, one takes away the fishermen and the incomes they generate.

I hope therefore that Members on both sides of the House will want to signal their welcome of NASCO to its Edinburgh home by supporting the draft orders before the House, and will join us in making a positive contribution to the preservation of a vulnerable resource.

6.30 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am grateful to the Minister of State for explaining the orders. Some of the comments that he made are right. The salmon species in Scotland is in almost as grave a situation as the Conservative party in Scotland. It is right that we should be doing something about endangered fish, but I am not so certain about the Conservative party.

The Minister said that there are only two members of staff working for NASCO, so that will not impose any particular burdens or difficulties on Edinburgh. Like the Minister of State, I represent a constituency in Lothian region and I welcome the fact that this interesting and useful international organisation has located its headquarters in Edinburgh. However, I suspect that the Minister of State will agree with me when I say that it is already difficult to find a parking place in Edinburgh without having to compete with people from Canada, Finland or the Faroes who might be able to claim immunity from parking regulations. Perhaps the Minister will say something about that.

I hope that we will be permitted to speak about the background to the work of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation. There is no doubt that stocks of migratory salmon in British rivers are critically low and declining at an alarming rate. Indeed, it is a pity that we are not talking about immunity for the salmon rather than immunity for the bureaucrats. It is worth while to encourage scientific study and international co-operation in order to protect that and other species, and that is NASCO's function. There is a risk of too much talk and too little action.

I live near the river Tweed and, although I have never attempted to catch a salmon, I am well placed to witness some of the action that takes place on the river, in the estuary and offshore. Perfectly legitimate net fisheries and sporting anglers are losing out year after year to large-scale illegal fishing. That is compounded on the river Tweed, if I might say so in the presence of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), by the extraordinary phenomenon of legal drift net fishery for salmon off Northumberland.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the hon. Gentleman declare any interest he might have in that area?

Mr. Home Robertson: I have never caught a fish in my life and I do not particularly want to.

Article 8 of the convention says that one of the functions of the North-East Atlantic Commission with regard to its area shall be "to propose regulatory measures for fishing in the area of fisheries jurisdiction of a member of salmon originating in the rivers of other Parties".

Salmon that originate in Scotland are being intercepted by what are at present legal fisheries off the north-east coast of England. That is causing problens, and I expect some hon. Members may wish to say something about it.

The Government are constantly saying that they will do something about those problems. A scheme was mooted some years ago for tagging salmon to ensure that only legitimately caught fish could be marketed in this country. We also have the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation, but while the Government fiddle, salmon stocks are being exterminated. I believe that the fundamental problem is that the current freshwater fisheries legislation is transparently unfair. It is designed to protect the vested interests of riparian owners and to exclude virtually everyone else. I recognise that it is not appropriate in the debate to raise the need for a complete overhaul of freshwater fisheries legislation, but that is what we ought to be doing sooner or later, preferably sooner.

We need a framework of freshwater and coastal fisheries management that will command respect from all concerned. It is absurd that so many rivers and estuaries are still under the authority of bodies that are effectively controlled by landowners.

The river that I know the best is the river Tweed and on the council of the commission that controls the fisheries on that river are two dukes, two earls, one viscount, one marquis, one baronet and four retired officers. It is a bit much to expect the ordinary punters of that neighbourhood to have a lot of time for an organisation that is composed of such members.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Since the hon. Gentleman claims to speak for the ordinary punter of the Tweed area, would it be fair to tell the House whether he has ever been a Tweed commissioner or whether he owns any land in the area?

Mr. Home Robertson: I own land in that area. On one occasion I was a representative commissioner for Berwickshire district council. I was elected to that post, so there is a distinction.

We wish the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation well. We warn the Government that they must heed the growing scientific evidence about the depletion of salmon stocks. We do not need much in the way of bureaucratic immunity, but we need genuine effective action to protect the salmon species.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I welcome the orders and the fact that NASCO is to be resident in Edinburgh. Like the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), I hope that we shall see action. The action will have to come from a combination of that organisation and the Government. It is depressing that we have made no more progress to assist the survival of the wild salmon over recent years. The words "wild salmon" have crept into our vocabulary since the introduction of farmed salmon, which have been a spectacular success, particularly on the west coast of Scotland.

Tonight we are interested in conservation, the survival at sea of the migratory salmon and its survival in United Kingdom rivers. If Britain does not set an example, we cannot expect others to take the vital steps that are required internationally. The economy of Scotland and of the areas of England and Wales that have salmon rivers is most concerned about the progress made by that organisation. The rural economy surrounding those rivers is affected , whether it is a question of hotels, shops, travel and tourism or the local authority rates, because the valuation in salmon fishing areas is extremely high, particularly in Scotland. Therefore, the success of salmon fishing is of crucial importance. Employment, the ghillies, other aspects of river management, the construction of boats, angling equipment and clothes are all most important.

The consumption of salmon is being maintained only because of the great success of farmed fish. I believe that we can now compete with Norway and other parts of the world. If we did not have farmed salmon, salmon from the wild would be extremely scarce because of the overkill of our resources, not by rod but certainly by net. Like the hon. Member for East Lothian, I would not claim to be an active fisherman, but we must look seriously in the world of conservation at drift nets and other methods of fishing in the sea, bearing in mind the migratory nature of the life of a salmon.

Drift nets, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned, are banned in Scotland, but not in England and Wales. There is exceptional confusion in the Solway area, close to the national boundary between England and Scotland. The area of navigable water is relatively small and there are continual arguments as to the side of the border on which the boats are operating.

[Sir Hector Monro]

A crucial decision must be made with regard to the Northumberland coast. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will probably speak about that later. I know that it is an old, traditional fishery. Everything would be fine if the people in the area were using the old, traditional methods of catching, with relatively few boats and old-style nets. However, today there is a modern fleet. I was told in July, in answer to a parliamentary question, that there were 121 licences issued by the Northumberland water authority. In the 1950s the average catch was a little over 2,000 fish a year. Last year, 77,200 fish were caught. Therefore, there has been a dramatic increase in the number of salmon caught off the Northumberland coast. It is having a dramatic impact on the number of salmon returning to the Scottish rivers. If they do not return, eventually we shall have no stock.

I am a member of the Nature Conservancy Council. If the council had responsibility for salmon, I am sure that we would be considering it as an endangered species. We consider the life cycle of birds and other mammals and we know how serious the position will be if we do not conserve what we have.

I am glad that the new organisation has been set up in Edinburgh, but most of us are aware that all true wildlife lives a precarious existence. There are limits to what we can take from the wild unless sufficient steps are taken to ensure conservation.

It is obvious that drift netting is the main danger. We have to deal with the problem in relation also to the Greenland fisheries and particularly the Faroes. In addition, we must have consultation with our friends in Ireland about their activities off the Donegal coast.

As I said earlier, we must put our own house in order. We have to look closely at stake netting and also at the fixed engines. They are important and operate legitimately around our coast but we must, as conservationists, ensure that there is no overkill.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): With regard to the question of conserving a precarious species, is it not the fact that the danger presented by the English drift net fishermen pales into insignificance when compared with the activities of the Faroese and the Greenland fishermen?

Sir Hector Monro: I know that the hon. Gentleman has great expertise in fishing and I will accept that what he says as true, particularly with regard to developments in the Faroes in the past 10 years. It has been very significant and it must be looked at in international negotiation.

I welcome the inshore fishing regulations that were introduced by the Government in the summer. While not affecting salmon, they prevent mobile gear from sweeping into the bays and estuaries of Scotland and damaging our salmon fishing.

I am glad that the Government have looked seriously at the problems of salmon poaching, salmon sales and tagging. We must try to resolve those problems as soon as possible. Fishery protection has been stepped up by the introduction of fishery protection vessels, and by the purchase of an aircraft in the past year. It has been very effective in dealing with salmon fishing. I pay tribute to our district boards for their part in salmon conservation and for the employment they provide for the water bailiffs.

I reiterate that, if we are to take salmon conservation seriously, we must look at the problem of drift netting and be prepared to take action. We must also be prepared to negotiate with the Faroese and the Greenland Government about their activities in the Atlantic. I hope that the Minister will comment on that matter in his reply.

6.45 pm

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): Although I welcome the establishment on the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation in Edinburgh, I hope that the Government will see fit, after it has been established, to take some positive steps, as a matter of urgency, to reverse the decline in our salmon stocks.

The two orders before the House are particularly concerned with salmon conservation. Although a number of countries that fish for salmon on the high seas have agreed to quotas, and in some instances have agreed reductions, so far the United Kingdom has not responded in any positive way and is still allowing indiscriminate, wholesale netting, legally and illegally, of the shoals of salmon returning to the United Kingdom rivers.

There is no doubt that if the United Kingdom does not act soon, our NASCO partners will call for action, or else there may be retaliation by the salmon quota countries, which could abolish their quotas, slaughter stocks and ignore conservation, as a retaliation to our unseemly and selfish attitude to salmon conservation.

As a result, the Atlantic salmon will go unprotected, its life span as a species will be seriously jeopardised, and Scotland, as well as to a lesser extent England and Wales, will suffer a disastrous decline in salmon searching for their spawning rivers. The economic and financial consequences of such action to sea fishermen in Scotland, to rod anglers and to tourism will be very serious. It could be long-lasting, and perhaps the salmon industry and the related industries would never recover.

On salmon conservation, at least three major steps should be taken. Drift netting off the north-east coast should cease. Nylon monofilament gill nets should be banned and a more serious attitude adopted by the Government, fishery boards, water authorities, magistrates and courts to the salmon poachers.

All the major organisations, the Atlantic Salmon Trust, trout and salmon and other conservation associations, have called unanimously for the end of drift netting. It was accomplished along the Scottish coast many years ago, but there is no such restriction along the Yorkshire and Northumberland coastline. It would mean restricting and possibly ending the licensing of fishing vessels using the drift netting technique, and thereby allowing the returning salmon to find their own spawning grounds.

According to the Atlantic Salmon Trust, the catches declared by the Northumbria and Yorkshire authorities are in the region of 60,000 salmon annually. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food estimated that 95 per cent. of them are intercepted in their passage to the estuaries of eastern Scotland.

Mr. Beith: Did not the same Ministry report that the effect that that fishing is supposed to have on the Scottish rivers is not more than 7·5 per cent.? Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that he is talking about the livelihood of a great many fishermen and their families, whose fathers and grandfathers before them were also fishermen?

Mr. Mason: The hon. Gentleman has his point of view, and those Conservative Members in the north-east who want to register that point of view today are obviously entitled to do so, but if we are to take salmon conservation seriously, the problem of drift netting has to be tackled.

In The Times not long ago the chairman of the River Tweed Commissioners said:

"It is quite scandalous that the Government continues to turn a blind eye to this slaughter of returning Scottish salmon at a time when there is mounting concern over diminishing stocks."

The chairman went on to say:

"It is galling that English nets can intercept salmon only a few miles from our rivermouth, using these deadly drift netting techniques which were outlawed in Scotland years ago, and still contribute absolutely nothing to the management costs of the parent river".

According to statistics prepared by the British Field Sports Society, the north-east drift net fishery has considerably increased its catches in recent years. Between 1950 and 1959 about 2,000 fish were taken per year. Between 1970 and 1979 nearly 5,000 fish were caught per year. But in 1984 alone 7,700 fish were taken. Yet in Scotland the annual sea catch returns show that between 1970 and 1979 about 400,000 fish were taken, while in 1984 this had dropped to 280,000. So there is no doubt that this interceptory drift netting is having a calamitous effect on salmon stocks, on conservation and on legal salmon fishing off Scotland.

America and Canada have already placed restrictions on their catches. Greenland's salmon quota has been further reduced. Unless they see, as a result of NASCO being formed, the United Kingdom being subjected to a more common objective by the salmon states to conserve, they may have to apply pressure on the United Kingdom to take salmon conservation more seriously.

The Government must take steps to ban the use of this cruel and deadly nylon monofilament gill net. When I questioned the Minister of Agriculture in December 1983 about a ban, he stated that our fishery scientists were conducting research into the effects of using monofilament nets. I do not know with what results, but it has not led to a ban.

Some research has been done elsewhere. In British Columbia a report on a test which resulted in these nets being banned said:

"It has been established that mono-filament nets will, under certain conditions, out-fish all other regular gill nets to a degree where serious management of resources would follow . . . widespread adoption of the gear".

Some idea of the deadly efficiency of these nets was shown in an experiment in the river inlet fishery. In one week, when the average catch of all ordinary gill net boats was 410, two fishermen using complete monofilament nets took 1,100 and 1,546 fish respectively. Hence the imposition of the ban. Not only is it a deadly piece of equipment, it is cruel too, causing considerable damage to escaping fish which drown as a result of gill injuries, or become diseased and then pollute the rivers. Broken nylon monofilament gill nets become ghost nets hanging in the seas and river estuaries, killing fish slowly as they hang from their gills. Because these nets do not rot like hemp ones, they go on killing and injuring fish, seals and sea birds. Gannets and sea-diving birds have no chance of seeing them because of their invisibility under water.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the World Wildlife Organisation are adamant, as are the Salmon and Trout Association and the Atlantic Salmon Trust, that these nets should be banned. Their use is a form of cruel mass slaughter at sea of one of our finest fish species, the survival of which is undoubtedly being threatened.

What are the Government doing to curb the mass growth of salmon poaching to help conserve the salmon? It is now no longer the odd man in the village taking one to sell for a couple of pints; it is highly organised, with gangs poaching on a large scale, intimidating bailiffs, wrecking their boats, and having a range of outlets for their ill-gotten gains. Using gas, cyanide and nets, they are emptying our estuaries and rivers of countless salmon.

Every salmon river in the United Kingdom reports an increase in the discovery of broken illegal nets year after year. This includes the Scottish coastline too. A special article in The Scotsman said:

"It is no big secret that motor boats from Peterhead and Fraserburgh are to be seen returning at night with their lights off and weighed down with dead salmon, destined to end up remarkably quickly on slabs at Billingsgate. They too, use monofilament gill nets but, unlike England, there is no right here to drift net for salmon off the coast. Peterhead Police say, 'It seems to be increasing and it seems to be a situation which is getting out of hand.'"

Questioning Lord Belstead in another place in July 1983, Lord Chelwood said:

"Is my noble friend further aware that, as proof of how serious the decline in Atlantic salmon seems to be, figures seem to show that licensed netsmen in Scotland in the last decade have seen the tonnage caught decline by nearly 50 per cent.? Is this not a really serious matter? . . . Are we not prepared to face up to it?"

Lord Belstead replied:

"My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble friend Lord Chelwood that there is undoubtedly evidence of illegal catching of salmon and that it is on a substantial scale. I can assure my noble friend that the Government are well aware of the need for prompt action."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 July 1983; Vol. 443, c. 1368.]

Prompt action? What action? The Government started a consultative review, a review of fisheries in England and Wales, in July 1981. Thereafter, a salmon sales group was established and that reported in July 1983. Its report was entitled, "Salmon Conservation—A New Approach." It recommended a salmon-tagging scheme to curb poaching. The report stated:

"Illegal fishing for salmon and trout has reached epidemic proportions in England and Wales. Impossible to quantify as to extent or effect, reliable, experienced opinion nevertheless holds that in some areas illegal catches regularly exceed the legal and threaten to destroy the resource."

Over four years ago, the review began. Over two years ago a salmon-tagging scheme was recommended by a team of specialists. As yet we have made no progress. Rod and line anglers and fly fishers are incensed. Tourist returns on fishing in Scotland are on the decline. Fly fishers, of course, have long distances to travel and expensive journeys, and it is still costly on most rivers, but there are fewer and fewer catches and so fewer return to Scotland to catch a salmon with rod and line.

All who are interested in salmon conservation should ponder what is being lost because there is a case to be made for the promotion of rod fishing at the expense of restricting netting, but especially for recognising that the legal sea netters are not getting the returns that they would like and the illegal ones are not spreading their returns in Scotland or creating much allied industry with their operations. Rod fishermen are also incensed that netsmen contribute so little to conservation and restocking when they take so large a portion of the catch.

A recent survey put the value of the salmon catch on Scottish rivers at £2·6 million a year. Then there are the wages of bailiffs and ghillies, the employment generated in legal netting, in hotels, tackle manufacturers and shops, boat building and hirers, smoking businesses, food processing and fishing holiday sales—all worth scores of millions of pounds to Scotland. That is money often going into otherwise impoverished rural communities in the form of jobs. All is at risk unless something is done to cut back this alarming growth of salmon poaching. Those in Scotland who oppose the salmon-tagging scheme are cutting off their noses to spite their faces.

Another factor that may well bedevil the sea salmon netters is the growth of salmon fish farming. As these fish farms increase in numbers and inland farmed salmon multiply with increased annual production, prices for salmon will tumble. Sea netting may not be worth while. The salmon will then get back up the river and the rod and line angler will benefit. So will all those multifarious activities connected with rod and line salmon fishing. Scotland's tourist industry could benefit enormously and the fly fisher will come back into his own.

I end as I began. When we are fully participating in the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation we shall have to say clearly to all its members that we take salmon conservation seriously and that we shall at least curtail the use of the drift net, abolish the use of the nylon monofilament net and introduce measures to curb the activities of those criminals who are poaching the seas and rivers of salmon.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I do not wish to keep the House long because the admirable speech of the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) has covered much of the ground that I should have covered. He mentioned one point on which I must correct him. He is being exceptionally optimistic if he supposes that the spread of fish farming and the increase in the numbers of farmed salmon will have the effect that he imagines. There is no evidence to suggest that there is the connection that he sought to draw. Many of us hoped that there might be, but I am afraid that experience has shown that it is an illusion. There will still be the poacher looking for stolen fish, however many farmed fish may reach the market. The House can unfortunately draw no comfort from the point put forward by the right hon. Gentleman.

I should declare an interest. I am chairman of the British Field Sports Society's fishery committee, and a colleague of my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir C. Johnson Smith) on the Salmon and Trout Association Council, and I am involved with the Anglers' Co-operative Association, as is more than one Opposition Member. I am a salmon fisherman. I own a small stretch of river in Wales. During the past five years I have caught the grand total of two fish in it, but not for want of trying. I have also been lucky enough to catch a few fish on other stretches of water.

I am especially glad to see not just my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, but sitting beside him my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, who has been known to hold a rod in his hand from time to time. It is also especially gratifying for the House to have the company, albeit practically silent, of my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) who is Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who has a great deal to do with this issue. His predecessor, who has now gone to a harder job, was closely involved with some of the discussions about salmon conservation which have been taking place over the past couple of years.

If the gentlemen from the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation come to Edinburgh and if the other members of that organisation are to visit Edinburgh, apart from the pleasures of so doing, they may well ask themselves what type of salmon conservation policy their host country has. It may not be easy for them to find the answer if we rely on what we have now, because there is no doubt that the salmon that breed in British waters face the most appalling array of threats to their survival, not all of which have been listed in the debate. We have heard some mention, not unnaturally, of the north-east drift net fishery. The right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central quoted some figures, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro).

It is significant that the average declared catch from the north-east drift net fishery — anyone who knows anything about that fishery knows there is also a great deal of undeclared catch—between 1970 and 1979 equalled one ninth of the total catch in all Scottish waters, whereas in 1984 the overall declared catch was one quarter of the total catch in all Scottish waters, including all rivers and estuaries.

Complacent as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) may be about those figures, and anxious though he may be to defend his constituency interest, he cannot brush aside, in the way he sought, the inexorable trend that they show towards the extinction of salmon in some east coast Scottish rivers.

Mr. Beith: Why does the hon. Gentleman assume that there is a substantial undeclared catch from the sea fishery but no undeclared catch from the river fishery?

Mr. Onslow: Because it is much easier for someone fishing the north-east drift net fishery to transfer his catch at night to a Dutch or German trawler to be taken to the continent and sold there. If the hon. Gentleman is not aware that that type of thing happens, he should perhaps make some further inquiries in his area. It is much harder to quantify the poached catch from Scottish rivers, but all the evidence shows that there is much less fish there to start with. The hon. Gentleman could usefully do a little more research on that matter.

The threat to the salmon is not confined to Scottish east coast rivers. There is a similar threat on the north-west coast of Scotland. I have a letter written by someone from Sutherland referring to the illegal inshore and offshore netting that goes on there. He says:

"We believe this to be particularly bad on the North West coast. Once the legal nets come off, then practically every crofter or small boat owner is out somewhere with a nylon net."

If we go round the coast, we come to the estuaries of the rivers Dee and Clwyd. There is an interesting report, dating from 1982, which describes how the poachers work the Dee estuary. It describes how the

"so-called sea fishermen do catch and take considerable numbers of salmon during the course of a season in addition to their normal catches of sea fish. They simply adjust their activities to the fish that are most abundant at the time and this includes salmon and just by watching the successes or otherwise of the legitimate salmon trammel netsmen can quickly assess the run of fish taking place. They can, if they wish, move into the productive zone of the low water channel pushing out the licensed men and then block the channel completely. There is no fear of retaliation from the licensed salmon netsmen as they are considerably outnumbered and the bailiffs can do little as the practice is perfectly lawful until attempts are made to bring any catch ashore."

I have a letter dated August 1985 from a Dee water bailiff in which he talks about illegal fishing. He says:

"this is the real problem, which has escalated dramatically over the five years to such an extent now that I am physically and mentally exhausted. I don't know which way to turn and am seriously thinking of quitting after fourteen years service, because I cannot take any more aggravation, abuse and seeing fish killed and not have any authority to do anything about it. There must be a change in byelaws, and it must come soon. This river to me is dying. This is the worst I have seen on it for migratory fish, and it's been sliding for the last three years. This is the problem . . . and it is causing a breakdown of morals and laws within the river system, that if some form of check is not brought in then it will be out of hand, because its just like having a supermarket and leaving all the doors open."

If we go further round the coast, we reach the Torridge, which is a river in Devon that I have fished for over 20 years. I have a report from one of the local angling organisations, which states:

"In 1982 1,000 Salmon and 3,000 Sea Trout were taken illegally in the estuary of the Taw and Torridge. There was a declared catch of 22 netsmen of 1,394 Salmon and 3,576 Sea Trout. 1982 Rod catch of the Torridge was 46 Salmon, and 60 Sea Trout."

On that estuary, unless there is enough rain to bring the river down in flood and so make it possible for the fish to run, they wash up beyond Bideford and down again. The netsmen who are working the banks of the Torridge simply scoop up the fish without any restraint or control. It is hardly surprising that most people who know anything about that river regarded it at the beginning of this year as having virtually ceased to be a salmon river.

We could go on round the coast, but perhaps I can rest with the threats that the salmon face in the estuary. The threat does not come just from the poachers. The Torridge estuary has a bad record of pollution caused by inadequate sewage works. There are other estuaries with similar problems where a great slug of poisoned water washes up and down with the tide and makes it impossible for the salmon to get through to the rivers and live.

But when salmon get through to the rivers, what do they find? They find the poachers there as well. We have heard tonight of the threat on the river Wye. There has been something like open warfare on the lower Wye where wires have been stretched across the river to catch the bailiffs' boats. Stones have been dropped from bridges. Bailiffs are rightly afraid to go around singly, unless they have a large dog. The Bridport gang, the Monmouth boys and all the other gangs of poachers mentioned by the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central know that part of the river well. They know where the fish are and will steal them given half the chance. The task of the water bailiffs on the Wye can be very daunting.

On the river Esk in Yorkshire, which is nearer to the right hon. Gentleman's part of the country, the poachers have won the battle. They will stone a legitimate angler to get him off the water so that they can poach.

The situation is not quite the same on the river Dovey in Wales, but poachers have come from Birmingham and Manchester, poisoned the river and scooped up all the fish. Fortunately, in one case they were caught and received severe sentences. We must not ignore that aspect of the fight.

Pollution is an important factor. It would be a mistake to ignore the fact that water extraction—pumping water out of the river for irrigation, as farmers increasingly do these days — works against the chances of salmon survival because it lowers river levels to a point where they cannot survive.

Water quality is also affected by run-off from the spreading of fertilisers on riverside fields. That also makes it impossible for salmon parr, salmon smolts and mature salmon to survive in the river.

Land drainage, which is still heavily subsidised, has the effect of turning rivers into drains and lowering their levels through the years of drought such as we experienced last year and the year before.

Forestry is another source of drainage. It is a great promoter of acidification because of its effects on run-off. Indeed, it is probably a more serious contributor to acidification of our rivers than the so-called acid rain.

Finally, there are the pests — the mink, the goosanders and the seals. Seals arouse conflicting emotions in people who do not have the interests of salmon at heart. The Government seem at present to be relying on a document produced by the sea mammals research unit. That paper is based largely on research undertaken, curiously enough, at the kind of place where one would not have found many salmon for the seals to feed on at that time of the year. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley has taken a close interest in the problem, and I hope that he will have the opportunity to say and do something about it on another occasion.

Against that background, it may be thought odd that I should also cavil at the absence of a quota on our own catches of salmon. Certainly it is not worthy that there is no quota imposed by our Government on the United Kingdom salmon catch. We are the largest producer of salmon in the European Community. The Greenlanders and the Faroese wonder why they should suffer under salmon quotas when we, as the largest producer country, cannot get round to imposing a quota on our own catch. The pressure for the acceptance of a quota will mount, and so it should, but the species must first survive for a quota to become a really effective defence.

I agree that we must have action by the Government, but I disagree with the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central that it is reasonable to suppose that a salmon-tagging scheme would prove as effective a defence here as it may have proved in Canada. In fact, I believe that the Canadians are having second thoughts about it. The French, however, are considering the possibility of introducing such a scheme, and it certainly has theoretical attractions. The difficulty is how to implement it in practice without creating a back door to the black market, which is the very thing that we are trying to prevent. How would the tags be controlled? How can poachers be prevented from obtaining tags? How will imports be controlled? How will fish from fish farms be dealt with? It would be very difficult for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to propose legislation to implement such measures in so convincing a way that the House would pass it without challenge. I am sorry to have to say that, because I know that for the past two years the Department has honestly and genuinely been trying to see whether it could make a salmon-tagging scheme look convincing, and I and others have done all that we can to help.

There is, however, an alternative which I believe would have an equally good effect but be much less cumbersome to administer. It is to reverse the onus of proof and to provide that anyone having a salmon in his possession must show legal title to it—a licence or permit to catch salmon, or a receipt to prove his title, whether the salmon be in a hotel deep freeze or in a council house freezer. Anyone who can show legal possession will have no cause to fear. Only people who cannot establish that legal entitlement will face further inquiries and possible prosecution.

It has been a cherished principle of our law that the onus of proof should not be reversed without good cause, but in recent years there have been two examples of such a reversal. The first is in the Deer Acts. Secondly, under the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act anyone sending dogs underground is required to show that he is not digging for badgers. Personally, I do not take exception to that. I believe that the onus of proof could be transferred in the same way in this case. I hope that such provision will be foreshadowed in the Queen's Speech so that the poacher can be cut off from the market for stolen fish. I believe that that should be a priority.

Something must also be done about the north-east drift net fishery—a problem which is confined to part of the United Kingdom salmon conservation issue. I do not agree that it should be stamped out entirely and at once, as some hon. Members wish, but I believe that it is reasonable to provide that the number of endorsees should be severely restricted and that the right to operate a net should apply only when the licensee is in the boat operating the net. That would have a powerful effect. I should also like use of the monofilament net in daylight to be completely outlawed. That, too, would have a powerful and interesting self-policing effect on the use of a device which it may prove harder to stamp out in English than in Scottish waters.

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): Insistence that the owner of the licence should be in the boat with the drift net might put a considerable number of people out of work if the owner were temporarily unable to go out with the boat due to illness or some other cause. That problem would have to be faced.

Mr. Onslow: I accept that it could put a number of people out of that line of employment. Whether it would put them out of work altogether is another matter. If that type of fishery is restricted, it is inevitable that some people will be denied that occupation. In that context, my hon. Friend might reflect on the number of ghillies and others on Scottish rivers who are currently being put out of work by the north-east drift net fishery.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): A number of ghillies in my constituency have been given notice this year that their jobs are to disappear.

Mr. Onslow: If the income of an estate is diminished because it can no longer attract fishermen from England, Scotland, Wales, France, or wherever, to pay the traditional fishing rent because there are no fish to be caught, the ghillies' jobs will inevitably be at risk. No one is more aware of that than the unfortunate ghillies. I believe the river Tay never ran down to summer level at all this year, although that was purely due to the weather. My hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) should bear in mind that his drift net fishermen can fish the sea throughout their limited season, but that the possibility of catching fish in rivers depends on the rivers being in order. I believe most salmon anglers in this country are quite prepared to face the consequence of a shift in employment from south of the border to the north. It is not difficult to imagine that for every job that might be lost because the licensee had to be on a boat which would be drift-netting off Northumberland, four or five jobs would be created in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and elsewhere in Scotland.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Does my hon. Friend agree that we must bear in mind the importance of the employment of extra ghillies and the consequent opportunities for the whole of the Scottish industry?

Mr. Onslow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North is well placed, as he represents an area where all this happens. It is no good promoting Scottish rivers for salmon fishing if the salmon have already been swept up in the North sea's drift net fisheries. This is an important subject because of the employment opportunities that the salmon fishing industry can provide in areas where they are sorely needed, and for the conservation and protection of a scarce species from which many of us have drawn great pleasure, and which many of us enjoy watching as well as fishing for. Not every salmon angler wants to kill every fish he sees or catches —he wants to see fish; he wants to know they are there. What he does when he catches them is up to him. A chance must be a fine thing, and we badly need a chance for the salmon to survive.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I also welcome the agreement and creation of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation. As a Scot, I welcome the fact that its headquarters will be in Edinburgh. Several hon. Members have emphasised the importance of conservation measures, especially with a view to getting more fish going up our rivers. Several hon. Members, in particular the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason), have mentioned the importance of salmon fishing to the local economies of many parts of Scotland, its importance to the tourist industry and the jobs that might be created directly and indirectly. The North sea drift net fishermen seem to be the Aunt Sally of the evening, and, as this debate can run for another four hours and eight minutes, if my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) manages to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will have something to say on this important matter.

We are all sensitive about jobs in our own communities, but I hope that none of us is so bold or brash as to say, "Jobs in my community at the expense of jobs in someone else's community".

We are talking about fishing which has gone on since time immemorial. There was a vast increase in drift net salmon fishing in the 1960s and a form of licensing was introduced. It may be that further conservation measures will be needed, and licensing is often a means of reconciling conflicting interests. However, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) last week in a Standing Committee lectured me on inshore Scottish fishing and the need for scientific evidence before conservation measures are taken. The Government will not proceed with such measures unless they have scientific evidence.

Perhaps the Minister will state what scientific evidence the Government have on this matter, or whether they are commissioning any such evidence. One cannot help but see the obvious connection between drift netting in the north-east of England and its immediate impact on the river Tweed. However, there is surely not enough evidence to justify the statement that the loss of one job drift netting off the north-east coast of England could create four jobs for ghillies, jobs on the river Tay. I suspect that the impact declines the further north one goes.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman must be aware of the evidence that shows that 90 per cent. of the fish caught off the north-east coast of England were destined for Scottish waters, including the Tay.

Mr. Wallace: I accept that 90 per cent. were destined for Scottish waters — most for the Tweed. The report also states that, if one takes account of non-catch fishing mortality, the total effect of English fishing in Scotland would be 7·5 per cent. This underlines the point that there is a need for sound evidence to avoid such generalised statements. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) mentioned the Solway firth. It is very difficult to see how it is affected by something on a completely different coast. More is involved than one drift net fishery and several of the other factors, such as poaching, have been mentioned.

I am impressed with the organisation's first report. It intends to establish a scientific data base so that conservation measures might be more effective. Perhaps the Minister will tell us about the Government's funding of it.

During the recess, I had an opportunity to visit a research laboratory in the constituency of the Minister, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute. We discussed a whole host of problems, although admittedly not the salmon fishery, and it was clear that, like many other research laboratories which are funded substantially publicly, it is having to consider carefully what projects it can undertake because of funding costs. It is important to know what support the Government are giving this organisation.

A ban on monofilament gill nets has been asked for. The Minister might confirm that the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1985 outlawed such fishing in Scotland. We had debates similar to this on the Report stage of that Bill. How many prosecutions have there been since that Bill was enacted?

Salmon tagging has been considered at length in the Department. If it is proposed to take tagging a step further, I hope that the administrative and bureaucratic problems that it could pose for those involved in fish farming will be considered. A considerable volume of fish now go through fish farms in the north of Scotland and in my constituency. People involved are worried about those potential burdens, which could add significantly to their costs.

We should consider other means of tackling poaching. I take what the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) said about the balance of proof, but I wonder what measures might be involved. There would be howls of protest if it were suggested that the police should be empowered to search domestic deep freezes. All manner of safeguards would have to be considered.

Mr. Onslow: It would not be necessary for the police to make searches. Members of the public health department might come across salmon in a hotel's deep freeze and reasonably ask where they came from. If any type of enforcement is to be effective, it must be seen through to its logical conclusion.

Mr. Wallace: I am not certain whether that is possible. I cannot imagine public health authorities having similar access to the council house deep freeze which the hon. Gentleman also mentioned. It is important that we tackle poaching, but we must be careful about civil liberties implications before changing the burden of proof.

I welcome the orders.

7.30 pm

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): This is a serious debate, and the more one hears the views of hon. Members the more one realises that perhaps we should have had a whole day's debate on this subject a long time ago. Perhaps we shall have.

I was particularly interested in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow). I did not agree with all he said, but he put his finger on the chief problem—illegal fishing, wherever it may be found. His idea of possibly moving towards a quota system may be something for future consideration, but there is no point in having a quota system unless one solves the problem of illegal fishing. The result would be simply to drive everyone into illegal fishing, and that would make the matter worse rather than better.

We all welcome the setting up in Scotland of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation. As every speaker in this debate has said, it raises the whole question of salmon conservation. I am speaking on this subject because of the deep anxiety of many of my constituents. The river Esk is the only salmon river in Yorkshire and in recent years it has become almost denuded of salmon, particularly in its upper reaches. That has had serious consequences not only for those licensed fishermen who have paid their dues and expect proper sport, but also for the future of salmon stocks and the future management of the river.

The activities of poachers have become so widespread that serious damage and inconvenience are being caused in the harbour and to the boats of the fishing fleet itself. In one instance the lifeboat was fouled by poaching equipment left lying in the water, an incident which in other circumstances could have been extremely serious for those for whom the lifeboat might have been launched. Much blame is being put upon my drift net fishermen. It is claimed that the chief cause of the decline in the number of salmon is the result, mainly, of excessive drift netting off the coast of north-east England. Let me examine this case first.

[Sir Michael Shaw]

It is claimed that there is no control over drift net fishing. Licensed drift netters are, in fact, closely regulated. My drift netters will shortly have to pay £425 for a licence, a vast increase over the cost a few years ago. Nets are restricted in length. In the case of Yorkshire it is 400 yd. The number of drift net licences issued by the Yorkshire water authority is limited to 29. The regulations are there all right, but the trouble is that fishermen are taking up drift netting without a licence.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the length of the nets—I think he said 400 yd. What is the depth of an average net?

Sir Michael Shaw: I think it is 15 ft, but I am not absolutely certain. As I say, there are regulations, but fishermen are taking up drift netting without a licence. My licensed drift netters complain to me that little or nothing is done about it, not even, it is said, when offenders are pointed out to the bailiffs. One does not want to be hard on bailiffs because theirs is a difficult job, particularly with the law as it stands, but, when fishing of that sort goes on so obviously and nothing is done about it, it is tremendously discouraging, indeed almost inciting, to licensed drift netters. The complaint cannot be of a lack of regulation, but it must be said that there are grounds for serious complaint about lack of enforcement.

My drift netters are represented on the river Esk management committee and contribute one penny in the pound of gross earnings from salmon fishing towards an Esk stocking fund. The drift netters and those seeking to manage the Esk are working as one because they do not believe their interests are inimical. It is claimed that my Yorkshire drift net fishermen catch the salmon on their way north. That is true, but the corollary is that the salmon running into the Esk are not caught by local drift netters —they tend not to run at the same time. Why, then, is there such a dangerous drop in the number of salmon in the Esk? It is because poaching has developed into big business, because it has become known that efforts to prevent it are ineffective, and because wholesale poaching, particularly in the lower reaches of the river, is highly profitable.

All those connected with the river Esk—the riparian owners, the Esk management committee, the harbour committee and the fishermen—are united in believing that the cause is virtually uncontrolled poaching. The salmon get into the mouth of the river, but then they disappear. My hon. Friend the Member for Woking is right when he says that at night people dare not go anywhere near parts of the river. Some people who inadvertently go there and see what is going on pretend they have not seen anything and go away as fast as they can. It would be dangerous for them to do otherwise.

The law and the regulations are in existence and the duties laid upon the water authorities by the 1975 Act are quite clear. However, in the case of my constituents those duties are not being carried out effectively, and the longer poaching is left to go unchecked the harder it will be to control. The water authorities will have to do their best to take effective action, or perhaps things have become so impossible that the law itself will have to be changed. I do not know which it should be, but something will have to be done about it now.

It will take manpower, determination and money. There is not a water authority in existence which does not regret being responsible for looking after salmon waters. I have arranged a meeting later this month of interested parties with the chairman of the Yorkshire water authority to discuss action on the problem and we shall try to have some decisive action taken. The problem becomes more difficult year by year, and the longer such action is deferred the more difficult the problem will become to solve. Here we have a specific case in which the salmon have almost disappeared from a river which we know does not suffer from drift netting. Why should Scottish rivers be any different?

I am convinced that the cause of the problem in Scotland is poaching, and, of course, the fish caught are not counted. As with the Esk, there will be many houses near the rivers of Scotland with deep freezers, far more deep freezers than any single household could want, and they will contain 13, 14 or more salmon, caught we know not how but we can well guess. This is a serious problem and it has to be tackled. Poaching is the cause, poaching not only in the river but at sea as well. I say in all sincerity and without trying to be extreme that the licensed drift netters are not the culprits in this great problem.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I thoroughly enjoyed the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). It was an excellent summary of the case for conservation. My right hon. Friend is a conservationist. I know that because I go fishing with him. He goes out of his way to make sure that he does not catch any fish—and that is only trout! His rule for salmon is that after he has caught 20, he goes home. I shall adopt no such rule.

Although I am on the council of the Atlantic Salmon Trust, my aim is not to speak for conservation. That is not where my interest lies, and I would be hypocritical if I said that. The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) said that we liked to look at salmon. That frustrates me. I like to catch them. I want salmon in our rivers so that we can catch them. It is cant to talk merely in terms of conservation. We want salmon in abundance so that we have a better chance of catching them when we go fishing, and that is my starting point.

There was some embarrassment on the Opposition Benches at the beginning of the debate because my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) is a landowner and one of the gentry. I go from bad to worse by saying that he is a farmer and prosperous, but that should not mislead the House. One of the problems of arguing the case for salmon fishing is that it is associated only with the aristocracy and the gentry. That may be true of some rivers in Scotland, but it is not true of many places elsewhere.

When I attend a branch meeting of the Union of Communication Workers, two or three members out of the 30 or 40 present are often more interested in talking to me about salmon fishing than about the business of the evening. Salmon fishing is now attracting large numbers of working people.

I have the honour to be vice-president of the Potteries Angling Society whose latest acquisition is salmon water on the Severn. The society is proud of that. The hon. Member for Woking mentioned the Dovey. Welsh water is not aristocrat or gentry water; in general, it is owned and controlled by clubs whose members are predominantly working people. Therefore, we are not talking about an aristocratic sport.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central said that the aristocracy has the best waters, the easiest to fish and in which to catch salmon. But, as president of the Lords and Commons Fly Fishermen's Club, my right hon. Friend knows that the aristocracy needs easier waters in which to fish. It has been our experience that Conservative Members need easier waters in which to fish. We must therefore accept that working people shall fish in harder water, but that is a handicap that society places upon us.

Fishing is for all, and salmon fishing ought to be for all. That is what I am concerned about. In fact, there has been an expansion in the number of salmon fishermen. I want to see more salmon in our rivers, because there are now more fishermen to catch them. I want to make it possible for people from all walks of life to go salmon fishing and to have the chance of catching salmon.

Several well canvassed hardships have been referred to in the debate, but before looking at some of the well rehearsed arguments about poaching and drift netting we ought to ask whether we are now fishing at the right time. If one looks at the statistics, it is clear that spring fishing —a euphemism for fishing in bitter, cold weather—has declined and that, sadly for those of us who work in the autumn, catches in the autumn appear to have remained at the same level. Someone must explain that phenomenon. If spring fishing has been badly hit and autumn fishing remains good, how can one blame the Faroes, Greenland or the drift fisheries? it may be that fishermen are now fishing at the wrong time and that the close season ought to be changed. Perhaps we should fish later in the year to accommodate the change in the run of the salmon. We must certainly look at that point and consider it, because perhaps we are partly to blame for fishing at the wrong time.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Will the hon. Gentleman bear in mind that there is a limit to how far one can extend the season? After all, many fish in the autumn will shortly spawn and are totally unsuitable for fishing.

Mr. Golding: I do not know how far that is true. They are, of course, nearer to spawning than in the spring, but I should like to know how near to spawning they are in the autumn. If, as some have suggested, the fish are running later and spawning later, fishing could take place for an additional few weeks.

However, people prefer to fish at the traditional time. They will fish in the spring when there are no salmon in the rivers and will come away with bitterness in their hearts, but, when the salmon have arrived, they will have put their rods to rest. I accept that there is a limit to how far the season could be extended, but perhaps something could be done.

I strongly disagree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central and with most other salmon fishermen in their treatment of drift netting in the north-east. We simply cannot tell a group of men, "We will ban the way in which you earn your living."

Mr. Mason: We did it in Scotland 23 years ago.

Mr. Golding: Emotionally I am on the side of the netsmen. When I was a kid, I went to school with the sons of salmon fishermen. They had a rough time. Most of them suffered from malnutrition because the fishing was hard. Those youngsters suffered from TB, malnutrition, and so on. I saw the hardships of the net fisherman's life. We cannot, therefore, tell these people, "We are going to ban drift netting."

The argument, as I understand it, is that drift netting is a traditional method of fishing which, until the advent of monofilament nets, caught a moderate number of fish each year. That is the argument advanced by the Atlantic Salmon Trust. The logic of it is not to ban drift netting, but to ban the monofilament nets. Those who advocate the banning of monofilament nets do not advocate banning the use of boron or of nylon rods. They do not advocate the banning of new scientific fishing lines. We take advantage of all technological progress that makes it easier to catch salmon.

Dr. Godman: Most people who know about the range of fishing methods agree that drift net fishing is the least damaging to stock. If there was a spectrum of fishing gears, drift nets would be at one end and purse seine nets at the other. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Golding: I am not sufficiently knowledgeable about other methods of fishing.

Many things affect the numbers of salmon in the rivers. Each has to be dealt with separately. We cannot pick on one and say, "That is the solution." The logical thing is to control stocks. It is not the drift netting or the monofilament that is terrible. The problem is the rapid increase in the number of salmon taken out by the netsmen —77,000 now compared with 2,162 between 1950 and 1959. I do not want to go back to the 1950s because the north-eastern fishermen had as poor a living as the fishermen on the river Dee at Chester when I was a kid. I do not want to go back to the days of tiny catches. We want men working hard earning reasonable pay.

There are two answers. The first is control. If it is said that control is not enough, the answer must be to buy the fishermen out. I cannot understand why the Conservatives, who adopt such a cavalier attitude to property rights, do not agree. The fishermen have property rights to exploit the sea. Conservative Members say that we should ban them or confiscate their boats, but that is unacceptable. If the drift netters have to go, the only solution is to purchase their rights and give them compensation. Let the salmon fishermen get together and buy out those rights. I could justify and defend that. We cannot say to a group of working men, "So that we may enjoy our sport, you will lose your livelihood." That is not on. We must compensate for loss of property. I should have thought that when I mentioned the word "property", Conservative Members would immediately have been with me. My right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central has no property and would not respond to the argument in the same way as Conservative Members who have property and who should defend property rights.

Pollution must also be controlled. If one visits the Dovey, for example, one hears from the people who run the Dovey association that the biggest polluters are the farmers. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian is listening. He is a farmer and riparian owner on the Tweed. Opinion on the river bank on pollution is that the biggest culprits are farmers. Those who cause pollution are as important as poachers in the destruction of salmon stocks. I hope that my hon. Friend will take that to heart and, when he goes home to his estate at the weekend, will check that he is not adding to pollution.

The Government must also investigate how salmon stocks are affected by acid rain.

In the south-west, pollution and poaching are connected. With the imposition of new controls on pollution, I am told that the south-west water authority is taking people away from their normal fishery control duties and putting them on pollution control. The National and Local Government Officers Association tells me that the authority is reducing the number of people who are patrolling the river banks. That will lead to more poaching.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central rightly attacks me for being weak-willed. I have listened to the difficulties that Government spokesmen have presented on tagging. My right hon. Friend has been bitter because I have approached the question with an open mind. He regards an open mind on it as totally reprehensible. Given all the custom and practice, it will be difficult to make a salmon tagging scheme work in Scotland. If it is difficult in Scotland, it will be difficult in the Lake District and in the north-east of England.

Mr. Mason: The Scots are holding us up.

Mr. Golding: My right hon. Friend says that the Scots are holding us up. The Scots have supported the Labour party throughout our history; certainly they have held us up.

We should not spend years arguing about the pros and cons of the salmon tagging scheme. If it is determined by the Government in good faith that the scheme will not work, we should turn our minds to how to stop poaching.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Bring back capital punishment.

Mr. Golding: My hon. Friend is going slightly too far. The poaching that takes place now is gangsterism. It is not the romantic poaching by the poor, starving family who nip out at midnight to pinch one of the laird's salmon. The police must be told that theft from a river is equivalent to theft from a building and that they must treat it as theft. The police must take strong action against that theft, and there must be no question of waters being additionally rated to provide money for the police, as has been suggested in Wales.

If we do not have salmon tagging, we must have adequate policing and adequate penalties must be enforced against those who steal salmon. If the tagging scheme fails because anglers, especially in Scotland, do not support it, we shall have to look at alternative methods of stopping poachers.

I want to see an increase in the number of salmon in our rivers. I welcome the creation of the new organisation which came into being partly from an initiative of the Atlantic Salmon Trust. We in Britain must do very much more to ensure that salmon get into and out of our rivers. I do not believe that the simple solutions that have been suggested will work. We must think hard about the solutions that the fishermen are presenting to the Government.

8.1 pm

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Not for the first time, I agree with much of what was said by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) who spoke eloquently and entertained the House with his witticisms and the truth of his observations.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I am a staunch supporter of conservation; like him, my objective is to catch fish, but, like the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason), I lack some of the skills that the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme possesses in abundance.

Mr. Mason: Poacher Golding!

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I do not believe the hon. Gentleman poaches. I am sure that he fishes according to the Marquess of Queensberry rules, though I doubt whether he would like his name to be associated with that of an aristocrat.

One of the fundamental points that has run through the debate is that there is no single cause for the decline in the number of salmon in the rivers of this country, Europe, Canada and the United States. There are many reasons, but I have to make some comments about drift netting, not because I want to make life hard for the folks who fish off the coast of Yorkshire and Northumberland, but because we must start somewhere.

The Hunter report is over 20 years old and many of us have read it and sat in on numerous meetings with representatives of the Atlantic Salmon Trust and stalwarts from the Salmon and Trout Association. I pay tribute to both organisations.

The two groups try to be united, but there is some disagreement and I believe that the Salmon and Trout Association is right to underline the need for estuarial control as well as control over drift net fishing. It is ludicrous that we have much poor control. Only one river board in Scotland gives us up-to-date and reasonably accurate statistics about how much is caught by rod and by net in its area. Reliable information is provided about salmon fishing in the Wye in Wales, but the paucity of information about what is caught by rod and net must be remedied. I hope that when the Government introduce legislation they will grasp that nettle. There has been a hesitant approach to reform because some say that there is not enough information. Another reason why action has been slow is that there are grounds for believing that the scientific evidence is inconclusive.

Ministers have told us that the biological functions are not properly understood, that we do not know enough about the genetic causes and that the information on oceanography is not as good as it might be. I make one simple point in reply to those Ministers. Unless we take some fairly obvious steps, we should not assume that there will not be a continuous decline, leading to the disappearance of salmon from our rivers.

It is interesting that the Canadians have decided that tagging is one way of dealing with their problem. They have also shortened the netting season and introduced dealer licensing.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has yet to speak, but it seems to me that we must be pragmatic and recognise that drift netters must have some effect on the number of fish that come into our rivers. Before ignoring the effect of the huge increase in the number of fish caught by drift netters, we should consider what the Norwegians have done. They carried out a careful analysis and noted that in 1960 some fishermen started drift netting for salmon, mainly because white fish catches were declining. When the monofilament net was introduced in the early 1970s, salmon catches increased dramatically. In 1976, drift nets caught about 35 per cent. of catches in Norway, but that figure has now doubled.

Norwegian biologists have pointed out that drift nets catch mixed stocks of salmon, which results in a lack of control for each river stock. Salmon caught by drift nets are damaged fish and, therefore, not of first quality. As a result, they cannot be exported. Drift netting injures salmon and it has been estimated that in salt water of 20 per cent. salinity, 60 per cent. of heavily marked salmon die before spawning. A number of us have caught salmon by the rod and noted how some have been badly affected by the nets.

I do not suggest that we should necessarily ban drift netting off the coast of Northumberland and Yorkshire—though if we are not to do that, we need to hear a better case from those who support that fishing. If we do not ban drift netting, we should certainly ban the monofilament net. Otherwise, we shall be ignoring the evidence before our eyes and I do not see that we shall be able to make progress with the member nations of NASCO whom we criticise for having too large a quota.

I accept that the commercial exploitation and overfishing of the high seas has a serious effect. Some would argue that we need more evidence before we take action, but I do not believe that we can afford that luxury. The Greenlanders have already reduced the number of tonnes that they take and have agreed to reductions in the Faroes, but they made it clear this summer that they will not take further action until we put our house in order.

If we do not agree to the banning of drift netting, we should make a start by banning monofilament nets. I also have no doubt that we cannot allow the existing lack of enforcement to be perpetuated. It is wrong that so many people can make a business out of poaching. There is insufficient flexibility regarding estuary netting. River boards are not allowed to alter the length of their season without the authority of the Secretary of State. The Salmon and Trout Association went to much trouble and expense to oppose those with estuarial netting rights on the river Deveron. They argued that as they were not catching so many fish in the spring because of the shortage of spring fish the netting season should start later and be prolonged into the autumn. That policy is shortsighted and will not preserve salmon. The only way to test the matter was through a lengthy and costly inquiry. The Government must intervene or we shall return to the long rigmarole which costs money, wastes time and has not resulted in the protection of salmon.

The right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central suggested that farm salmon might ease the problem. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) that that would not be the case. There was such an example when the price of salmon dropped considerably because farm salmon was brought over from Ireland. That only encouraged more people to fish with nets to make up for the loss of income. For that reason alone, the benefits of farm salmon are dubious.

My next point is not a frivolous one. Most of the top-class restaurants that pay the premium price put wild salmon on the menu, not farm salmon. People pay for it because they believe that there is a difference. I do not believe that there is a noticeable difference. Any difference is more attributable to how the salmon is cooked. My hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border, Mr. Maclean, looks sceptical. He is entitled to his opinion and I suspect that more people hold his view than hold mine.

The matter becomes complex when the problems of water abstraction and pollution are added. That is why successive Governments have not taken action. Representatives of the Scottish Office are here, as is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture—the Minister is away at the moment—so I hope that this message will get through and that there will be an undertaking in the Queen's Speech to introduce legislation to help achieve our objectives.

8.13 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I welcome the order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I promise to be brief. I wish to correct the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who said that I had great expertise in the fishing industry. That is not true. I am an observer rather than an expert on fisheries.

The hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) said that the single reason—I almost said the sole reason—for the diminution of salmon caught in Scottish rivers was poaching. There are several reasons for the decline in the salmon catch in Scottish rivers. A mixture of natural and human factors must be considered. We must examine the problems generated by the drift net fishing activities of the Yorkshire and Northumberland fishermen. I have met some of these laddies and I have much sympathy with them because of the attacks made upon them in the House and elsewhere. I said in an intervention during the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) that drift net fishing using the traditional gear is the least damaging of commercial fishing activities. Drift net fishing in the herring fishery is not damaging to stocks—certainly nowhere near as damaging as purse seine fishing. However, the nylon monofilament net is a danger. It is a savagely sophisticated piece of technology, and is perhaps too advanced to harvest stocks that are in a fragile state.

Advances in fishing gear technology sometimes outstrip the resources that it harvests. We have seen that purse seine gear can be highly damaging to young fish and can almost wipe out fisheries, and we are witnessing similar developments with the nylon monofilament nets.

In his fine speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) also outlined the dangers presented by discarded and lost remnants of nets to fish, sea birds and animals. The technology of the gear used must enhance the fair and efficient management of stocks. That is essential.

Mr. Beith: Does the hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge and experience, accept that the technology must take some account of the safety of fishermen, and that the ability to work by day has considerable advantages?

Dr. Godman: I readily accept what the hon. Gentleman says. I have argued several times in the House that when debating commercial fisheries we must always take into account the safety of fishermen and their vessels.

[Dr. Godman]

It may be necessary to restrict the activities of the English drift net fishermen, but I would not wish to deprive those men of their livelihoods.

I welcome what my hom. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme said about a buy-out. About six or eight months ago, I said in the House that if we restrict the activities of those fishermen we must talk about compensation. They must not be forced out of the fishery without some compensation or the offer of alternative livelihoods in the fishing industry. They do not all own or crew huge £1 million vessels. Some of the vessels are small cobles sailing out of Whitby and other small ports in England. We are talking about restrictions, but we should be talking about quotas, and we must debate compensation.

Much more must be done to reduce the activities of fishermen in the north Atlantic, despite the concessions made by the Greenland authorities. We must also examine carefully the arguments of those who oppose tagging. As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) rightly said, this would present formidable problems to the salmon fish farmers in his constituency and in other areas of Scotland. He talked about their being fledgling industrial outfits. Some of them are only one-man operations, and it would be an onerous responsiblilty on them to tag fish. Have not some countries adopted a licensing scheme for those who deal in salmon? We must do something about the serious social evil of poaching. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme was right in saying that it is a form of gangsterism, and that it must be tackled comprehensively.

Salmon is part of our national heritage, and it is essential that it remains so.

8.20 pm

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glagow (Dr. Godman), like many hon. Members who have spoken, speaks with great authority. I am pleased that the debate has had the attention of several Secretaries of State, including my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, for Transport, and for the Environment. The latter, who listened to part of the debate, seemed to be wearing his fishing suit, which shows his anxiety about the salmon fishing industry.

To take part in the debate at this stage is like talking to a great squire of the north, possibly the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), renting some fishing from him, paying a large sum for the privilege, sitting by the river bank, and seeing salmon appear, only to have the salmon taken by others who are illegally fishing, because many of the points have been made. My hon. Friends the Members for Woking (Mr. Onslow) and for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) outlined all the points that should be made.

I join with those who welcome the orders. NASCO's object is to contribute through consultation and co-operation to the conservation and rational management of salmon stocks. Our salmon stocks are an important national asset, and some coherent action between EC states is necessary to ensure that it is preserved. Whether the viability of the asset is at risk is in doubt. I take the strongest view that it is seriously at risk. The viability of our salmon fishing should be of proper concern to NASCO when it sets up in Edinburgh. It is sufficiently serious that fish stocks are in danger, yet it is not appreciated that Scottish salmon fisheries are also threatened.

Reference has been made to the figures for the past five years, which I extracted in a series of questions to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, who takes a great interest in the matter. They show a substantial decline in the number of salmon caught by rod and line in Scottish rivers from the figures 20 years ago, and all my evidence shows that the trend is continuing. During the past 18 months I have expressed anxiety to my hon. Friend in questions and correspondence, not because I have a great interest in the matter, but because many individual fishermen, who are customers, have brought the decline of salmon stocks to my notice. Some of them, like the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding), are nature's aristocrats, others are less nobly born, but all of them care about fishing.

If a customer does not think it worthwhile coming to fish, the industry is threatened. Such is the decline in the number of fish in Scottish rivers that the industry, which may bring in £100 million or more to the Scottish economy——

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: More.

Mr. Baker: —is in serious danger.

I have been struck by the extraordinary complacency with which some people in Scotland regard the matter. The owners of fishing rights continue to let their beats. No doubt the fine reputation of Scottish rivers is their best selling point, but the customers are now changing. Long-term fishermen are less and less likely to return to beats where they must seek their consolation in the tales of yesteryear's catches. Overseas customers will certainly replace them for a while, but only a while. The further a customer must travel to fish, the more he expects to take fish wherever the river is, and the quicker he will decide not to return, if the promise of salmon is not borne out.

The complacency is baffling and untypical. Those who adopt that attitude may think that the decline can be reversed in some easy or miraculous way. Perhaps they do not talk about it because they fear that they may accelerate the conclusion that we all fear. However, the longer decisive action is delayed, the longer any reversal of that decline will be postponed.

So far, many steps have been mentioned. I was extremely interested in the comments of Opposition Members about poaching because the poaching that takes place in rivers is similar to that which occurs in the countryside generally — not the charming old-world poaching to relieve the meagre diet of a family in need, but that of organised, armed and motorised gangs.

I wish to stress two points. The first relates to drift netting along the Northumbrian coast. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme says that we should buy out those involved. Although that is a perfectly sensible approach, we should first deal with illegal fishing. All hon. Members have produced figures and, indeed, I have many. My hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) will know as much about this as anyone, but I see no distinction in the figures between legal and illegal fishing. The Northumbrian argument that drift netting is traditional is only partly true. Until 20 years ago old-fashioned cord nets were used. They were cumbersome, heavy and hard to work. Now monofilament nylon nets are used, which are light, cover miles of sea, are wasteful, damage fish and, in many cases, kill them.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking that fishing in daylight by those means should be banned. It is said that the jobs of 500 men could be at risk, but my information is that many of those jobs are part-time. Serious consideration should be given to the redeployment and conservation work that will be required of those who are engaged full time in legal fishing in that part of the world.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman may be unaware that part-time fishermen are disqualified from holding a licence under the Northumbrian water authority.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman is also well informed, and he will have a chance to develop his point later.

The risk to those jobs must be compared with the much greater risk to jobs in Scotland, which are in peril. The figures show how the catch has increased, and demand that action is taken to deal with that aspect of the matter.

The second nettle which has to be grasped—it is one which has only just been clutched—is the rise of the greatest predator of fishing stocks, the seal. It is reckoned that in 1920 there were about 10,000 seals around the British coast. It is probable that there are now 80,000, most of which live off the Scottish coast. If a seal eats about 10 lb of fish in a day—it will not all be salmon but let us say that 1 per cent. of it is and that the average weight of a salmon is about 8 lb — about 365,000 salmon a year are taken by seals. That is greater than the total number of salmon that are taken by all means in a year in Scotland. If seals are allowed free breeding grounds and to increase in the way that they are doing, their numbers are likely to double to about 160,000 over 10 years. The effect of such a seal population upon salmon stocks would be devastating.

I do not want to see the extermination of seals, but, for the sake of fish, salmon stocks and jobs, I believe that conservation of the species has gone too far and some degree of control is essential. I recommend that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland should consider the measures that have been taken in Canada to exercise control over the seal population. He should examine carefully the dramatic increase in the salmon population which resulted from the exercise of that control. If the prospect of such control seems alarming, it must be remembered that, if nothing is done, the prospect will be worse for fish stocks as well as for the natural environment. The process of explanation for the public has to begin shortly, and that must be done on a European basis. I believe that NASCO should be capable of starting this work. Scottish salmon fishing is an important national asset for jobs, and the environment and the economy of the rural highlands depend upon it. It is in decline, and the decline could easily become permanent. Let us not be found wanting in its defence.

8.32 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): It is apparent from what has been said already that my constituency and its people have some interest in this matter. They have scarcely been omitted from any of the speeches that have been made from both sides of the Chamber.

My constituency contains the Tweed, which is one of the world's great salmon rivers. The lower reaches of the Tweed are wholly within my constituency and, therefore, within England. For much of its length the river provides the boundary between England and Scotland. The constituency contains other salmon rivers, including the Coquet, which is a carefully regulated river: there is a systematic method of counting every salmon that passes up the Coquet. If Conservative Members would like more information on the procedures involved and the data that are available, they should look to the Northumbria water authority, which provides a massive amount of detailed information on the fish counting that takes place along the rivers for which it is responsible. Those rivers include the Coquet but not the Tweed.

In my constituency there are three groups engaged in salmon fishing. There are those who fish by rod and line, those who fish by river net cast into the Tweed, and those who use drift nets at sea. All these fisheries are long established over many centuries. Every one of them has a claim to involvement in the process by which man catches salmon and by which he seeks to catch a proportion without destroying the fishery for the future. Every one of these groups has an interest in ensuring that there is a sensible conservation policy. In my view, none of them is entitled to say to any of the other groups, "My group will catch the salmon and you have no right to do so." Any sensible conservation policy must be a balance between the various interests.

As I have said, there is the rod-and-line fishery, and we have good salmon beats on the Tweed and its tributary, the Till. There is great pride in the quality of the fish that is taken. There is a long history of the development of a well organised fishery and, of course, jobs are involved. I am fully aware of the employment dimension, which is important to many parts of Scotland as well as the area which I represent.

There is a long established system of catching salmon by means of a river net. The net is taken out into the river and there is a rowing boat at the other end. In any argument about which sort of fishery is legitimate, it is not possible to say that it is right to catch salmon with a rod, right to catch it by means of a net in the river and wrong to catch it in the sea, or vice versa. It can be claimed that the chances of the salmon reaching the spawning ground are more greatly imperilled by the blockage of the river by nets than by of length of net out in the sea. That sort of argument, however, is fruitless and it is my contention that all three means of catching salmon have been engaged in for generations and that they have legitimate and similar claims as long as we can catch salmon at all and ensure the salmon stock. If that can be assured, no one group should be excluded.

Drift net fishing at sea has been referred to especially during the debate. It provides a livelihood for many in fishing ports along the coasts such as Holy Island, Seahouses, Boulmer, Beadnell and Amble, or it means that they can have an all-round fishing livelihood. Salmon fishing can be supplemented in the winter by other fishing activities such as lobster and crab fishing, but anyone who is demonstrated to be other than a full-time bona fide fisherman — I underline a point that I made in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) — is disqualified from holding a licence or being an endorsee of a licence that is issued by the Northumbrian water authority. Vigorous steps are taken to enforce that regulation. There are so many people who would like a salmon licence that anyone who breaks a condition of the licence will be in peril of being reported immediately. It is a feature of the licensing system that any infringement is open to ready reporting by others who would like to be licence holders or endorsees.

There are many coastal villages and fishing [illegible] along my constituency and, further south, along that of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw), who spoke eloquently earlier in the debate, where drift net fishing for salmon provides an important part of the livelihood of fishermen.

There are enforcement problems in all of the three sectors of salmon fishing which I have described. Unfortunately, poaching takes place in every sector. It takes place in the river spawning grounds and is present in and around the rod-and-line fishing community. It takes place in the river, where net fishing takes place. There is a considerable amount of illegal drift net fishing at sea, notably on the Scottish side of the border where there is no legal fishery and no licensed fishermen who have a strong incentive to point out that infringements or illegal activities are taking place. There is thought to be a large illegal take of the catch on the Scottish side of the border.

Conservation must involve a balance between the groups that I have mentioned. It is a complicated problem that involves many factors, many of which have been mentioned during the debate but not all. Some scientists contend that the salmon goes through a cyclical pattern, which is now changing. It seems that a shift in the seasonal salmon cycle may be taking place. A "World About Us" programme on BBC television in May cast doubt on many of the contentions that have been advanced by those on both sides of the argument. It laid particular stress on the probability that the salmon cycle is shifting so that the main salmon runs are now taking place outside the traditional salmon seasons. That must be tested along with all the other scientific contentions, but it is an illustration of the complexity of the scientific argument and the amount of discussion that is taking place.

A decline in the salmon rivers on the west of Scotland and the west of England cannot be attributed to licensed drift net fishing that is taking place on the east coast of England. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) spoke earlier about problems arising in the Solway. Those problems cannot be attributed to drift net fishing off the east coast of England. The decline of the salmon seems so widespread around our shores that there must be explanations for it other than drift net fishing. That does not absolve us from examining whether there is too much drift net fishing and whether it should be restricted, but it certainly removes the argument that drift net fishing is the principal explanation for what is happening to the salmon cycle.

I mentioned the possibility of the salmon cycle being changed, but a number of other factors are relevant. The hon. Member for Dorset, North mentioned seals, which are a problem about which fishermen are especially aware. The same television programme which I just prayed in aid for arguing that the salmon cycle is the most important factor argued against the fishermen's view on seals. However, simple observation suggests that the capacity of seals to eat fish, their large numbers and the ingenuity with which they make their way to salmon nets are all evidence of their ability to reduce the salmon stock. It is common for fishermen to see a seal taking the fish out of their nets. It is obvious that the seal is a common cause of visible damage to salmon. Quickness to attribute damage to monofilament nets underestimates the extent to which salmon are damaged by seals.

In my area on the Farne islands there are large numbers of seals that are culled periodically by the National Trust. The National Trust assumes that the constantly increasing colony numbers threaten the other aspects of its conservation policy — the birds for which it is responsible. Seals destroy the birds' habitat. The culling is carried out not for the benefit of fishermen but to maintain the natural habitat of the various species on the islands. If it did not occur, the problem would be even worse.

Much has been said about the additional problems that the monofilament net may create. Some aspects have been forgotten. Some hon. Members pointed out that the use of the monofilament net led to an increase both in catch and in the activity of drift net fishing and that it was part of the process by which the licensing system was introduced. There is a reason for that. It was difficult to operate the hemp net, which was unsuitable for day-time operation. This meant that the fishing had to be done at night, which posed considerable dangers for fishermen and was hazardous to shipping. It is difficult to accommodate that form of fishing alongside other maritime activity. That is one reason why the massive drift net fishery off the Tyne during the 19th century declined. Later, the Tyne lost its position as a major salmon river. We hope that it will recover that position one day, but it was not the net fishermen who caused the decline of the Tyne as a salmon river. The ability to work a net primarily by day is a considerable advantage in a dangerous occupation. Hon. Members should not make light of the safety of fishermen.

Hon. Members should not be surprised that fishermen, like any other group, including anglers, modernise and look for new and efficient operating methods. The angler has changed his technology dramatically over the years. One presumes that he has done so with the objective of catching not fewer fish but more fish. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) was honest enough to admit that. At times I formed the impression from some speeches that anglers were intent upon catching as few fish as possible and that only those who went to sea with drift nets had any other objective.

The former Minister of State — the right hon. Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor)—recently said:

"Our scientists have looked at this question and it is very clear that there is no evidence of monofilament nets causing any more damage to fish than other types of netting."

He continued:

"I am not in favour of banning these nets. If the scientists' reports do show that there is overfishing, then we must tackle this in other ways."

That is what the hon. Gentleman said after he had had a chance to look at the position.

That leads me to what might be done to ensure that there is a conservation policy. I reiterate my assumption that any conservation policy must bear upon all those who have a legitimate involvement in catching salmon. I can hardly include under that criterion a policy that simply involves buying out the north-east drift net fisherman. It is at least a preferable option, so far as he is concerned, to banning his activity. That the activity could be banned without giving any consideration to the livelihood of those involved is a grotesque proposition.

Buying out, however, presents many problems. It is not morally justified as an alternative to regulating the activities of the fisherman. If we embarked upon this approach, we would immediately come across a difficulty. The assumption of the regulatory system is that the descendants of the fisherman can continue in that fishery. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme described it as being even more amenable to Conservative Members —it is not only property rights; it is inheritable property rights. The assumption is that the fishing community will continue to live by the father passing the licence on to the son. We are talking about buying out not one generation but a right of succession. If we attempted to buy out the fishermen, this would be greatly at the expense of fishing communities. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme asked his colleagues to compare that industry with others where there has been a decline. There is no reason why there should be a total cessation of the fishery. The salmon industry is not faced with quite the same difficulties as coal or steel. We should not talk about having to buy out whole communities from an activity in which they have been engaged for generations.

We should be considering other positive measures more carefully. I have some sympathy with the idea of tagging. When I was in Canada a year ago I had the opportunity to look at the procedures used there. Tagging poses problems, including those associated with fish farming. With a salmon tagging system it will be much easier and probably cheaper to buy salmon steak and very difficult to buy a whole fish, because that will have a tag. I remember when salmon was much cheaper. On a special occasion, we used to buy a whole salmon or salmon trout. It is now far too expensive for any normal family to contemplate that.

We must look at effort limitation—of national quotas and at the effort used by an individual fisherman whether in the sea or the river. We should consider the amount of effort a fisherman is entitled to put in and the quantity of fish that he is allowed to take. If too many fish are caught, the total number must be regulated. We should consider the measures used for regulation. We must ask the Government to lay before the House as dispassionately as is possible in this highly emotive subject the best scientific evidence available on all the propositions and counter propositions. We ask Ministers in the Scottish Department of Agriculture and in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to put their heads together to produce evidence that both sides of the argument can see as being the best distillation of scientific opinion so that we all have a better basis for judgment. No valuable purpose is served by wild allegations, by talking about banning the livelihoods of substantial groups of people or threatening the livelihood of other groups unless evidence is placed before us which we can agree has a sound basis. The Government have a responsibility to do that, just as they have a responsibility to look to the livelihoods of all those who gain their living from the salmon in its progress through our sea and rivers.

8.48 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): I agree with the closing comments of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that it would be enormously helpful if the House had before it the best and most recent scientific evidence available on all aspects of salmon. The hon. Gentleman said that no one had the right to say, "We shall catch salmon but you have no right to do so." He should be reminded that that was said—perhaps unluckily for those concerned, albeit luckily for all others who have an interest in salmon — to the Scottish salmon drift netsmen. I would not suggest that it should be repeated to north-east coast fishermen. If there is to be any banning or reduction of salmon netting on the north-east coast, there must be compensation.

I want to ram home and repeat some of the points that have been made during the debate, but I hope that after the debate the Government will do something rather than weep crocodile tears and do nothing, as has been the case with successive Governments for far too long.

Man is a hunter, man is commercial, and man likes to eat salmon.

Mr. Maxton: And women.

Mr. Morrison: Mankind, I mean.

As a result, there are fewer salmon in our rivers. One only has to ask any ghillie, individual or river owner who has long experience of any particular river to gain confirmation of that fact. I accept that the detailed blame for that situation is manifold. The detection of salmon in the north Atlantic, and therefore the harvesting of salmon, was unknown in earlier times. Monofilament nets are undoubtedly efficient, but they are excessive in what they harvest, apart from the fact that they damage many fish. Anybody who fishes regularly on a salmon river knows that very well.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker), I believe that in many areas there are excessive and increasing numbers of seals. There is the increase in poaching, the north-east coast drift netting, the stake nets and the drag nets. Against all that armoury, it is a miracle that any salmon escape at all to swim up the rivers to breed and, before they can do that, to run the gauntlet of rod fishermen and perhaps a few otters.

I do not accept that the serious salmon situation can be solved by special pleading on behalf of one interest or ascribing blame totally to any or all interests as long as they are not one's own. I am convinced that all interests will have to make concessions. The high seas fishermen will have to be limited in the amount of their catch. Monofilament nets should be outlawed. The number of seals will have to be reduced, certainly in some areas. Much greater efforts must be made to control poaching at sea, and that probably means greater assistance for the fisheries squadron of the Royal Navy, which does such excellent work. On land it is clear that the police must be given greater assistance in their efforts to control poaching.

Reference has been made to salmon tagging, and that could be a help, but I am not yet convinced that the introduction of a salmon tagging scheme is a practical possibility. The administration available for it in Scotland hardly exists, and the cost would be high. I have seen one recent estimate that it would cost £2·6 million to introduce such a scheme. While I am in favour of salmon tagging in principle, I believe that it needs a good deal more thought before it becomes a practical possibility.

North-east coast drift netting will have to be limited. That may mean compensation. Stake and drag netting may have to accept longer close seasons or close weekends, or, as the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) said, some of those netsmen may have to be bought out, if they are prepared to be bought out. Even rod fishermen, including the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) and I, may have to accept limits on what we catch. That would not be very difficult, because in my case the catch happens to be pretty low anyway.

Unusually, I may be preaching that there should be equality of misery, but if all interests are unprepared to accept that they have a responsibility, the situation will continue to worsen. Then, not only will rod fishermen lose their sport, that part of the Scottish tourist industry dependent upon the salmon die, ghillies, hoteliers and others benefiting from that tourism lose their jobs and some Scottish estates go bankrupt, but netsmen will lose their livelihood. If those disasters are not to occur, I am convinced that the Government must give a stronger lead, legislate if and where necessary, and accept the need for compensation. Until that happens, the husbanding of the salmon as an important resource will continue to be inadequate.

8.56 pm

Mr. Home Robertson rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Gentleman have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am grateful.

This has been a wide-ranging and interesting debate. One of the wide-ranging issues that has been covered is innuendo about my alleged interest in fisheries on the Tweed. I should like to clarify the matter. I am not interested in fishing, if I may dare say that in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding). It is true that my farm borders on the banks of the river Tweed, but in that spot it is tidal, which means that it is affected by different legislation. As far as I know, it is of little interest to anglers. I do not want to derive any benefit from that water. I hope that that clarifies the issue.

All the conflicting interests that have been expressed by hon. Members from various parts of the country demonstrate the need for a review of freshwater fisheries legislation. Far too many people hold the present legislation in contempt. They feel that it is simply protecting privileges. That certainly contributes to the level of illegal fishing with monofilament nets. That chaos is contributing towards the threat to salmon stocks, about which so much concern has been expressed during the debate.

I return to order for one sentence. I repeat that we for our part wish the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation well.

8.57 pm

Mr. Rifkind rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Rifkind: As a simple Foreign Office Minister whose responsibility in the debate is simply to recommend an order that confers immunities and privileges on the two members of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation, who I think live in Edinburgh, but neither of whom is my constituent as far as I am aware, I have been literally out of my depth in this wide-ranging and valuable debate. I commend hon. Members on both sides of the House for the unprecedented expertise, passion and conviction that they have devoted to the subject. This has been a worthwhile opportunity to give vent to the many issues of serious concern.

I should respond to the specific questions that were put to me about the order. The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) asked a crucial question about whether the two employees of NASCO would be immune from parking fines as a result of the immunities and privileges provided under the order. Although I suppose that the two gentlemen in question will be less happy to hear it, I am happy to assure him that they will not be so immune. As I said in my opening remarks, they are receiving not the privileges available to diplomatic agents but simply those which are essential to the carrying out of their proper responsibilities.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) asked about research by the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation and the funding implications of that. NASCO does not have to fund research. It enjoys the benefits of the extensive international research programmes co-ordinated by the international commission for the exploration of the sea, to which the United Kingdom is a contributing partner.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the funding for NASCO and whether there would be a British contribution to the organisation. The United Kingdom participates in NASCO, not in its own right but as a member of the European Community. Therefore, the funding of NASCO is by the signatories, of which the European Community is the single largest contributor with a contribution of £40,590. Clearly, the United Kingdom pays its normal share of Community expenditure in that respect.

As I have said, much of the debate covered more wide-ranging issues which do not immediately arise out of the order. Therefore, I hope that the House will forgive me if my comments are very brief.

There was considerable discussion of the problems of illegal fishing and salmon poaching. I am well aware of the seriousness with which the matter is regarded in many quarters. Indeed, I recall that it is said of a former Scottish sheriff that, in sentencing a person convicted of poaching, he remarked that the defendant had been convicted of a most serious crime, and went on to say that he might almost describe it as a crime against humanity. Nevertheless, the Government recognise the seriousness of the problem and are making a thorough examination of it, with particular reference to the proposals for a tagging scheme. The Government are also considering other ways of tackling the problem of illegal salmon fishing.

Final decisions have not yet been taken. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said in his reply to a written question from my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) on 21 October, the Government hope to make an announcement on the issue in the near future.

I understand that among the difficulties that a workable salmon tagging scheme would have to overcome would be how to deal effectively with imports, and with our own farm salmon production, without disrupting normal trade. It would also, of course, be necessary to provide secure control of the many tags that would be required each year.

My right hon. Friend intends to make an announcement on the matter in the future, and I hope that the House will feel able to wait for that.

Mr. Mason: In spite of the difficulties that the Minister has mentioned, may I take it from what he has said, and his knowledge of what the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has in mind, that the Ministry has not closed its mind to the introduction of a salmon tagging scheme?

Mr. Rifkind: I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman any details as to what is likely to be in the announcement. All I can say is that the examination that has been taking place includes a possible tagging scheme as well as other proposals for dealing with the problem of illegal salmon fishing. I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to await the announcement which I understand will be made in the near future.

With regard to the equally complicated and serious matter of drift netting, clearly there is a difference of view between hon. Members on the desirability of extending the present ban in Scotland to drift netting in England. Drift netting off the coast of England is not an intercepting fishery in terms of the NASCO convention. The convention deals with fishing beyond the 12-mile limit. Therefore, this matter is not relevant to the convention that the House is considering this evening.

However, the Government accept the need for careful constraint on net fishing for salmon. Although this fishery is already strictly regulated by the Northumbrian and Yorkshire water authorities, the Goverment have been reviewing the arrangements to see whether they should be further tightened. My right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Scotland hope to make an announcement on this matter.

The House will have seen that my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), who is the Minister responsible for these matters in the Scottish Office, was able to attend a large part of this debate. I know that he and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will wish to study very carefully the many important contributions made by hon. Members on both sides of the House during this relatively brief but very important debate. It is on that basis that I commend the orders to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organization) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th July, be approved.

Resolved,

That the draft European Communities (Immunities and Privileges of the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organization) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th July, be approved.—[Mr. Rifkind.]

Transport Bill [Money] (No. 2)

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Transport Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenditure of the Secretary of State—

(a) in respect of remuneration and allowances paid to deputy traffic commissioners;

(b) resulting from the establishment of a Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.—[Mr. Ridley.]

9.6 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It is quite wrong that we should seek to pass this money resolution without making comment on it. This is typical of the way that the entire buses Bill has been handled since it was first brought before the House. What is happening at the moment is that we are rewriting this major piece of legislation as we go along. There have been not hundreds of amendments but possibly as many as 2,000, most of them coming from the Government, during the passage of the Bill, and it is extraordinary that tonight we are being asked to add, in a money resolution, two basic changes. While minor in themselves, these changes demonstrate very well some of the problems that have arisen during the passage of the Bill.

For example, the motion states:

"That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Transport Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment . . . in respect of remuneration and allowances paid to deputy traffic commissioners".

This arises from the fact that Government's initial intention was that the general public should have very little access to the traffic commissioners. It was only an extremely serious amendment in Committee that changed this particular Bill. Then in another place the legislation was changed, but not, frankly, improved. We shall probably see during the discussion tomorrow a very clear indication that the Government's attitude towards the general public is that, if there is something wrong with transport, the police and the local authorities should have the right to make representations but the traffic commissioners should not.

We have suddenly had this added rush to put money into the Bill because the Minister has decided that there is going to be such general chaos, so many people rushing to the assessors or the traffic commissioners, that there will be considerable expenditure on fees for those ladies and gentlemen. While I welcome this rather tardy recognition of the fact that there will be a great deal of chaos following the passage of the Bill, it seems to me extraordinary that at the last minute there should be a demonstration, yet again, of the cavalier attitude that Ministers have taken throughout the passage of the legislation.

Turning to the second part of this money resolution, the authorisation of payment relates to the establishment of a disabled persons transport advisory committee. This is a very important matter which concerned us very much throughout the passage of the Bill. We wanted to make clear to the Government that at present many local authorities provide a very high standard of transport for the disabled. It is important that that be retained, taken in conjunction with the abolition of the metropolitan counties, but there is clear evidence that no such thing will happen.

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

We are now told by the Government, almost at the last minute, that we should have moneys for the establishment of a disabled persons transport advisory committee. It is therefore useful to look at the wording of the clause to find out exactly what the Bill is going to do. It becomes painfully obvious that the committee may consider any matter which is referred to it by the Secretary of State. It will also have the inestimable advantage of making a report to the Secretary of State, who will actually lay a copy of it before Parliament. The committee will have no power to insist that those who benefit at present from provision for the disabled will receive the same standard of care in the future. It is plain from the weak and waffling language of the clause that the advisory committee, as it is set up, will have matters referred to it by the Secretary of State and will have the great honour of being able to consider them, but it will be unable to come up with any real plan that would change the attitude of those transport authorities that will have to provide the services.

There is clearly a difference in the way that the Conservative party regards the capital and the rest of the country. Throughout the Bill's passage, we discussed the fact that London is to be excluded, and we asked why, if the buses Bill is such a great innovation and will do such a fantastically good job, the capital is being deprived of that high quality service. We are told that the Secretary of State intends that it shall apply to the capital before long.

When we consider this part of the money resolution, we find that the division between town and country is even stronger than we suspected. London has been given an extra £5 million to deal with the problems of the disabled, after the GLC has been abolished, because London's voters have a clear view of the excellence of the service. Those of us who have seen it working know that it is an accurate view. The work done by the GLC in providing transport for the disabled of London has set a high standard that could be copied to considerable advantage elsewhere in the country. In effect, we shall have a two-tier attitude — the GLC receives £5 million while the rest of the country receives nothing. On that basis, I am afraid that we can only assume that, as with so much of the Bill, the Secretary of State has not worked out the effect that that will have on the transport industry as a whole and on the lives of ordinary people, or the way that it will operate.

Tomorrow we shall be considering the final stage of a massive piece of legislation which will completely alter the bus industry. Yet here we are — not just at the eleventh hour, but at the eleventh hour and——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Fifty-nine minutes.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My hon. Friend says 59 minutes, but I prefer to say 55 minutes — making massive changes which will suddenly, we are told, provide money for two basic parts of the legislation.

Had the Bill been properly prepared, none of that general atmosphere of incompetence would have originated. Had the Transport Bill become the Transport Act 1986, there would have been time for consultation with the relevant authorities and with the various groups, such as the disabled and those who provide specialised transport. There would have been at least time for the parliamentary draftsmen to produce a piece of legislation that did not need to be written once, or twice, but all the time in both places, because the House of Lords must have dealt with even more amendments than we did in the House of Commons.

This change was requested not once, but several times, and was discussed ad infinitum in Committee. It was finally brought forward on Report in another place. If that is not a classic demonstration of at best incompetence and at worst a totally unprepared, ill thought out and very damaging piece of legislation, I should like to know what is.

The Secretary of State for Transport has pushed the Bill through although it is badly drafted. Half the people who have been consulted are totally opposed to it. The reaction of the Conservative party in country areas shows that those who know about the needs of rural areas and of transport are absolutely opposed to this legislation. Yet, even now, the House is being asked to make various changes.

If the Secretary of State for Transport would like to do us all a great favour, even at this late stage, he should not be making tiny changes here and there which he thinks ought to have been made before, but which somehow or other he could not bring himself to accept; he should not be redrafting right up to the moment when the legislation leaves the other place; he should be saying "At long last I am demonstrating a side of my nature which no one suspected. I am an infinitely reasonable, tolerant and intelligent man, so I have decided that the best possible thing to do with the Transport Bill is to throw it into the wastepaper basket."

9.17 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I agree with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), but I was concerned when she said that the Minister was treating the GLC and therefore London differently from the rest of the country because the Minister may find the income available for the disabled persons transport advisory committee within the GLC to carry out any amendments that it wants but not make that money available for the rest of the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich will remember that a difference was revealed between the pensioners in London and those in the rest of the country in the debate that we had on concessionary bus passes. There was also a difference of opinion among the Tory Back Benchers on our Committee considering the Transport Bill and the Tory Back Benchers on the Committee of the London Regional Transport Bill. The Tory Back Benchers on the London Regional Transport Bill had backbone whereas the Tory Back Benchers on our Bill had no backbone at all and did not have the guts to support our amendment, which would have written into the Transport Bill the same amendment that was written into the London Regional Transport Bill and thus have guaranteed pensioners concessionary passes. I am rather surprised therefore of the reaction of my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich as the fact that there is no money available for areas outside London although money is available for London is consistent with the Secretary of State's track record.

I do not oppose this money resolution because it will provide remuneration for people on the disabled persons transport advisory committee. Funds will also be made available for the deputy traffic commissioners. The Bill will give the Secretary of State power to appoint members to the committee and to grant remuneration. Not only will the Secretary of State be able to appoint his hacks but he will be able to decide how much his hacks get. Every time we have discussed London transport, the Secretary of State has talked about Ken Livingstone providing jobs for the boys. Under this Bill the Secretary of State will appoint a number of deputy commissioners or whatever their designation may be and after he has appointed them he will decide how much to pay them.

With this little measure the Secretary of State has done what he was determined from the outset to do. He said that he would rewrite the Bill and he has done just that, but he has not changed the plot. The result will be chaos in the transport industry. Even on Third Reading in the House of Lords, there were 70 amendments. An ill-conceived Bill has been rushed through by a Secretary of State with very little idea how transport should be run. The result will be chaos and those who suffer most will be people in the rural areas and in metropolitan districts such as Tyne and Wear, where one of the best transport systems in the country will be in jeopardy. Therefore, although we shall not oppose this little money resolution today, we shall certainly make our voices heard in relation to the Bill itself tomorrow.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Those of us who took part in the Committee stage of the Transport Bill and who are said to have no spine are especially grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for introducing the amendments in the money resolution. It comes very badly from the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) to say that the Bill is ill-conceived, as we remember sitting for hours on end listening to opening speeches from the Opposition on clause 1 which amounted to general statements about transport in this country. Those speeches took up almost 100 hours of the Committee's time, with the result that the Bill was guillotined. The hon. Lady cannot complain that the Bill was ill-conceived and that there was no consultation when the Opposition set out from the beginning to prevent any sensible discussion on it.

Provision for the disabled is a prominent feature of the money resolution. I and my colleagues in the Committee —two or three of them are present today—welcome the provisions for the disabled persons transport advisory committee. Conservative Members made it clear to the Secretary of State that special provision ought to be made for the disabled and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State took our advice and undertook to amend the Bill. He has fulfilled that undertaking and carried it through to the House of Lords. Whatever the Opposition may say, that stance on the part of the Secretary of State resulted from the initiative taken by Conservative Members of the Committee. So much for the criticism that we had no spine and no guts. It is because we stood up and said what we thought that all transport authorities and bus operators will be bound to provide concessionary fare schemes, especially for the disabled. The fact that it will be for authorities to opt out rather than in is of great importance in terms of the money available as a result of this measure.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich referred to transport problems in rural areas. As a result of the Bill, villages such as the one in which I live in my constituency which have only two buses a week will be able to have a much more flexible transport system to take people into the local market town to do their shopping and other business. Contrary to Opposition scaremongering, the taxi provisions and the extension of licensing provisions to allow minibuses and other rural transport to flourish will be welcomed by people in the rural areas when they appreciate what the long-term effects of the Bill will be.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford upon Avon): My hon. Friend was speaking of his experience in the rural areas of Lancashire. I can confirm from my experiences in Warwickshire that there are enterprises preparing to offer new public transport services in rural areas which previously had highly unsatisfactory services. I anticipate that we shall see the fruits of this legislation quickly, and that they will parallel the excellent consequences of the deregulation of the sale of spectacles. Such deregulation has resulted in enterprises offering a new, improved range of services. Evidence suggests that exactly the same will happen with regard to transport.

Mr. Hind: It has been suggested that this money resolution is a patching-up operation, due to the lack of consultation. The representations of some Labour-controlled local authorities with transport responsibilities were notable for their absence. The Lancashire county council, if I may use a cricketing expression, took their bats home and refused to have anything to do with the Committee.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hind: No.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hind: It was notable that, when I was called upon in Committee to make what I thought were sensible speeches on behalf of those I represent in Lancashire, I had to rely upon transport planners from authorities other than those of Lancashire because they refused to take part in the debate.

Mr. Rogers: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Hind: No.

It must be borne in mind that the lack of consultation has been used as an excuse by many Labour-controlled authorities to stall and do nothing on this Bill. If the result is chaos, the public can ask those authorities why that is so. The answer is that, right the way through, they have refused to do anything.

Mr. Rogers: Perhaps I may correct the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hind: I do not need to be corrected.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Only one hon. Member may be on his feet at one time. If the hon. Member is patient he may be called.

Mr. Hind: I do not wish to appear uncharitable, Mr. Speaker. I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Rogers: I thank the hon. Gentleman and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for subtly making the hon. Gentleman give way. The hon. Gentleman said that there was no pressure from the Lancashire area in connection with this Bill. Does he not remember that one of the leaders of the opposition to this Bill was my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) who, very forcibly on occasions, put forward the views of the Lancashire county council and the local authorities in that area? I would like to remind the hon. Gentleman that he was not present on one occasion to support his own amendment.

Mr. Hind: I accept that the amendment was eventually withdrawn. However, the Front Bench spokesman to whom the hon. Gentleman refers represents Wigan and the views of Greater Manchester, not Lancashire.

In terms of advice, support and pressure, Lancashire county was deliberately absent and chose to take no part in the proceedings. I accept what the hon. Gentleman said about Greater Manchester but my statement on Lancashire is true and I will not resile from it.

Mr. Speaker: If I may say to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), I do not get hon. Members to give way. It is up to them.

Mrs. Dunwoody: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it genuine?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Yes. It seems that the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) is misrepresenting a Lancashire Member who sat on the Committee for many hours and gave clear voice to all of the views of Lancashire people which, frankly, cannot be said of the hon. Member for Lancashire, West.

Mr. Speaker: I was not on the Committee, so I do not know that.

Mr. Hind: The hon. Lady deliberately misconstrues what I said. I said that the Labour-controlled Lancashire county council deliberately chose to take no part.

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is not true.

Mr. Hind: That council might have written to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), but it chose not to write to Conservative Members on the Committee who represent the Lancashire community. My constituency is called Lancashire, West—it could not be more clear which part of the county I represent.

Mr. Rogers: The Irish sea. That is west Lancashire.

Mr. Hind: Opposition Members may complain, but if the Bill is a mess, as the hon. Lady has said, it will be as a result of the failure of Labour-controlled local authorities to work for its implementation.

9.30 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Labour Members have said that the Bill was ill thought out. I have had conversations with several Members of another place who were amazed at the number of amendments that they were expected to vote through almost on the nod after the Bill had received such an exhaustive Committee stage here. Although I accept that the Government might feel that some clauses were not reached because of controversy on earlier clauses, it is nevertheless clear that many amendments were introduced late.

No Opposition Member would vote against the proposed rather niggardly provision, but it appears from what I have read this week that the Government might have been better advised to have written in some underwriting of a pension provision for members of the National Bus Company who are understandably worried about their pensions after privatisation. Employees of the Scottish Bus Group are not going on strike in support of colleagues in England and Wales because the Scottish Bus Group is not to be privatised. Employees there feel that their pensions are better safeguarded. I hope that they are right.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) complained of discrimination as between London and the rest of the country, but there is a further discrimination—of which we do not complain as yet—between England and Wales and Scotland. Presumably because of pressure from the Scottish Office, the Scottish Bus Group is to be retained as a public corporation, and that will give continuity for pension rights. That merely illustrates the illogicality of the Government's thinking in introducing the Bill.

There has been pressure from employers, unions and everyone else associated with the Bill for a properly underwritten guarantee of pension rights. It is regrettable that the Secretary of State has failed to write such provision into the money resolution. He is launching a bout of chaos on the country. There will be uncertainty for employees and an unpredictable service for bus users, all on the back of limited and somewhat contradictory experiments.

The Secretary of State has a nerve to return to the House so late and claim that the Bill was well prepared—it clearly was not—and that the resolution is anything like a definitive response to the criticisms of the gaps in the Bill and its financial provisions made here, in Committee, and in another place. So far, the Government have not responded to the protests. The workers look forward only to uncertainty and passengers can look forward only to worrying whether rather than when a bus will come along.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhonnda): I have been prodded into speaking by what the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) said, especially as he extolled the Bill's virtues. Anybody who sat through the Committee stage will realise that this Bill has been cobbled together. The Secretary of State and his junior Minister, who took us through most of the time as the Secretary of State was absent, did not know what it was all about and on most occasions they had to rely quite heavily on civil servants to explain to them the meaning of some clauses.

One of the aspects of legislation which I should have thought any Government drafting legislation would consider was whether they could judge the effect their legislation would have in six months or a year. I challenge the Secretary of State to tell the House now or tomorrow what the state of transport will be in six months or a year. It was quite obvious in Committee that they were not able to forecast the state of transport. It is the lack of scientific analysis and logical progression in putting forward this Bill that disturbs me.

I do not know why the hon. Member for Lancashire, West is so happy. The hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell), the junior Minister who took the Bill through Committee, was not happy and his arguments were not based on a proper analysis of the problem. The Government set up trial areas and made some money available for certain experiments to be carried out, and yet we had the ridiculous situation of the Minister of State, Department of Transport saying to the Committee, "Oh, yes, we are basing our views on experiments that were carried out in Hereford and I have first hand experience of those. I went there myself and asked people".

Mr. Speaker: May I direct the hon. Member's attention to the money resolution? He is going a little wide of that.

Mr. Rogers: I am not going particularly wide, Mr. Speaker, because I am saying that the Government are now asking for money, but during the preparatory stages of this Bill they did not ask for money to carry out properly funded experiments on the future of British transport. We ended up with the ridiculous situation of the Minister of State perambulating around Hereford chatting up people to find out what they thought of the experiments. Anyone who reads the reports of the proceedings in Committee will see the ill-founded bases of the Bill. The money that is being put forward to cover some of the difficulties that the Bill will bring about in our transport system will not be sufficient to cover the lack of awareness and lack of preparedness of the Government in reorganising the transport system.

9.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was not quite sure of her attitude to the money resolution and the amendments that relate to it, which will be taken tomorrow. At one moment she described them as massive changes and a little later she said they were tiny changes. She will have to make up her mind before tomorrow whether she regards the amendments as massive changes or tiny changes. [Interruption.] The hon. Lady made a mountain out of a molehill, because the two measures concerned with the money resolution are minor and I will reply to the debate on the two limited points within the resolution.

Ever mindful of the admonition which you, Mr. Speaker, gave to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), I should not like to stray into the tempting country which the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) strayed into when he talked about dial-a-ride and concessionary fares and the Tyne and Wear metro, or into the matter mentioned by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who talked about pensions and wondered whether the Scottish Bus Group should be denationalised. Those are matters which can quite properly be raised tomorrow. I will confine myself to the limited resolution before the House.

The first point concerns deputy traffic commissioners. Instead of having three traffic commissioners as has been the case for route service licensing, we are now to have one traffic commissioner. The practice with heavy goods vehicles has been to have one deputy traffic commissioner who will stand in for the commissioner if he is sick or on holiday or if the pressure of work is too great. Throughout the Bill's proceedings, the same practice was suggested for the traffic commissioners in the context of buses. The deputy chairmen are not employed on full-time salaried posts but are paid fees for the cases they take.

I freely admit that there was a drafting mistake, in that the Bill and the original money resolution allowed for salaries to be paid to the traffic commissioner and those he employs, but they did not permit fees to be claimed by the deputy traffic commissioners. This was an oversight, and had the Standing Committee been doing its job properly instead of wasting 44 hours on clause 1 it might have picked up the odd point such as that. However, if that was the worst mistake we made, that is not too bad.

The disabled persons transport advisory committee was established in response to our debates on the interests of the disabled. Lady Lane-Fox moved an amendment in another place to make the existing non-statutory committee a statutory one. That non-statutory committee, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, advised her and me on all matters associated with transport for the disabled. The amendment was welcomed in another place, and, from what the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich has said, it seems that this House will welcome the change.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich complained that the disabled persons transport advisory committee would have no powers to insist on this, that or the other being done, but the purpose of advisory committees is to give advice, not to have powers to insist on things being done. This committee has existed for a long time and has met with considerable success in improving public transport for the disabled.

This change, which is generally welcome both in this House and in another place, requires that the statutory committee should be rewarded only by means of expenses, but there is no power in the Bill to pay the expenses of the members of that committee. That power is not in the Bill because the committee was not statutory when the legislation was first published and went through Committee. If hon. Members wish to have a change of this sort made, they must accept the fact that an extra money resolution is needed.

Those are the two small points dealt with in this money resolution, which I commend to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Transport Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenditure of the Secretary of State—

(a) in respect of remuneration and allowances paid to deputy traffic commissioners;

(d) (b) resulting from the establishment of a Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

Farming (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

9.43 pm

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I welcome this opportunity to bring before the House the serious plight that has faced Northern Ireland agriculture during the summer as a result of adverse weather conditions. This summer has certainly been the worst in living memory. Indeed, many of the most elderly among the farming community cannot remember a worse situation facing the farmers in that part of the United Kingdom.

From June to mid-October there has been no dry spell, not even for two consecutive days throughout that time. A major cause of the problem lies in the fact that there was continuous rain day and night which, on occasions, culminated in flooding in various parts of the Province. Coupled with that, the temperature of the soil and of the air was about 2 deg. C lower than might have been expected in the summer. The continuous bad conditions caused all aspects of agriculture to suffer.

I want to outline, but not exaggerate, some of the difficulties. The prolonged periods of wet weather have wreaked havoc on the cereal and potato crops. Cereal farmers responded to the calls of Ministers who came to grain trade dinners and told them that, because of the cuts in dairy quotas, they should increase grain production. Although in Europe as a whole grain was in surplus, Northern Ireland was a deficit area. Northern Ireland is a net importer of grain. Farmers were encouraged to expand cereal production, and as a consequence many of them face ruin. Grain producers are professionals in their own right and they know how to grow cereals. They are important and must be kept in business if cereal production in Northern Ireland is to have any future.

Most of the winter wheat has been lost, as is acknowledged even by the figures of the Department of Agriculture. The winter barley has also suffered seriously. There were extra spraying costs and high drying costs. After difficult harvesting conditions, there is a poor yield. Spring barley has finally been salvaged, but again, with high drying costs and low yields, with only a limited amount of straw saved. The result is poor profits for those who depend on grain growing for their livelihood. Harvesting was most difficult, protracted and expensive.

Successive Secretaries of State and Ministers of Agriculture have encouraged the growth of alternative crops. Farmers were told not to put all their eggs in one basket. They were encouraged to produce oil seed rape —disaster. They were told to grow peas—disaster. Flax production this year has been a disaster. There is a catalogue of crop failures. So much for alternative crops in Northern Ireland.

In fairness, potato growers struggled valiantly against great odds to try to harvest their crops. Ground conditions were atrocious. Some potatoes lay under 12 to 18 inches of water for a long time. Eventually some farmers got the potatoes home. But what did they find? The potatoes looked good when they were brought from the field, but within three weeks they began to rot in their boxes. Part of the problem was caused by the weather. Blight was rampant. Even continuous spraying had no effect. In some cases, before the farmers were out of the fields, the rain had started and the day's work was washed into the ground.

A problem that I found out about only a short time ago —water slade—occurs when potatoes consume so much water that they cannot absorb any more and cannot stand against germs. When potatoes are brought to the farm, they are so weakened that germs attack them and soon the potatoes are a rotting mess.

I recently visited Rathfriland in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) where I met a farmer who had been working all year to produce 250 tonnes of potatoes. They were the sole source of his livelihood. He stood on top of those potatoes and sank into them. They were a rotting mess.

Everyone has great sympathy for the farmers, but sympathy is not enough. The farmers in South Down said that £2·5 million or £3 million was available under a stockfeed scheme, and they asked why the money could not be given to those who had ended up putting their potatoes on dumps or in bogs. They got no return for the capital invested and the work put into producing those potatoes over a whole year.

We face a difficult and serious problem. I do not denigrate officials in the Department of Agriculture in Northern Ireland who have given farmers advice, but that advice has not helped. One farmer spent £30,000 on new boxes and a forklift truck to handle them. His potatoes rotted. Another farmer bought drying equipment and did everything right—even the departmental officials agreed that he did everything right—but his potatoes rotted as well.

We are speaking of farmers' livelihoods, and we must have every sympathy for them. I ask Ministers to help men who have lost their whole production of the past year.

My constituency is known as the orchard of Ireland, but the apple producers have had difficult times because of the weather. Apple scab has been a difficult problem for the apple growers. Even though they used extra spraying, they faced similar problems to those experienced by the potato growers. Before the farmers got through the orchard gate, the day's work was lost. Up to 40 per cent. of the apple crop is virtually unmarketable this year. This is a high-cost industry, and the growers face grave difficulties.

One would not expect mushrooms to have been affected by the weather, but mushroom growers require straw, the raw material for mushroom production. Growers in my constituency employ 1,000 people—the industry is an important source of employment in my constituency. Like the apple producers, they have a large marketing organisation. I implore Ministers to ensure that both those sectors receive help. Jobs are at stake and markets that have been fought for and won over many years may be lost. Consideration should be given to bringing in straw for the mushroom growers from outside Northern Ireland and the Republic.

The majority of farmers in Northern Ireland are dependent on the grass-based sector for their living. There has been much discussion about dairy farmers recently, but in a different vein. Today the problem is not quotas, but insufficient fodder to carry the dairy cows through the winter. Many dairy farmers in Northern Ireland have had their cows inside since the middle of August. As much silage has alredy been consumed as would normally have been consumed by mid or late January. I understand that by mid-February or March they will be unable to feed the animals with the silage that they have managed to salvage.

During the past two weeks better weather in Northern Ireland, has partly helped to relieve the problem. Farmers have not sat on their thumbs waiting for help. They have done their best in those two weeks to try to salvage what little they can. However, that is not enough. There is an estimated shortfall in forage of up to 40 per cent. That problem must be dealt with in the coming months.

Beef producers have also had a serious time during the past four or five months. The grass did not have the feeding value required to help cattle to thrive, and the prices offered by the plants were much lower than last year. It was very much a buyer's market. One would have thought that the period of intervention would have eased the problem. When farmers tried to sell their cattle during the short period of intervention they rang up the local plants but were told that nothing was required. They did not require anything because more than 50 per cent. of the plants in Ireland are owned by factories originating in the Republic of Ireland. They brought thousands of cattle over the border and killed them in the plants in Northern Ireland.

If intervention is to work and provide support for the farmer, the farmer must be seen to be receiving that support. An intervention period must ensure a domiciliary period for cattle coming from the Republic of Ireland. Cattle should be kept on grass in Northern Ireland for a month, six weeks or even two months before they can be slaughtered. The Government should address themselves to the problem, because during that period farmers did not receive the benefit of intervention. The benefit went to the plant and the buyers who went to the Republic of Ireland, bought the cattle, and brought them north. They, not the farmers received the profit. At least 50 per cent. of the plants did not indulge in that practice, and I congratulate them on sticking by the people who supported them through thick and thin over the years. Those plants stuck with the farmers who had referred cattle to them in the past. However, the other plants should be condemned for bringing cattle from the Republic of Ireland. No doubt it was more profitable for them.

According to Department of Agriculture figures, in the less-favoured areas only 20 per cent. of the hay was saved, whereas in lowland areas 30 per cent. was saved——

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Mr. Neubert.]

Mr. Nicholson: I assume that there is no argument with those figures, which show how serious the fodder problem is.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): I do not doubt the accuracy of the figures quoted by my hon. Friend. However, even in the south of County Antrim, which is reckoned to be good agricultural land, many farms have no hay at all. Not even one bale has been saved.

Mr. Nicholson: I thank my right hon. Friend for that intervention. What he says is correct. In the county of Fermanagh, which has a higher rainfall than any other part of the United Kingdom, the farmers are used to such conditions and can say, "We have faced this before." However, this time the problem has spread throughout Northern Ireland. No area has been left untouched by it.

Many small farmers, especially in hill areas, depend completely on hay as fodder for their animals during the winter. They are in an impossible position. Many of them have no hay, and find it too expensive to purchase hay or silage. The most serious problems will arise during January, February and March next year, when no fodder will exist. Indeed, much of the silage and hay that has been saved is of such poor quality that farmers will need to augment its protein value with grain.

I have always been a keen supporter of intervention grain being brought to Northern Ireland, and I welcome the announcement to bring it there now. However, intervention grain will not solve the problem. I am worried about how that grain will be distributed, and I wish to be assured that it will reach those in the greatest need. I am worried that, at the end of the day, all that we shall have achieved will be to give the merchants a rich harvest at the expense of those who need grain. I want assurances that the grain will not go into silos in Belfast and never be seen again. I want assurance that the grain will be given to small hill farmers and to farmers most in need.

I am glad to see the new Secretary of State on the Front Bench tonight. He has shown great interest in the matter since it first came to his attention. When we visited the former Secretary of State, he told us that he would have discussions with the millers about producing a low-cost ration to be sold to farmers, but to date we have heard nothing of that. Are those negotiations continuing, or have the millers refused to co-operate?

I have spent much time talking about the difficulties of farmers, However, because Northern Ireland depends so much on agriculture, its problems affect many others. It affects the ancillary industries. For example, creamery workers are being let off work, and in other sectors of agriculture people are losing their jobs. When farmers do not have that little extra to spend, local shops suffer. Lime distributors, who last year told me that they could not manufacture and distribute lime fast enough, have not sold a ton this year, and they have no work.

The Government's initial response to the problem was extremely slow and left much to be desired. They may have hoped that the position would improve and that the problem would disappear. At the end of June many farmers told me that July would be better, and then that August and September would be better, and perhaps Ministers and officials thought the same. But the problem has not disappeared. It will not be good enough for them to say today that they will not know how bad the position is until the end of 1985. Farmers require today an early sign of what the Government propose to do to relieve the present crisis.

At present little winter grain has been planted. The Government should seriously consider an acreage payment to cereal and potato producers to get them back in business because many of them cannot afford to replant next year. That way those people can continue to produce and to do what they do best. There should be additional payments of the hill land compensatory amounts for the current year. Early payments of suckler cow and ewe premiums should be made, and a suspension of the six months' retention rule for suckler cow payments should be invoked. That way the Minister will at least put money into the hands of those who require it most — those who must buy the dear fodder and dear meal. There will be no cheap grain or meal.

There is a serious shortage of hay in Northern Ireland. The Government should consider making a transport subsidy to bring hay by sea to Northern Ireland to help us over the present problem. Small dairy farmers who need to buy fodder also require extra aid. Hon. Members must remember that 20 per cent. of dairy farmers depend on hay, and that not all have switched to silage. The co-responsibility levy should be abolished. That would assist all dairy farmers and would not cost the Government any extra money because the legislation has outlived its useful purpose. The Government should announce immediately the extension of the former agricultural and horticultural grants scheme to enable work to be finished because farmers have been unable even to reach their land to carry out work. As many pastures have been seriously damaged and need to be renewed, a new and higher grant rate should be introduced for a short time to ensure that the pasture is renewed and extra reseeding carried out.

I know that the Government are monitoring the position effectively, and I wish them well. I hope that they will make early recommendations on those proposals.

I suggest that a subsidised intervention is required for the apple growers in my constituency for the pulping of apples. The pulped apples should be made available to livestock farmers at an attractive price.

I have suggested some ways in which the Government could assist hard-pressed farmers. I have thrown out ideas merely as suggestions and I appreciate that other approaches could be adopted. However, I feel that some of my suggestions are worthy of urgent and immediate action.

Farmers cannot look forward to the future with any confidence, especially this coming winter. The time for talking has passed and it is now time for positive action. The Government have dragged their feet long enough. Farmers are proud and hard-working people. They do not want handouts, the dole or supplementary benefit. They want to work for a proper return on their input. I implore the Government to give them the encouragement that they require if they are to continue in business.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is an occasion resonant with historical echoes when hon. Members from Northern Ireland come to tell the Government and the House about the potatoes that have rotted in the clamps. Now in 1985, unlike 1845, we have no difficulties in persuading Ministers of reality and the seriousness of what we are telling them. It is not usual for Adjournment debates to be attended by the Minister of State and the Secretary of State. The right hon. Gentleman's presence will be marked and appreciated as a sign of his personal interest in the circumstances that have been described so vividly by my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson).

I shall take only a short time to underline one item in the long a la carte menu which my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh displayed and from which Ministers will have to select a policy that is consistent with their other obligations and with more general considerations, but whereby they may be seen to be, in the words of my hon. Friend, bringing help now to where it is needed most.

My hon. Friend referred to intervention grain. Despite what has happened in Northern Ireland and some other places, opinion seems to be agreed that the coming year will be an even more bumper year for intervention. Hitherto, the economics of utilising storage in Northern Ireland for intervention grain have not been regarded by the Department of Agriculture as favourable. Even in the coming year there may be a balance which tips slightly on the calculations against utilisation of storage in Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, the utilisation of Northern Ireland storage could be at least one method whereby assistance could be given within the framework of existing arrangements to those farmers in Northern Ireland who are most in need of it. We shall be faced with massive intervention in the coming months. Let us use what is an evil offspin of the common agricultural policy in a manner that is helpful to one part of the United Kingdom.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I join the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in their plea for assistance for agriculture in Northern Ireland. I add my plea for Scotland. Every inch of rain that fell in Northern Ireland fell with added ferocity in Scotland. If the atrocious conditions needed any elaboration, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) would give it. July, August and September were the worse months for agriculture generally that anyone in the north can remember. This has resulted in shorter supplies of hay which is of poor quality and a poor harvest of grain which is of low quality and quantity. The same goes for all other classifications of fodder.

There is sometimes no fodder in the less-favoured hill areas. That is why it is important that we should know as soon as possible the form of Government assistance that will be made available. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has said that assistance will be forthcoming, but the sooner we know what it is the better. It may come through the hill livestock compensatory amounts, the suckler cow grant system and the ewe premium. I appreciate that that does not help the dairy farmer who is in dire straits, with poor quality silage in small quantities. We may have to consider a form of headage payment for dairy cattle and an extension of the co-responsibility levy.

Every section has been hard hit, including horticulture. The only crop that seems to have done well is turnips. We must not underestimate the damage that has been done to grassland and undersown crops. The difficulty of operating combine harvesters and balers in the soft ground have serious long-term implications. I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that the conditions are as serious as hon. Members have said. I know that he has seen for himself what happened in Northern Ireland. These conditions have been duplicated in Scotland and northern England. I hope that my hon. Friend has some good news. The sooner we can plan ahead for the difficult winter, the better.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) has put on record the serious consequences for farming in Northern Ireland of the terrible weather during the summer months. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) referred to Scotland. I have been in the constituency of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh and can bear out what was said by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). Fields of hay were not gathered in. I have seen farms on my way to Newcastle and there is no doubt that this year there has been widespread destruction of the hay crop. Other areas in Northern Ireland have been similarly hard hit.

Farming in Northern Ireland is difficult enough in normal circumstances with high rainfall and a short growing season, but the continuous and exceptionally wet, dull and unsettled weather this year has hit farming extremely hard. The longer-term implications have not yet been fully evaluated, but the repercussions for many sectors of production will be serious throughout the coming winter and into 1986. I have no magic formula to solve this problem. During the past few months the weather has improved. As the old song says, spring is a little late this year. Summer this year came a little late so it has not been warm enough to dry out the ground.

I shall add to the facts given by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh and put the situation into clear perspective by telling the House that the summer of 1985 in Northern Ireland was the wettest for 25 years and in some areas of the Province the wettest for a century. There was measurable rain practically every day from mid-June to late September. I was in the area at that time and I know that it was perhaps the wettest 40 days for a long time. Rain fell almost every day. Rainfall during July was 27 per cent. to 70 per cent. above average, during August 63 per cent. to 169 per cent. above average, and during September 21 per cent. to 117 per cent. above average. During three separate periods in September, rainfall figures were so high that we would normally expect them to occur only once in 600 years. Speaking almost in competition, my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries said that the rain fell harder in Scotland. It certainly fell harder than some of us saw in Northern Ireland. There were numerous violent thunderstorms, with substantial flooding in many areas, and no sustained dry spells.

In August I went to a farm not far from Belfast where one had to be wearing gumboots before walking on what was normally a hayfield. The strongest wind and the warmest climate were the only things that could have dried out the field before the autumn cold set in. Sunshine was around 25 per cent. below average for most of the summer and average temperatures were one degree below normal in July and September and two degrees below normal in August. I recognise that the extreme bad weather also happened in Scotland, as we have heard tonight. Bad weather also occurred in parts of Wales and northern England, in my own area of the Pennines. Rainfall in central and west Scotland was generally two to two and a half times the normal. Sunshine was 25 per cent. less than average over most of Scotland and temperatures were generally below average. Northern England and the Pennines suffered similar weather to that experienced in Scotland—twice the usual amount of rain, 25 per cent. less than average sunshine and temperatures around one to two degrees lower than average.

It has to be borne in mind that there is one particular issue that we would be remiss to forget in respect of Northern Ireland. Agriculture represents a much more significant part of the economy in Northern Ireland than for the United Kingdom as a whole, so the impact of the adverse weather and the relative scale of losses and disadvantage are bound to be greater than elsewhere. The extreme livestock orientation of farming in Northern Ireland also leaves the industry more vulnerable to abnormal weather or other major influences on production.

As was said by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, the hardest hit sector is undoubtedly cattle production because of the losses of hay and silage, particularly on the small farms in the less-favoured areas which account for most of the cattle produced in Northern Ireland. The Department of Agriculture estimates that fodder production will be some 700,000 tonnes of hay equivalent below requirement, which in a normal year is 0·5 million tonnes of hay plus 5·8 million tonnes of silage. To compensate for that would require an extra 300 to 400,000 tonnes of compound feed. In that connection, I commend the initiative taken by the industry whereby the Ulster Farmers Union and certain agricultural co-operatives are trying to arrange a consignment of hay from Canada.

With regard to arable crops, the bulk of the winter wheat and a considerable proportion of winter barley, peas and flax have been lost. It was a great tragedy about flax. One thousand acres were put down to flax this year and 500 acres were put down the previous year. The whole question is linked to the revival of the linen industry in Northern Ireland. There is a shortage of flax in the world, and one cannot have a linen industry without the raw material. In Europe there is talk of butter mountains and meat mountains. We did not have a flax mountain in Northern Ireland because we had the worst possible weather at that time.

The moisture content of all grain is high. Northern Ireland depends very much on imported cereals and some farmers have been attempting to expand arable cropping to diversify out of milk because of milk quota problems, so that this year's weather has been an unfortunate setback, following the two good cereal harvests in 1983 and 1984. There are reduced yields and higher rates of disease in potato production and much of that has rotted underground or rotted when collected.

Harvesting is well under way at present, although 10 per cent. of the crop may not be worth lifting. It is expected that the inelastic demand for potatoes will mean that reduced supplies of ware potatoes are likely to be compensated by higher prices later in the year. The impact of disease losses during storage cannot yet be assessed. There may be losses in certain varieties of early seed potatoes. That again is unfortunate because Northern Ireland has a valuable export trade in seed potatoes and prices are determined by world markets rather than the quantity of local supply. The cutback will not be compensated by higher prices for what has been harvested.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh also referred to the small apple crop, which is probably unsaleable in many places. There is also a shortage of the straw that is required for mushrooms.

[Dr. Rhodes Boyson]

We cannot say exactly what the position is, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is with us this evening, and my noble Friend in the other place, who takes responsibility for agriculture, share the concern about the enormous difficulties affecting farmers. Along with other Agriculture Ministers, they will be taking measures to alleviate the losses and disadvantages. The Government cannot, of course, be expected to compensate farmers for what must be recognised as the ups and downs of farming and the fact that every year the size of the crop is different. Problems are normally created by the weather from year to year. However, we recognise that the scale of the problems that have hit Northern Ireland this year is such that it threatens the fabric of this most important and essential industry. The matter is being considered. Everything that has been said in the debate will be checked by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my noble Friend.

Last week there was a debate on the matter in the Northern Ireland Assembly, in which the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh spoke. He spoke for 27 minutes tonight and 17 minutes last week. I listed 11 matters that we shall have to examine. The hon. Gentleman expanded on eight tonight.

The position of growers who have suffered heavy crop losses is being considered. Quantitative assessment of abnormal losses by individuals is particularly difficult. Normal market forces should in some sectors compensate for shortages in supply. Certain sectors benefited from exceptionally good harvests in 1983 and 1984. Much work must be done to justify the use of public funds to compensate fairly farmers who have been careful in what they have built up over the years compared to others who have not preserved crops as they were asked to by the Department some years ago.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh referred to intervention grain. A transfer to Northern Ireland of 40,000 tonnes of wheat from intervention stores for use as animal feed is proposed. The grain is being made available at 25 per cent. discount and will be transported to Northern Ireland at EC expense. The EC will insist that that grain goes to the people who require it. I am not putting one part of the community against the other. The hon. Gentleman referred to millers in his speech last week. Our Department in Northern Ireland will insist that the grain goes to the people who need it. The EC will also make sure that that happens. I give the hon. Gentleman an assurance about that.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned fat cattle coming from the Irish Republic. He said that 50 per cent. of meat plants in the north are Republican-owned. I appreciate the points that he makes, which farmers in his area must have raised with him. However, the EC regulations make it clear that there must be a free trade in live animals and beef. Market forces thus apply, sometimes to the advantage, sometimes to the disadvantage, of Northern Ireland. Imports of fat cattle from the Republic during the first nine months of this year were 71,000 compared with 58,500 during the same period in 1984. Therefore, the increase is by no means excessive.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have listened carefully to what has been said about Northern Ireland, as well as about Scotland. A careful debate took place in the Assembly, which was followed by Ministers with responsibility for agriculture in Northern Ireland and the rest of us who take an intense interest in agriculture. I reassure the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, the right hon. Member for South Down and my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries that there will be full recognition of all that has been said. In the Department we shall consider the matter to see what can be done, knowing that these are exceptional circumstances and that, whatever happens, we must maintain the agriculture industry in Northern Ireland.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

1. Mr. Evans asked the Paymaster General what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months: and what was the figure in May 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Alan Clark): On 11 July, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,327,000, 41 per cent. of the total. The corresponding number of unemployed registrants in April 1979 was 367,000.

Mr. Evans: Does the Minister accept that long-term unemployment is now the greatest problem facing our society—a problem that was scarcely noticeable under the Labour Government, but is major under the Tory Government? How does the hon. Gentleman think the two Cabinet Ministers will solve the problem when one Secretary of State for Employment could not?

Mr. Clark: The House will agree with the hon. Gentleman's assessment of long-term unemployment, which carries with it a sense of rejection and degradation and is a source of great concern to us all. It is for this reason that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State has set in train a number of initiatives devised specifically to bring the long-term unemployment back into the purlieu of the employment service, to make known to them all the facilities that are available and to make fresh contact with them, whether by post or by inviting them into jobcentres. I hope that the increasing economic activity will help bring this intractable problem towards a solution.

Mr. Powley: Does my hon. Friend agree that one among the many reasons for the level of unemployment is the demographic changes taking place, and that the number of people seeking employment has gone up dramatically over the past few years, which did not happen 10 years ago? Does the he agree further that in the years to come those demographic changes will alter today's position and that to ignore this factor is to ignore one of the reasons for the present level of unemployment?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is right. It is true that the number of jobs continues to go up and that we have increased it by 350,000. If the population of working age had stayed at the same levels, unemployment would now be in the 2 million range.

Mr. Hardy: What steps are the Government taking to monitor and respond to the situation in constituencies such as mine where jobs are being destroyed at a pace and to an extent that would not have been imaginable in 1979? Does the hon. Gentleman deny that in 12 months' time the position in such areas will be a great deal worse than it is today?

Mr. Clark: It is true, regrettably, that there are parts of the United Kingdom where the old technologies are obsolete and were new businesses have not yet been established. However, if the hon. Gentleman looks at the national picture he will see that the number of vacancies is higher than it has ever been during the last decade.

Mr. Wainwright: Is the Minister aware that the special measures that the Government have made available to the long-term unemployed are so modest as in no way to approach what is needed to solve the problem? Will he undertake that his right hon. and noble Friend will come to Parliament with a scheme which will provide every long-term unemployed person with the opportunity of renewed work or at least work experience?

Mr. Clark: The House knows that we are already spending £2 billion of taxpayers' money on special employment and training measures, but it is hard to believe that permanent and lasting jobs could be created from this source after the tap of taxpayers' money had been cut off, or after, as would be the case if there were a Labour Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer came scuttling back from the International Monetary Fund with his marching orders. Real jobs can be created only by increasing business and enterprise activity.

Job Seekers

3. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied that all those classified as unemployed are actively seeking work.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): No, Sir. Latest estimates for 1984 show that nearly one third of those included in the unemployment count were either not actively seeking work or had a paid job during the week of the survey.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Has my hon. Friend seen the recent article by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown)? Is it not scurrilous that he should attempt to "rubbish" statistics produced by an independent survey which were accurately and fairly presented by the Secretary of State for Employment in a an article in The Times?

Mr. Trippier: I think that "scurrilous" is the word. The survey to which my hon. Friend refers is the labour force survey, which was carried out in no fewer than 57,000 homes. It is regarded both in and out of Whitehall as a non-political, independent and widely-accepted source of statistical information. I find it interesting that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has used that survey to his advantage when referring to second jobs. The Labour party does not like good news. Last year Britain created more new jobs than the whole of Europe put together. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East is particularly scornful of the estimated growth in the number of self-employed. The official estimate of an increase of 393,000 is based upon the same statistical inquiry, the labour force survey.

Mr. Leighton: Is the Minister aware that in any "snapshot" of the unemployed we see that people do not look for work in a particular week because they are realistic and know that work is not available? Does he realise that the annual survey found that 870,000 workers were seeking work but that they were not included in the figures because they were not entitled to benefits? I hope that he will not mock the unemployed by emulating Jeffrey Archer and suggesting that they are workshy and malingerers. That is not true. Does the Minister not realise that in six years of Conservative government unemployment has risen consistently every year? Is he not ashamed of that fact?

Mr. Trippier: It is not my intention, nor that of my colleagues, to mock the unemployed. However, we are sick to the back teeth of the Labour party's claim that it has a monopoly of compassion. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that he has the answer and that there is an easy solution to this problem, will he explain to the House in some detail why unemployment rose so dramatically when the Labour Government were in office?

Mr. Watts: Is my hon. Friend aware that in my constituency 4,600 people are registered as unemployed and that 82 per cent. of companies report difficulty over recruiting skilled labour, including companies in the engineering industry? At the skillcentre, 24 places are available on engineering courses, but the average occupancy rate is only eight, and the course is therefore to be curtailed. Is my hon. Friend satisfied that sufficient is being done to draw to the attention of the registered unemployed the fact that there are great opportunities to retrain for jobs, which are available in large numbers?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend is correct. Vacancies notified to MSC jobcentres are only about one third of the true level. Employers are best placed to tackle the many possible causes of shortages by training and retraining. That is why we have adopted the adult training strategy which allows for national Government and local grants to help industry meet its skill requirements. We hope that employers in my hon. Friend's constituency and throughout the country will take advantage of that assistance.

Mr. Prescott: I add my congratulations to the Minister of State and the Paymaster General on their appointments, although I deplore the fact that the Secretary of State for Employment is in a non-elected place, from where he throws insults at the labour force by calling them work shy.

May I encourage the Paymaster General and the Secretary of State to set a precedent in their Department by giving us the real unemployment facts? Do they recognise that their labour force survey reveals that 870,000 people are available for work but not registered? That means that the official unemployment level is well over 4 million and between three and four times greater than that which the Conservative Government inherited in 1979.

Mr. Trippier: On behalf of myself and my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General, I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. He was kinder than he thinks because he promoted me to Minister of State. The hon. Gentleman is perhaps a little late in referring to the fact that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State is a non-elected Member, because Mr. Bickerstaff mentioned that at the Labour party conference. That was surprising, since he was elected for life by that famous British institution known as the block vote. The truth is that the statistical survey is accurate. The hon. Gentleman is wrong in that he referred only to the 870,000 people who are not claiming benefit but who are looking for and taking jobs. That point was made in the article that my right hon. and noble Friend wrote on 5 October. The hon. Gentleman must take into account the fact that 940,000 people are claiming benefit but not looking for work.

Mr. Baldry: Does my hon. Friend agree that one must look behind the statistics? Does he accept that the largest number of long-term unemployed are in the south-east, the area with the largest number of job vacancies? In the south-east, about 9,000 job vacancies have remained unfilled for two months or more, when 12 per cent. of CBI firms report that labour shortages are the reason for restricted output in the future. The MSC has identified 173 occupational areas with labour shortages. Is not one of the problems that unemployment benefit officers know who is unemployed but do not know where the jobs are, while the jobcentres know where the jobs are but do not know who is unemployed?

Mr. Trippier: We are well aware of the difficulties caused by the fewer job opportunities in the north compared with the south. That is one of the principal reasons for a regional policy. As a northern Member, I am well aware of the difficulties. It is important to stress the adult training strategy and the many pluses and achievements which have resulted from the youth training scheme. That scheme is without doubt a success and is recognised as such by those who take advantage of it.

Byssinosis

5. Mr. James Lamond asked the Paymaster General how many claims have been made under the Pneumoconiosis etc. (Workers Compensation) Act 1979 for compensation for byssinosis sufferers in the last year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): In the 12 months to 30 September 1985 there were 66 claims.

Mr. Lamond: Is the Minister aware that that number would be increased considerably if he reconsidered the scheme and changed the rules? If he did that, many hundreds who deserve the compensation, including many in my constituency who are debarred from claiming the lump sum compensation because they once worked for a firm which is still in existence, would be given the chance to obtain it? Is he aware that traditionally in the textile industry people work for a number of firms?

Mr. Bottomley: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his persistence. We exchanged correspondence on this issue earlier in the year. The Act operates when the previous employer is still in business. It is important for people to make claims against previous employers who are still in business.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister aware that it is all very well for him to give the number of applications, but that it would be interesting to know the number of rejections? Have not many applications been rejected, yet when the post mortems were carried out the applicants were found to be riddled with the disease? I want the Minister to investigate the problem and do something about it.

Mr. Bottomley: I anticipated the hon. Gentleman's point, and so can tell him that 2,534 cases have been approved and fewer than 500 rejected. More than £16 million has been paid to byssinosis sufferers since the Act came into force.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that there is a danger that some people might fall between two stools because they have worked for companies which have become defunct and companies which are still in existence, so that the buck is passed backwards and forwards?

Is the Minister aware that a group of people suffering from emphysema or chronic bronchitis may not obtain full recognition under the 1979 Act? Is there not a case for reviewing the Act to ensure that those people are treated fairly?

Mr. Bottomley: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for the part that he has played in the implementation of the Act. We intend to extend the range of the Act, but I cannot offer much progress on his other points.

Labour Statistics

7. Mr. Litherland asked the Paymaster General how many people are currently employed in the United Kingdom; and how many were in employment in May 1979.

12. Mr. Skinner asked the Paymaster General how many people were in employment in May 1979; and how many are in employment now.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): In June 1985 there were 24,245,000 people in employment in the United Kingdom. In June 1979 there were 25,375,000.

Mr. Litherland: Does the Minister agree that the figures are grim, and that if translated into inner city areas are horrific? Is he aware that 20,000 jobs have been lost in one area of my constituency in recent years, that there is 60 per cent. male unemployment, and that the last steel manufacturing mill closed only two weeks ago?

Does the Minister not think that it is the height of hypocrisy to give those people hope when it is the design and deliberate policy of the Government to create unemployment?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that the figures on employment have been quite encouraging since the spring of 1983. On the best objective estimates, 677,000 new jobs have been created in the British economy since then. Obviously, we must do everything possible to speed up the process of creating new jobs now that we have sustained growth in the economy.

I know that there is bad news in the inner cities, which is why the city action teams are concentrating on co-ordinating the vast amount of Government money being put into those areas. There is also good news in Manchester with the development of the exhibition centre at Manchester Central station, which will create a great deal of new, permanent employment in the city.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not true that in the main those in new employment since June 1983 are part-time workers? [Interruption.] I remind Conservative Members that they are the last people who should speak about part-time employment, because most of them are engaged in it. [Interruption.] There are about 300—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has as much right as anyone to speak.

Mr. Skinner: I do not need any lessons from the moonlighters on the Conservative Benches.

Is the Minister aware that the Northern Bus Company has stated during the past few days that, because of the Government's Transport Bill, 25 per cent. of its employees will be made redundant—either compulsorily or voluntarily? Are the Government concerned only with propping up the casino economy—banks that go into default and financial institutions? Have they not attacked the industrial base every week of every year that they have been in office?

Mr. Clarke: I notice that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has just taken his place. If he had been here sooner, instead of engaging in some part-time occupation, his earlier question could have been answered.

A substantial proportion of the new jobs being created are part time and self employed. That reflects the social change that has been taking place for many years, and which will continue to be reflected as we create employment in a modern economy.

The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is not committed to social change. He prefers traditional industry with traditional organisation inside that industry. We are creating an economy in which more people will be employed in service industries, which is the pattern of other developed economies. I am sorry that that does not fit the hon. Gentleman's political preconceptions.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my right hon. and learned Friend remember a speech made in 1978 by a former Labour Minister, the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), in which he said that he could accurately predict the levels of unemployment as they are now, that they would be due entirely to demographic factors and that it would be wrong for anyone to blame them on either a Labour or a Conservative Government? What has changed since then—the facts of the real world, or the fact that Labour Members no longer live in the real world?

Mr. Clarke: The Government have a duty to create the conditions in which more employment can be created, and I agree with my hon. Friend that it is wrong for Labour Members to change their view simply because they are in opposition. It is equally wrong for them to propose policies based on arbitrary figures plucked out of the air about the number of people who would be employed if they were in office and to promise glibly, as the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) does, a return to full employment, when he knows that many of the conditions required to achieve that are beyond the control of the Government.

Mr. Lester: Will my right hon. and learned Friend point out, amid the constant cries of bad news from the Opposition, the good news that Wrighton is developing its factory in Coventry and that International Harvester is reopening in Sheffield, an area of high unemployment? It is not all bad news.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend, who is right to point out that in the present economic situation one can select good and bad news. We have sustained growth in the economy, rising output, record-breaking investment and new employment being created. The task of everyone is to maintain that progress and speed up the development of new jobs.

Ms. Richardson: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that mainly women are being forced into part-time jobs which are badly paid and have bad conditions? for example, many of them lack holidays and other entitlements. Does he also agree, as he referred to training for full-time employment, that his Department would do well to change the rules back and allow married women to take part in the community programme?

Mr. Clarke: One reason why the increased rate of employment is not reducing the total of unemployed is that many more women are entering the labour market. It is a perfectly desirable consequence of social changes that they should be doing that, but it follows that many of them are actively looking for part-time work. They are jobs that people require and that are of value to the economy, so there is no point in dismissing part-time employment.

The answer to the hon. Lady's question about the community programme is that, in my view, it is right that the programme should concentrate on the needs of the long-term unemployed. The first aim of the community programme must be to make it easier for those people to get themselves back into the world of employment. Other aims must be subordinate to that.

Mr. Fallon: As the biggest single source of new employment is likely to be self employment, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider changing the rules to allow the status of self employment as of right rather than as a privilege surrendered by the Treasury?

Mr. Clarke: About one tenth of the work force is self employed, the highest figure for 60 years. From an examination of international examples and the experience of good advanced economies elsewhere, one can expect that proportion to increase. At the same time, we must not have abuse of the status of self employment for tax and insurance purposes. Having said that, it is good news that we have just reduced the national insurance contribution for the self employed, thus reducing a burden on them when they create their own businesses and provide employment for others.

Trade Unions (Political Funds)

8. Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to the numbers of unions that have now undertaken the balloting of their members on the political fund following recent legislation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: According to press reports, 19 trade unions have recently completed political fund review ballots.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Government be congratulating union members, including members of the Minister's union, the TGWU, on the way in which they voted—by such overwhelming majorities—to retain their political funds? Is the Minister aware that one of the many reasons why union members have voted in that way is the unfairness of the law in that companies which donate for political purposes do not need to have political ballots? When will the Government ensure that companies must have political funds and conduct ballots if they wish to contribute to the Tory party?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman is one of those who have tried to explain during the passage of various pieces of legislation how difficult it would be for unions to have ballots. The ballot held by the Transport and General Workers Union has shown that instead of having about 30,000 members contracted out, 120,000 voted against the political levy. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman should join me in making it plain to others —the 100,000—how they and many others can contract out.

Mr. Rowe: Having sat through the proceedings on the Trade Union Bill in Committee, when the intention to ballot trade unions on the political levy was fought tooth and nail by the Opposition, does my hon. Friend share my astonishment that the Opposition should now be crowing over some kind if victory? The victory is for the arguments advanced by the Government, to the effect that trade union members should be given a proper chance to make their views clear.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is right. It is clear that if the ballots had taken place a year ago, the results may have been very different. It is clear also that if ballots are held again in nine or 10 years' time, the results may be different. If that were not so, there would be no reason for the Opposition to say that they will take away the right of union members to review every 10 years whether to have a political levy. If the Opposition were not frightened of trade union members, they would not want to alter the provisions that are set out in the Act.

Mr. Prescott: The Minister is always proudly proclaiming that he is a member of the Transport and General Workers Union. As he believes that ballots provide a chance of giving trade union members the right to control their unions, will he tell us whether he participated in the ballot that was held by the TGWU, and give us his views?

Mr. Bottomley: My views are well known. I contributed to the political levy for years. As the Government have made plain, if we want democratic elections we must allow people to decide for themselves which way they will vote.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours: Did the hon. Gentleman vote?

Mr. Bottomley: I have given the same answer on all the ballot issues and I shall continue to maintain it, however much, and irrespective of the way in which people shout at union branch meetings. Secret ballots are designed to be just that.

Labour Statistics

9. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Paymaster General how many young people are currently unemployed.

Mr. Trippier: On 11 July 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of unemployed claimants aged under 18 years in the United Kingdom was 177,600.

Mr. Hamilton: Will the Minister concede that it is a diabolical scandal when such figures are presented to the House? Has he read the survey prepared by Marplan, which states categorically that three out of four of those interviewed took the view tht the Government do not care two hoots about unemployment and creating jobs for the unemployed? Is he aware that the survey reveals that many of those who are on the youth training scheme regard it a a cheap form of employment? Will he urge his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who, is, of course, a member of the Cabinet, to flex his muscles and get the Government's policy changed in order to get young people back to work as quickly as possible?

Mr. Trippier: It is disgraceful of the hon. Gentleman to say that the Government do not care two hoots about youth unemployment. That is a ridiculous assertion. Earlier in the year, with the publication of the White Paper on education and training, the Government stated they hoped that unemployment among young people under 18 years of age would become a thing of the past. The hon. Gentleman seeks to rubbish the YTS. He forgets that the scheme was put forward by the MSC, and that the TUC, which is an effective and strong member of the MSC, supports it. He tries to rubbish the YTS, but 84 per cent. of trainees are satisfied and find the scheme to be valuable. The hon. Gentleman should be rather more careful in what he says.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend will know that the chairman of the British Tourist Authority has said that if the Government are prepared to put up £5 million for the promotion of tourism, he believes that he can raise a further £10 million from private industry. That £15 million would generally generate £200 million worth of new business, which would be worth about 10,000 new jobs, many of which would go to young people. Would my hon. Friend be prepared to support such a scheme?

Mr. Trippier: I am aware that Mr. Duncan Bluck, the chairman of the British Tourist Authority, has said what my hon. Friend has attributed to him.. I have had the pleasure of meeting him, and in the near future I shall have the opportunity again of meeting him and members of his board. I shall examine what he says in great detail. I hope the House will welcome the fact that tourism is now the responsibility of the Department of Employment and that there is a clear recognition not only of the wealth creation, but the employment potential, of tourism.

Mr. Sheerman: Does the hon. Gentleman really care about unemployed young people? Will the Government use this occasion to dissociate themselves from the statement by Jeffrey Archer on the well-known radio programme "The World This Weekend", when he insulted all young people? Will the Government also dissociate themselves from the remarks of Lord Young, who said that there was no relationship between levels of 60 and 80 per cent. of black young people unemployment in our inner-city areas and recent urban disturbances? If the Government do not use this opportunity to do something, they are no more that a bunch of Pinocchios manipulated from somewhere else.

Mr. Trippier: Before the hon. Gentleman is carried away with his own rhetoric, let me assure him that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State has gone to enormous lengths to show that the Government, and this Department in particular, are extremely concerned about the level of unemployment. We have said that time and again.

The hon. Gentleman referred to an interview of Jeffrey Archer on Radio 4. I heard that programme, and I have read the transcript. I assure the hon. Gentleman that he is distorting what was said by Mr. Archer. He actually said, "I am not saying there are not groups who are not genuinely in need."

Mr. Soames: Is my hon. Friend aware that in many places where there are jobs, as in my constituency, there is a shortage of housing? What can he do to help young people to find accommodation in a situation like that?

Mr. Trippier: It is part of the trading strategy to which I referred when answering an earlier question. We should encourage employers, wherever possible, either to bus people into work or to look favourably on housing.

Wages Councils

11. Mr. Dixon asked the Paymaster General how many representations he has received about his announcement on the future of wages councils.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received 64 representations on the future of wages councils since my right hon. Friend's announcement on 17 July.

Mr. Dixon: Is it not a disgrace that, of the 94 nations which are signatories to the ILO convention, the United Kingdom should be the first nation to renounce it? Is it not criminal that the Government, at a time when they have accepted the recommendations of the Top Salaries Review Body which has awarded judges, admirals and generals massive pay increases of up to 47 per cent., should be attacking those at the bottom of the wages scale? To get those in high salaried positions to work harder the Government gave them massive salary increases, but those on low salaries are to have their wages cut in order to make them work harder.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the position. Our reason for proposing reform is that we think that this particularly Edwardian method of fixing wages is nowadays reducing the job prospects of many young people. For that reason, we are quite sure that a simplified system will still give protection, where it is required, but will make it easier for young people to find jobs in the trades covered. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman, first, on remembering to be here, and, secondly, on remembering what his question was about.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in the main there is nothing wrong with wages councils? However, in one area, to which he has already referred, something must be done about their ability to fix young people's wages at too high a level. If my right hon. and learned Friend can deal with that, he can keep the wages councils and still provide more jobs for young people within the limits of the labour market and wages.

Mr. Clarke: As my right hon. Friend announced in July, that is broadly the Government's intention. It appears that wages councils have fixed the pay for younger workers at too high a level in relation to adult workers in the trades covered by the councils. Therefore, the councils are unintentionally reducing the number of jobs that could be offered to young people. We intend to act to do something about that.

Mr. Speaker: Ms. Clare Short.

Mr. Roger King: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Ms. Clare Short.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman admit, on the basis of the consultation on his document, that the overwhelming majority of people oppose the Government's policy of weakening and undermining the wages councils? What is his evidence for the Government's amazing suggestion that the only way in which jobs can be created is by cutting the wages of the poorest workers? Today the right hon. and learned Gentleman has suggested that young people who earn £40 or £50 a week are earning too much. Will he comment on the research commissioned by the National Union of Tailors and Garment Workers from the department of applied economics at Cambridge university, which demonstrates that the only bit of research evidence that the Government had to support their case was fabricated and ill-informed? That research was published this week, and we should like the Government to comment on it.

Mr. Clarke: Not for the first time economists at Cambridge university are disagreeing among themselves. A number of their studies have come to varying conclusions. A few moments ago I thought that there was agreement on both sides of the House that we should strive to increase employment and improve employment prospects. The moment the Government move to remove unnecessary regulations in the wages market and an outmoded method of fixing young workers' pay and to set out the details of all terms and conditions for workers in certain industries, the Opposition object and defend past practices. We are convinced that the changes we are making will increase job opportunities for many people in the industries affected.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the reason why 50 per cent. of young people in Germany go into apprenticeships and only 5 per cent. of young people in Britain do so is that in this country young people have been effectively priced out of jobs by trade unions, supported by wages councils wage rates?

Mr. Clarke: If we do not break the practices that are developing in some industries, whereby inexperienced school leavers move almost immediately to adult wage rates based on national negotiations, we shall merely ensure that youth unemployment is too high. It is for that reason that the Government are acting with respect to wages councils and other matters.

Youth Training Scheme (Managing Agencies)

13. Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with Manpower Services Commission procedures for monitoring youth training scheme managing agencies.

Mr. Trippier: Yes, Sir. By the end of July this year nearly every current programme under the youth training scheme had been monitored.

Mr. Park: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in spite of that information, we continue to receive reports that many of the schemes are still used as a source of cheap labour and that the quality of the training is not up to the standards that we should expect to enable young people to move from a training scheme to a job?

Mr. Trippier: Seventy five per cent. of the schemes to which I referred in my substantive answer meet all the required standards of YTS. Those that do not—which fall down on relatively minor points—can be put right within the life of the programme. On several occasions the Opposition, not least the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) who talks about slave labour markets, have said that this is a cheap form of labour. The right hon. Gentleman wants in this country the sort of society that would breed that kind of slave labour. The money that is made available is an allowance. It is not meant to be a wage.

Mr. Bellingham: As my hon. Friend is anxious to encourage unemployed people to set up businesses on their own account, will he inform the House of the success of the enterprise allowance scheme? Why do the Opposition rubbish a good scheme and fail to recognise one when they see it?

Mr. Trippier: Whenever they can, the Opposition try to rubbish the enterprise allowance scheme. This scheme has been an enormous success. During the past two years 100,000 businesses have been set up under the scheme. Three out of four of those businesses have succeeded. The cost per job is £2,600, which compares favourably with similar schemes.

Employment Creation

14. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to assist small areas of particularly high unemployment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government have recently set up city action teams to cover each inner city partnership area to co-ordinate and improve the impact of the very substantial Government assistance already available in these areas. We are reviewing the way in which Government resources might be better targeted to give the most effective assistance there and in other localities of particularly high unemployment.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that the artificial travel-to-work areas hide pockets of huge unemployment — often unemployment of more than 50 per cent.? Will he at least extend to those small areas the meagre assistance that is given to assisted areas? The travel-to-work areas are hidden because of the way in which the system operates.

Mr. Clarke: I agree that the incidence of unemployment varies between travel-to-work areas. They are defined as travel-to-work areas because it is usually possible to move about in a city to find work. It is impossible to break cities down into little self-contained labour markets as a way of otherwise defining the figures. I agree that there are other areas outside the partnership areas where we need to examine particular problems. I do not agree that assistance in the partnership areas is meagre. It amounts to £670 million across all Government programmes.

Mr. Roger King: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it would assist areas of very high unemployment, such as Erdington and Sparkbrook in Birmingham and elsewhere, if Labour local authorities did not make big rate increases like Birmingham's increase of 43 per cent.?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. One finds repeatedly that those who speak most vociferously locally about the lack of new employment going to their cities are councilors who are raising their rates and making their cities unattractive for any kind of new business, and small businesses in particular.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Colvin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Colvin: In welcoming my right hon. Friend back from her travels, may I ask her to find time today to note that her demonstration of resolute leadership and statesmanship in Nassau and New York — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading"]—not only gave the Conservative party a lead in the opinion polls, but made us favourites to win the next general election? Will she maintain that resolute leadership on the international scene to combat the killer drugs trade, which is one of the country's growing social evils?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As he knows, I raise the vital problem of drugs in whatever international forum I attend, whether the United Nations, Nassau, or an economic summit or the European Council, because I am anxious to get as much co-operation as possible. It is necessary not only to take action in this country; but to try to stop the cultivation overseas of the plants which are used to make these drugs. We have recently given more money for that. We have also increased the numbers of Customs officers and the Metropolitan police. I find increasing consciousness in statesmen of all countries that we must together take action to defeat this menace.

Mr. Steel: As the Prime Minister is partially responsible for the security services, will she, in the light of the expensive fiasco of the Cyprus spy trial, reconsider her persistent refusal to countenance the setting up of a parliamentary supervisory committee on the security services? Is she aware that the United States Congress has such a committee? Why should we not have one? Will she consider it in the light of the report which Lord Hooson is preparing on the lessons to be learnt from the trial, of which I will send her a copy?

The Prime Minister: No. I believe that we have taken the right decision on the fundamental matter. The only problem that arises immediately for me, as distinct from those that will be dealt with in a statement later by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, is the Security Commission. I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that I decided in June 1984 that, given the gravity of the apparent breaches of security and the length of time the trial proceedings would be likely to take, it would be right to make an immediate reference to the Security Commission. The reference was not announced at the time, in order not in any way to prejudice the course of justice. In view of the acquittals, I will, of course, consult the chairman of the Security Commission and report to the House in due course.

Mr. Ewing: May I take the first opportunity that we have had in the House to congratulate the Prime Minister on becoming an old-age pensioner during the recess? Is she aware that if this had happened under a Labour Government and she had been entitled to claim benefit, she and Dennis would have got £9·50 a week more than they would get under this Government?

The Prime Minister: I note that under a Labour Government we would frequently have missed our Christmas bonus, which we would never have done under this Government.

Q2. Mr. Warren asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Warren: I recognise that there has been rapid growth in business productivity and excellent growth in new businesses under my right hon. Friend's leadership —those facts are undeniable—but will my right hon. Friend, as a scientist, turn her attention to the future standards of science in our community? Is she aware that there is grave concern in the scientific community about the way in which we are losing our strength in the world of international science which is the seed corn of our future wealth?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend takes a great deal of interest in this subject, but I do not think that the problem is a lack of scientific work being done here. The problem is that we are not so good as our competitors at turning that work to technical advantage and industrial profit. I believe that we should concentrate on that aspect. On the question of pure science, I recently opened the new Spallation neutron source which is an excellent way of exploring the structure of matter, and which will be of great advantage to this country. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend will concentrate his attention on how the results of our work can be turned into industrial profit and jobs.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: If a member of the right hon. Lady's Cabinet makes a speech criticising the policy of her Government, should he resign, or should he be sacked?

The Prime Minister: I think he would realise that he has a very tolerant Prime Minister.

Q3. Mr. Ward asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ward: Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who try to undermine the police have special blame from the rest of the community? Will she take this opportunity to confirm that she will make available to the police the men and equipment that may be needed to ensure that there will never be any no-go areas anywhere in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is vital that there should not be any no-go areas in the United Kingdom, but for that purpose we need not only the numbers of police, properly equipped, but the full co-operation of the local citizenry and leaders of the community, because keeping law and order is the task of the whole country as well as of the police.

Mr. Wigley: In condemning international terrorism in all circumstances, will the Prime Minister take the opportunity to condemn the action of the French Government in relation to the Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior in New Zealand?

The Prime Minister: I think that the French Government have already made their apologies on that matter. We are doing all that we possibly can to assist New Zealand in finding the facts.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Prime Minister find time today to go to the South Bank to see the statue of Nelson Mandela erected by the GLC and unveiled yesterday by Oliver Tambo, president of the African National Congress of South Africa? While Mr. Tambo is in this country, will she seek to have talks with him to find out what is really going on in South Africa and explain to him why her Government are still the mainstay of the racist regime in South Africa?

The Prime Minister: The answers to the hon. Gentleman's questions in the order in which they were raised are, first, no, and, secondly, that I note that at a press conference in the House on 25 October Mr. Tambo said:

"We are going to step up the struggle. It is going to accelerate. The ANC embraces violence. We are going to intensify the struggle."

Then, in the TV-am programme on Sunday, he said:

"The ANC will go to every conceivable length to destroy the apartheid system in South Africa. The escalated armed struggle cannot avoid the use of guns."

Is that what the GLC supports?

Q4. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Walker: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the anxiety felt in this country about air safety. Can she confirm that the Government have every confidence in the integrity and professionalism of the accident investigations branch? Does she condemn the acts of a television company which is conducting the trial by television of a matter that is still under investigation—the fire disaster at Manchester airport?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that we can find out the causes of such a terrible accident in that way. I visited Manchester airport. It is a most impressive airport. One can only be impressed by the services which came to the aid of all the people on that aircraft during that terrible, tragic accident. I met the Chief Inspector of Accidents. I have every confidence in him and in the fact that he will conduct a full and wide-ranging investigation into that accident. Because of the complexities, the final report will take many months to produce. It is that investigation that will sort out the causes.

Mr. Kinnock: In the current Government discussions on public spending, the Foreign Secretary wants more for overseas aid, the Secretary of State for the Environment wants more for housing and the Secretary of State for Social Services wants more to maintain child benefit. Does the Prime Minister support them, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer in resisting them?

The Prime Minister: I support the taxpayer, out of whose pocket it all comes.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister realise that the overwhelming majority of taxpayers, who also have strong consciences, now have a Prime Minister who is prepared to watch the spread of starvation in the Third world, further decay of housing in our country and the further impoverishment of families? Does she think that, with her attitude, she truly leads a nation that is of good conscience?

The Prime Minister: All the expenditure that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make comes out of the pockets of those people—that is a fact that he is always trying to run away from—and 40 per cent. of income tax comes from those on average earnings and less. I do not notice them saying that, they have sufficient take-home pay. If they were saying that, we should not have so many wage claims, which he supports all the way along the line.

Q5. Mr. John Townend asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Townend: Is my right hon. Friend aware that she has overwhelming support among thousands of workers whose jobs depend upon trade with South Africa for her stand against sanctions? Did the Commonwealth conference consider taking action against Zimbabwe, Sri Lanka and Uganda, whose security forces are responsible for far more deaths resulting from police action against rioters than are those in South Africa?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friends know that, among other matters, I can see little point in sanctions which will create more unemployment in this country, only to create more unemployment in South Africa. That seems to me to be a ridiculous policy and one that would not work.

With regard to the other matter, violence is never acceptable as an instrument of political change. The sooner we get that message home, the better. The Opposition will not agree with that, but the Government say that violence is never acceptable as an instrument of political change.

Mr. Faulds: In her opposition to international terrorism, would the Prime Minister care to comment on the Israeli bombing attacks in Tunis and the American piracy in forcing an Egyptian plane to land in Sicily, which then nearly led to Italian troops, in defending Italian sovereignty, having to shoot American soldiers who wanted to take the Palestinians straight to the United States?

The Prime Minister: With regard to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, we have in fact condemned the attack on Tunis.

With regard to the second part, an act of piracy had already occurred in taking over a cruise ship. I believe that the United States was fully justified in attempting to bring those pirates to justice.

Q6. Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stern: Will my right hon. Friend join many Conservative Members in welcoming the final passage today of the Transport Bill, which will lead to a wider spread and more reliable public transport system, which has been fast disappearing over many years?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I shall be better pleased when the Bill completes its passage. It will end a system under which fares were going up and up, subsidies were going up and up, and services were going down and down. I believe that we shall get better service as a result of the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Freeson: Is it the Prime Minister's intention to restore to the inner cities the £2,000 million of resources that have been removed over the past few years?

The Prime Minister: Since 1979 the Government have allocated £1,900 million in urban programme grants to inner cities. The urban programme has more than tripled from £93 million in 1978-79 to £338 million in 1985-86 —[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has the brains to work it out for himself. The programme has more than tripled, from £93 million in 1978-79 to £338 million in 1985-86. We need to look not only at the amounts but at the use to which the money is put. We want to get far more value for money rather than increase the money available.

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In future, could you try to restrict the amount of time taken by Ministers in replying to questions? Some of the statements, which were not replies, were supercilious and, indeed, stopped me asking question No. 15, which is very important.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be a very good practice in the House if questions and answers could be briefer.

Commonwealth Meeting

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): I will, with permission, Mr. Speaker, make a brief statement on my visits to Nassau for the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting from 16-22 October, and to New York on 23-24 October for the 40th anniversary of the United Nations. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary accompanied me to Nassau.

I have arranged for copies of the communiqué from the Commonwealth meeting to be placed in the Library of the House.

Much of our time at that meeting was devoted to the problems of South Africa. We were unanimous in our abhorrence of apartheid, in our wish to see fundamental peaceful change in South Africa as soon as possible, and in our desire to find practical ways in which the Commonwealth could help secure that objective.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary has already told the House, we reached an agreement which was endorsed by all 46 Governments attending the meeting. That agreement is set out in the Commonwealth accord on South Africa. I wish to emphasise four points from the accord.

First, we called on the South African Government to establish a dialogue with representatives of the black community with a view to establishing a non-racial and representative government. Secondly, the dialogue should be initiated in the context of a suspension of violence on all sides. Thirdly, we agreed to set up a group of eminent Commonwealth persons to encourage and facilitate dialogue. Fourthly, we agreed on a programme of common action which incorporated a number of measures which we were already taking, together with two new measures of which my right hon. and learned Friend has already informed the House.

The Commonwealth accord is a clear political signal from the united members of the Commonwealth of the need for rapid change within South Africa as well as of the need for the South African Government to end their illegal occupation of Namibia. We shall review the situation in six months' time.

The Commonwealth Heads of Government agreed on a number of other matters, including a declaration on world order reaffirming the support of the Commonwealth for the United Nations, a welcome for the report of the Commonwealth Consultative Group on the vulnerability of small states; the need for greater co-operation both to counter the international traffic in illicity drugs and to deny to those convicted of drug trafficking the proceeds of their crime, and the need for greater co-operation to prevent and combat terrorism.

I believe that the outcome of the meeting demonstrated the capacity of the Commonwealth, despite widely varying initial views, to reach a sensible and realistic agreement acceptable to all Governments. Its rejection of violence as a way to solve the problems of South Africa is of particular importance. I believe that the outcome of the meeting is one which fully meets the interests and concerns of the United Kingdom.

I subsequently visited New York from 23 to 24 October to address the 40th anniversary session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and for meetings with other Heads of Government. I held bilateral discussions with President Reagan, Prime Minister Craxi, Prime Minister Peres, Premier Zhao Ziyang and the Secretary-General of the United Nations. I also attended a meeting with President Reagan and the Heads of Government of Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and Japan to discuss the forthcoming meeting of the President and Mr. Gorbachev. We expressed our support for, and confidence in, President Reagan's approach to this important meeting and we wish him well.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): We welcome the Prime Minister's further condemnation of apartheid in her statement but regret that she undermines the force of her words against apartheid by saying that she is willing to take only a "tiny little bit" of action against apartheid.

The Prime Minister has spoken on previous occasions of "signals" to South Africa. Does she not realise that the inconsistency between her words and her actions signals only comfort to President Botha and those of his regime? Is she further aware that leaders of opinion in South Africa, including Desmond Tutu, reject her excuses for not imposing tougher sanctions as sophistries, and that many inside and outside South Afrjca agree with that estimate of her attitude?

On 25 July the right hon. Lady told the House that sanctions would be "counter-productive". Is she aware that we welcome the change in that view, which she has signified by her agreement to the Nassau accord and the way in which she belatedly recognises the failure of so-called constructive engagement strategies, and that we also welcome the usefulness of economic pressures in pursuit of peaceful change in South Africa, which she now apparently endorses?

We wish every success to the Commonwealth mission, provided, of course, that its activities are not used as a means of delaying or diminishing pressures on apartheid from outside. In order to clarify her position on the initiative, will the Prime Minister confirm that when she reviews the situation in six months' time she will be prepared to join in further action if the Commonwealth leaders on that mission judge that further pressure is required?

I gather that there is some difficulty in choosing a British representative for the Commonwealth mission. I put it to the Prime Minister that we have a number of very suitable candidates in the House and that she could usefully consider distinguished and well qualified Members, including, perhaps, those from Cardiff and Bexley. [Interruption.] We will settle for "useful". "Superb" would involve my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

We hear what the Prime Minister says about the need to stop violence in South Africa, and of course we earnestly hope that that will occur, but will she tell us what she is doing to ensure that the inherent violent system of apartheid is ended, for that, in itself, is the root of all political violence in South Africa?

As for the Prime Minister's discussions with President Reagan, her statement was, to say the least, very uncommunicative. May I ask her the following questions, so that she can enlarge on what she has told us?

First, are the Americans still willing to negotiate about the arms race in space, which was agreed between Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz at their February meeting in order to set the agenda for the forthcoming summit, and does that agreement include discussion of the strategic defence initiative?

Secondly, does the Prime Minister stand by her statement in New York on 24 October:

"as I understand it there will be a further initiative before the meeting" between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev on 19 November? Is that still the right hon. Lady's feeling, or was that wishful thinking, resulting from the reasonable desire which she and others have that President Reagan will announce counter-proposals before going to Geneva? Can she, in any event, confirm that President Reagan will report back to NATO after the Geneva summit?

Thirdly, is the Prime Minister aware — [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] The Prime Minister could have said all this in her statement if she had not made it so abrupt. Is the Prime Minister aware that while a plan to curb regional conflicts between the super-powers would be welcome, especially in respect of the middle east, that process should not distract attention, diminish effort or in any way inhibit work to secure an early agreement to stop the nuclear arms race?

Fourthly, and finally, can the Prime Minister confirm that she interprets the 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty in the same way as Mr. Shultz and Mr. Paul Nitze, and that so-called new principles could not justify the testing of components or of sub-components of an anti-ballistic missile system?

The Prime Minister: I note that when I make a long statement the right hon. Gentleman wants it short, and that when I make it short he wants it long. I tried to be brief in this statement. It suits me very well when the statement is briefer than the questions.

As regards sanctions, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, the Labour Government were absolutely against far-reaching economic sanctions. Indeed, they said in 1978—[AN HON. MEMBER: "That was the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)."] No, it was not. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said:

"We voted against"— the sanctions—

"together with France, West Germany, the USA and some other Western countries because we do not agree that the far-reaching economic measures which the resolution calls for would produce the changes in South Africa which we would all like to see." —[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 9.]

We wholly agree. That is why we are fully against——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): That was never Labour party policy.

The Prime Minister: That was stated from this Box — not by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)—on 16 January 1978 as official Labour party policy, even if the hon. Gentleman does not like it.

The only strict sanction that we are operating at the moment is the one against armaments, in accordance with the mandatory resolution of the Security Council, which we have been operating for some time. The others are not strictly sanctions. They are a number of unilateral measures, that we have been taking for some time, concerning such things as add-on computers, new nuclear contracts, and so on. The only two small ones are on krugerrands, where we have agreed to do all that we can, because there are legal limitations, to stop their importation—the import is very small indeed—and to stop new grants from taxpayers' money for trade missions to South Africa.

Several eminent persons are under consideration for the mission to which I referred. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to add to the list which he has already provided.

I was pleased to hear what the right hon. Gentleman said about stopping violence and that all his hon. Friends want the violence to stop. That is not what I thought he was saying, as he appears to support Mr. Tambo, and what Mr. Tambo has said:

"The ANC will go to every conceivable length to destroy the apartheid system in South Africa. The escalated armed struggle cannot avoid the use of guns."

I understand that the right hon. Gentleman totally and utterly rejects that statement, and I am delighted to hear it.

As regards the talks in New York, the SDI research, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, is outside the anti-ballistic missile treaty. I do not believe that the Americans will negotiate on research. There is no way, as the right hon. Gentleman should know, in which one can verify what research is going on. I think, therefore, that research on both sides of the strategic defence initiative — because a good deal is being carried out on the Soviet side — will continue and will not be bargainable in these talks.

As regards the new possible initiative, the United States put forward proposals at Geneva in the talks on strategic arms reduction for radical reductions in ballistic missile warheads—a cut of nearly 50 per cent. in the current Soviet level. That was put down in the spring. Those proposals, together with a look at the new Gorbachev proposals, will, I believe, give rise to new initiatives before the talks are actually started.

President Reagan has said that he will come to NATO to tell us the results of the talks after they have taken place, so that he will have consulted both before and after them. Regional conflicts will, I believe, be on the agenda, but, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, it is not easy to find solutions to the middle east conflict.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Will my right hon. Friend rub in still further to the Leader of the Opposition the message that, whatever the shortcomings of the South African Government, President Botha has done more to reform and to roll back or contain the Soviet interference on the northern borders than the Governments of South Africa with whom the Labour party was happy to work? Will she confirm that while arms control is essential, the regional problems of Angola, Afghanistan, Cambodia and Nicaragua have been the main cause of the arms race over the past few years, and that it is essential that the Soviet Union should realise this?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my right hon. Friend that the South African Government have taken more steps than were taken by any of their predecessors to start the process of dismantling apartheid. A considerable number of measures have been taken—the Mixed Marriages Act and section 16 of the Immorality Act have been repealed, almost all job reservations have been removed and forced removals have been suspended, the abolition of influx control and pass laws has been recommended to the President by his advisory council, and a common citizenship for all South Africans has been restored. These are considerable steps towards the process of removing apartheid—a process which will need to continue, and to which the dialogue is directed.

I agree that, as well as arms control, it is vital that some trouble spots in the world, including Afghanistan—which is illegally occupied—central America and other parts of the world, and the presence of Cuban troops in Africa must be discussed at the summit because that are manifestations of the difference of approach between the Soviet Union and the United States.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): In the light of the talks with President Reagan, will the Prime Minister give a sign of the British attitude on two specific aspects of the anti-ballistic missile treaty? First, do we believe that the nine technology demonstrations planned as part of the strategic defence initiative programme in the United States are outlined by the treaty? Secondly, do we believe that the Soviet Union is in breach of the ABM treaty because of its radar installations?

The Prime Minister: We believe in what is known as the more conventional interpretation of the treaty, which includes most, although not all, of the testing. There have been suggestions that certain actions are not in compliance with the treaty. These actions probably fall into two kinds—those which may be genuine non-compliance, and those which result from an ambiguity of the wording of the treaty. The treaty provides a way to sort out those problems, because machinery exists, in the standing consultative commission on the treaty, for the United States and the Soviet Union to discuss implementation of the ABM treaty. That appears to be the right place to discuss compliance if there are suggestions that the treaty is not being complied with.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): Was there any discussion at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting on helping the developing world by joint ventures such as that between France, Japan and ourselves in Sri Lanka? Would not one way to help the developing world be such joint ventures, and would they not help the expansion of world trade and be an indirect way of helping to improve our balance of trade with Japan?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is very much aware, aid projects, particularly big ones involving capital aid, are frequently joint ventures between two or three countries, each one setting its own aid and trade provisions and making provision for the requisite interest rate. We already have joint projects, greatly to the advantage of projects in developing countries. Sri Lanka is a particular example.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Is the Prime Minister aware that during her absence the Palace of Westminster witnessed the biggest lobby in its history on overseas aid? Does she not therefore regret that the matter was barely discussed—if it was discussed at all—at the Commonwealth conference, and, still more, that at the United Nations she was unable to confirm that Britain is on course to achieve its meagre target because Britain has slipped in the international league table on account of the reductions since 1979?

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom aid programme, at 0·33 per cent. of GDP, is close to the OECD average, which is 0·36 per cent. of GDP. To that has to be added the considerable private flows. Taking the official and private flows together, the United Kingdom figure is 1·25 per cent. of GNP, which is well above the United Nations target of 1 per cent.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Not enough.

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman would like more aid to be provided, and I am the first to understand the reasons why, we have to look at our other expenditure. We cannot spend money over and over again, because the taxpayer is expected to cough up every time. Therefore, I suggest that we should look at what else we can spend less on if we wish to spend more on aid.

Mr. Dennis Walters (Westbury): Can my right hon. Friend say a little more about the talks in New York which touched on the middle east? Does she accept that there is widespread support for her recent effort to break the log-jam and make progress? Will she persevere in those efforts, which rightly included the need for a Palestinian voice?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the case for a Palestinian voice is in dispute. It is who should represent that voice that is in dispute. As my hon. Friend knows, we tried to take an initiative and there was a carefully measured statement. We do not accept violence as a means of pursuing a political end. Unfortunately, the Jordanian-Palestinian delegation was not seen by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, for very good reasons. The understanding on which the meeting was set up was not a statement that they were prepared to make. Nevertheless, we must persist in trying to get a settlement of the middle east problem. The United States, Jordan and Prime Minister Peres understand that before negotiations can start there must be a framework of international support. The precise framework is the subject at the moment of many discussions.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): The Prime Minister is surely aware that to include private flow figures is a smokescreen in relation to the overall aid programme; that the average figures for the OECD disguise the fact that Britain, in terms of aid per head, is 12th among the OECD countries and is giving half that which is given by most Scandinavian countries, and only a quarter of that which is given by Norway. Does the Prime Minister realise that if she, with other Heads of Government, were to achieve the 0·7 per cent. target it could create 2 million jobs in the OECD countries, many of which would come to the United Kingdom? When will she set at least a teeny-weeny target, such as increasing aid from 0·33 to 0·35 per cent. of GNP, so that we can have some indication that aid will go up rather than down?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's premise that we should not also look at private flows. Many Heads of Government are prepared and anxious to get more private capital into those countries because they wish to develop their resources. If the Opposition would like more money to be spent on aid, as many people would, they must not spend money at the same time on other things. If expenditure at home on social security goes up and up, what can be spent on giving help abroad will not be sufficient. Therefore, the Opposition should look at expenditure at home if they wish to change the balance.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I appreciate that the summit meeting dealt mainly with South Africa and apartheid, but can my right hon. Friend say how much time was spent discussing the lack of freedom and the compulsory absence of Opposition parties in newly independent African countries? Does she agree that at future Commonwealth summit meetings this matter should be fully discussed by our partners?

The Prime Minister: In the views that I took up on a number of matters, I was very conscious of the fact that not every Commonwealth country was a perfect example of democracy. I suspect that others were also conscious of that.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Prime Minister aware that the clear political signal that she sent to South Africa with her talk of "tiny measures" shows basically that she believes in the appeasement of the apartheid regime in South Africa, in much the same way as Neville Chamberlain believed in the appeasement of the Nazi regime in Germany?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the apartheid system must come to an end and that through negotiation we are going the right way about bringing it to an end. I do not believe that apartheid will be brought to an end by creating unemployment in hon. Members' constituencies in this country in order to create more unemployment in South Africa.

Hon. Members: But we have it already.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): On the second point about the Commonwealth accord, is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be much support in this country and beyond for the part which she played in getting the agreement that there should be a suspension of violence on all sides in South Africa signed by all Commonwealth leaders?

The Prime Minister: To get full Commonwealth agreement that there should be a suspension of violence when negotiations between the South African Government and representatives of the black community start was a great advance and a significant achievement. I am delighted that we all signed it, because it has helped to achieve a general agreement.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): But why, having spent so long getting that agreement, did the Prime Minister see fit to belittle the amount of movement that she had made? In what way did that contribute to the clarity of the signal? Will her reluctance to undertake certain measures, which she eventually overcame in the wider interest, be carried through in the British attitude to the enforcement of the measures?

The Prime Minister: I think that many people there realised not only that sanctions would cause great damage to industries in South Africa but that they could be counter-productive, in that they would induce exactly the attitude that we do not wish to have. They would also have very damaging effects on the African countries which have tried to increase trade with South Africa a great deal in the last year. As some countries pointed out, they, too, have preferential trading arrangements with South Africa which they do not wish to stop. There was a good deal more reality than would appear from some of the rhetoric. The hon. Gentleman should not lose sight of that.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): When my right hon. Friend met Mr. Peres, and in subsequent diplomatic exchanges, did she congratulate him on the proposals in his speech to the General Assembly? Is she encouraging him to have direct negotiations with King Hussein?

The Prime Minister: Whether or when those direct negotiations start between the Jordanian-Palestinian delegation and representatives from Israel will depend on whether we can find an international framework within which they can take place. I do not think that it is realistic to expect them to start without that framework. Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware of the sensitivities involved.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): How many people in South Africa must be killed by the security forces in a campaign of open ferocity before the right hon. Lady concedes to South Africans the right to defend themselves and to fight to save their lives and their freedoms? Does she not understand that apartheid is the root of violence, that violence is being committed in the name of apartheid, and that until she takes action, on behalf of this country she will be regarded as an ally of South Africa, with blood on her hands?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept the apartheid is the root of violence—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—No, I do not accept that, and nor do most other people. How, then, could one explain the total and utter violence in Uganda? I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's proposition.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Why do Commonwealth conferences have to conclude with unanimous decisions? What was wrong with us staying in honourable isolation on the principles for which we have already fought? Is my right hon. Friend aware that now that we have taken this tiny step on the escalator of economic sanctions it will be difficult, if not impossible, to get off?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not accept that. We obtained a very good agreed result throughout the whole of the Commonwealth. It was more important to achieve that—especially the condemnation of violence and the recognition that economic sanctions would not work—than to issue a separate British statement.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is it not a fact that the Prime Minister's opposition to international economic action against the racist apartheid regime of South Africa has nothing to do with the 250,000 jobs which she estimates could be affected by such action? After all, she does not care a jot about the 2 million people whom she has put on the dole during the past six years. Is her opposition not precisely to do with the fact that British companies own 40 per cent. of foreign investment in South Africa? Did not Consolidated Gold Fields make £115 million profit last year through paying black miners £21 a week? It is profit, not jobs, that has dictated the right hon. Lady's action.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman should be very much aware that industry has been in the forefront of breaking down apartheid. The standard of living of black Africans in South Africa often exceeds the standard of living of those in other countries in sub-Saharan Africa. South Africa is a strong economy, and the gold miners to whom the hon. Gentleman referred refused to strike.

Mr. Nellist: No, they did not. They were beaten into submission.

The Prime Minister: Many black people in South Africa have a high standard of education and culture, and it is rising every day. Therefore, that is not the problem —it is that they do not have a proper right to take part in government. That is what we are trying to rectify.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the realism and courage that she has displayed, not only in Nassau but in the House this afternoon, in defence of an evolutionary, non-violent retreat from the tragedy that apartheid has inflicted on South Africa.

When the other Heads of State in Nassau were attempting to forge the weapon of nuclear condemnation, were they at any stage aware that they were providing the world with the most vivid illustration that it has had in two millennia of the wisdom of the parable of the beam and the mote?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his question. He has made all his points very forcefully indeed.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): In view of the unanimous call of the Commonwealth Heads of State to the South African Government not to execute Daniel Moloise, has the right hon. Lady changed her mind about capital punishment, or is it simply that she says one thing abroad but votes another way in this House?

The Prime Minister: No, I have not changed my mind. Some of the Commonwealth Heads who put their names to that motion have capital punishment in their countries for crimes far less serious than murder—for example, for dealing in drugs.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on her efforts to achieve a fair return on British participation in the strategic defence initiative programme, but may I ask when she expects to obtain an agreement, and when she expects to be able to announce such an agreement?

The Prime Minister: I regret that I cannot answer that, but I shall pursue the matter.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Was it not an appropriate comment on the Prime Minister's performance at the Nassau conference that a group of the most ardent supporters of the South African regime marched to a number of embassies, and when they reached the British embassy raised three cheers for the right hon. Lady?

Is the right hon. Lady aware that for more than 70 years the African National Congress has tried to avoid violence, but, faced with the violence of the regime and the denial of basic political human rights, it reached the conclusion that there was no alternative? Would it not help matters if the Prime Minister later today listened to the evidence being given to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs by Mr. Oliver Tambo?

The Prime Minister: No, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will listen to many other black South Africans who do not want sanctions and utterly deplore violence. I very much regret that Chief Buthelezi is not receiving him, but many of us have seen him.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Does my right hon. Friend recall that prior to the Nassau summit Opposition Members were gloatingly predicting that the thorny question of South Africa would lead to the break-up of the Commonwealth? Has that not proved to be far from true? Has not the agreement signed by every Commonwealth state proved to be a major diplomatic success for this country and this Government?

The Prime Minister: Yes, it was a major success, both for the content of the accord and for the wisdom of going for the path of negotiation rather than violence, and keeping the Commonwealth together. Many Heads of State were pleased that the question of sanctions did not go any further, especially as some countries have preferential trade treaties with South Africa.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have two other very important statements to follow.

Immigration

4.4 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Following the recent exchanges in the House, I will, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, make a statement about representations made by right hon. and hon. Members in immigration cases.

Ministers receive large numbers of representations from Members of this House on a wide variety of individual cases. What distinguishes those made on behalf of passengers refused entry at the ports is that they have the effect of securing an immediate change in the action that would otherwise be taken by the immigration service under the relevant statutory provisions. The service is by convention, though not by law, precluded from arranging the passenger's removal until the hon. Member's representations have been received and considered. In the vast majority of cases, the passenger is granted temporary admission. In a small minority of cases, he may be held in detention at the port.

Home Office Ministers received representations on immigration cases about 20 times a week in 1980. Last year, the average was some 70 a week. During the past few weeks there have been 200 representations a week. The increase since 1980 is not the result of some dramatic change in the criteria being employed by immigration officers at the ports in operating the immigration rules. Nor can it be explained by an increase in passenger traffic, which has increased by 25 per cent. while hon. Members representations have increased fivefold taking the year as a whole. What is happening is that hon. Members are being approached and asked to put stops on cases more often than in the past, and hon. Members are agreeing to ask for stops on cases more often than in the past.

That increase has created real administrative problems for the staff at the ports. People are being temporarily admitted who do not qualify as visitors under the rules, and who often spend a considerable time here. The diversion of staff to deal with increasing representations and the case work involved has meant that visitors who are fully qualified find themselves held up and inconvenienced at Heathrow.

Against that background, I believe that it was entirely right for my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State to bring the position to the notice of the House. I wish to make it clear that my hon. and learned Friend was not at any time sugesting that the law had been broken. In his letter yesterday to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), he described the ways in which the present arrangements are being misused.

It was argued yesterday that my hon. and learned Friend should have given specific examples to the House of the action taken by particular hon. Members. As he explained, he could not have done that without revealing the terms of the letters that they had written to or about individual immigrants and, in two cases, letters written by them to third parties. He is writing today to 23 hon. Members, whose cases are examples of the various problems that we are facing, seeking their permission to make such correspondence public.

There are obvious difficulties, for example when hon. Members make representations on behalf of sponsors of whom they have made no inquiries, and when they arrange for a stop to be placed on a passenger's removal but fail to follow up the initial telephone call with a confirmatory letter. There is also concern that some hon. Members are willing to take up cases from outside their constituencies, which the constituency Member has chosen not to pursue. Here again, some restatement of the agreed conventions of the House is needed.

Finally, there are one or two cases in which it seems to us that an hon. Member is deliberately facilitating the attempt to secure the temporary admission of a passenger whom he has every reason to believe would not qualify for entry under the rules approved by this House. I am not suggesting that, even where that happens, hon. Members have acted unlawfully; they have not. But if their actions were to be more widely copied, the result could only be the weakening of our system of immigration control, based at the ports of entry. I believe that our present system suits both our geography and our constitution and that we need collectively to consider how it can best continue to operate.

I ask the House to accept that we wish to make a genuine attempt to strike the right balance between the representations of hon. Members and the need for an effective and efficient control without the strains at present imposed on it. We are anxious to discuss these difficulties urgently with those in this House who are mainly concerned, in the hope of working out a sensible answer. In any case, there will not be any changes in our procedures before I have reported to the House.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I apologise for not being in my place when the Home Secretary rose to make his statement.

The House will wish to thank in equal measure both yourself, Mr. Speaker, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), without whom the statement would not have been obtained. Even after the right hon. Gentleman's statement, and the strange letter sent to me yesterday by the Minister of State, the reckless allegations made by the Minister of State remain unsubstantiated.

The Home Secretary appears to be totally confused about the rules relating to visitors. He said that the Minister of State had talked about the right to enter. The Home Secretary talked about the qualification of visitors —he used the phrase "qualify as visitors"—when most would-be visitors have the automatic right to enter unless deprived of it by the Home Secretary. The huge increase in representations from hon. Members to which Ministers have drawn attention proves that the Minister of State is increasingly withdrawing the right of entry from certain categories of visitor.

We totally reject the claim that there has been no change in the way in which the rules are being administered, and we are worried by the Home Secretary referring in his statement to changes in procedure. Will he categorically assure the House that he has no intention of imposing a visa requirement for visitors or limiting the existing rights of hon. Members?

As for alleged "abuses," they are not abuses at all. If an hon. Member was confined to taking up cases the full particulars of which he knew, as mentioned by the Minister of State in his letter, we should none of us be able to take up social security or income tax cases, because we take up those cases to get the facts. That is so in these cases as well. If an hon. Member—again, as requested and apparently required by the Minister of State — were confined to taking up only the cases of constituents he knew personally, thousands of people in every constituency would never have any cases taken up.

Other allegations made by the Minister relate to relationships between hon. Members. They are matters, if at all, not for the Government, not for the Home Secretary, not for the Minister of State but for you, Mr. Speaker, and the House.

In essence, the allegations that the Government are making add up to a whine about the actions of hon. Members being an inconvenience to the Executive. But one of the most essential functions of an hon. Member is to be an inconvenience to the Executive. If the volume of representations is a burden to the Home Office and its Ministers, let me make it absolutely clear that the administration of the rules of entry is a burden to thousands of our constituents looking forward to visits from relatives. The Home Secretary looks upon those people as inconvenient statistics, but they are human beings with warm family feelings, and they have the same right to have visits as any other of our constituents. Our efforts to help them may be a great deal of trouble to Ministers, but we are determined to go on helping them, and that is a lesson that the Home Secretary had better learn.

On Thursday, the Minister of State twice asserted that some hon. Members were "abusing their right." Yesterday in the exchanges in the House he used the word "abuse" three times. In his letter to me he used the word "abuse" nine times. Today in his statement the Home Secretary did not once use the word "abuse." Instead, he mentioned 23 hon. Members whose cases, he said, were examples of "the problems that we are facing."

We want to know clearly and without equivocation from the Home Secretary whether he alleges that hon. Members have been abusing their position. If he says that there has been abuse, we want the names. We demand the names, because hon. Members have the right to defend themselves against charges made by Ministers in this House. Either the Home Secretary provides the names or he resiles from the accusation. If he resiles from the accusation, the Minister of State should resign.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman must have worked that response out before he heard my statement. He is perfectly correct to say that I did not use the word "abuse". I used the word "misuse". If, with his knowledge of the English language, he wants to make something of that, he is welcome to do so.

The right hon. Gentleman will get the names. My hon. and learned Friend is setting about the task in the right way. He is writing today to 23 hon. Members asking for their consent that the correspondence in question illustrating those problems should be published. That is straightforward and that is what is happening.

On the substance of the matter, I reiterate that the policy has not changed since my hon. and learned Friend has been responsible for it. I will read to the House, because it is the heart of the matter, rule 17 of the immigration rules. It is what immigration officers have administered under the supervision of my hon. and learned Friend and under the supervision of Ministers of State of Labour Governments. It is, in essence, the same rule:

"A passenger seeking entry as a visitor, including one coming to stay with relatives or friends, is to be admitted if he satisfies the immigration officer that he is genuinely seeking entry for the period of the visit as stated by him and that for that period he will maintain and accommodate himself and any dependants, or will, with any dependants, be maintained and accommodated adequately by relatives or friends, without working or recourse to public funds, and can meet the cost of the return or onward journey."

That simple requirement has existed for many years. That is what immigration officers must administer, and there has been no change in it.

The hon. Gentleman referred to visas. As he knows—and again, as has been the practice—the position is kept under continuous review. The comparison that the right hon. Gentleman made with social security benefits was illuminating. We are all the time asking as constituency Members, for example, that benefit for one or other of our constituents should be reconsidered or increased. But we do not expect the benefit automatically to be increased while our representations are being considered.

What, so far as I know, makes this facility unique is that there is a covention—which the right hon. Gentleman supports and wishes to maintain, as I do—that automatically a stop is placed and the action that would otherwise be taken is suspended. The problem is now caused partly by the increasing number of arrivals and partly by the increase in the number of representations.

It is not a matter of inconvenience to the Home Office or of administrative inconvenience. [Interruption.] The principal consequence is that under the rule to which I referred people who should not be allowed entry are allowed in. That is not what Parliament intended, and we should consider carefully among ourselves how this facility, which we wish to preserve, is to be preserved.

Mr. Kaufman: Mr. Speaker——

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the right hon. Gentleman again at the end.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many residents here wishing to invite relatives to spend a holiday with them would be prepared to give a bond, to be produced at a point of entry, which would prevent all the hassle that their relatives undergo and would be far better than the farcial situation when an hon. Member intervenes, there is a stop and the Home Office takes six to eight weeks to investigate the case, by which time the relative has returned home, having spent his holiday here, with a great deal of bureaucratic time having been wasted?

Mr. Hurd: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes. A change in the law would, I think, be required to accommodate his suggestion, which would put a premium on the possession of resources. Let us consider it.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Does the Home Secretary accept that the strength of family ties, which his party very much favours, means that families that wish to receive visitors from abroad are represented in many constituencies, and that it is inevitable that our constituents will bring cases to our attention where there have been difficulties?

Secondly, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it is inevitable that an hon. Member may have to act urgently to prevent a visitor being sent back without knowing the full facts of the case at that point? Does he agree that one can ascertain the details and make proper representations only after a stop has been put on a constituent's relative, and he has, perhaps, been sent back to his home country?

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that there is often a great deal of bewilderment on the part of both the visitor and the family? In many instances the visitor may not be able to understand why he has been prevented from making an ordinary visit to his family, and many families offer the very bond that his hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) suggested. Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that many Liberal Members are concerned that they are having to spend a great deal of time working on cases where the visitor should never have been stopped from entering Britain in the first place?

Mr. Hurd: Of course it is right that there are special cases and peculiar circumstances. That is why we accept that right hon. and hon. Members have a right and a duty to make representations where they know of such cases. That is what it is all about. The trouble is that there are too many cases where, for example, a stop is imposed because a Member of Parliament has made a telephone call, which is not followed by later representations. That is one of the larger examples of what is going wrong. It is because we want to preserve the facility that right hon. and hon. Members enjoy that we are anxious to overcome the strains that its misuse is putting on the system as a whole.

Mr. William Shelton (Streatham): Does my right hon. Friend accept that I for one have always experienced a certain disquiet when exercising this facility? It is impossible, through a letter or telephone call to the constituent, in any way to judge the merits of the case. Nevertheless, in the present circumstances I always feel obliged to telephone the Department of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, who, in my view, does a difficult job extraordinarily well. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I find that his Department is most helpful when I telephone to ask its officials to impose a stop. I would welcome some guidance on when we should or should not exercise this difficult facility.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I think that he is right. On reflection, right hon. and hon. Members will accept that we are discussing a unique facility for Members and that with it goes responsibility for the way in which it is exercised. I agree that it is sensible that we should discuss together, in whatever way seems sensible to hon. Members on both sides of the House who are faced with this problem, exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) is talking about, which is how the facility is to be preserved and how the responsibility which Members have in exercising it is to be defined.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Is the Home Secretary aware that the matter is far more complicated than he seems to understand? He is a new Home Secretary and I for one would be prepared to talk to him seriously on the issue and even to lighten the burden of the Minister of State. The right hon. Gentleman must understand that those of us who represent large immigrant communities, or erstwhile immigrant communities, are bound to find that certain of the families receive visitors. One example is the Sikhs in my constituency. Through the problems in India, for example, a number of young people have come in to Britain from India. That will have given rise inevitably to greater surveillance at the port of entry and will have placed a greater strain on the immigration officers, who are complaining bitterly of a shortage of staff and the way in which they have to treat passengers at the port of entry. All that has to be considered.

I should like to involve you to some extent, Mr. Speaker, and put it in the mind of the Home Secretary that it has always been traditional in the House of Commons that, if a constituent claims that his Member has failed or refused to act for him, it is an elementary fact that any hon. Member is qualified to act for him. There are only a few occasions when I have had so to act but occasionally I do, and I find mostly that Tory Members are pleased that I do so when they are absent on holiday or for other reasons. I shall continue so to act according to the tradition of the House.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has a particularly heavy responsibility in this area and I am sure that he always discharges it with great care. I take what he has to say especially seriously. I emphasise that there has not been any change of policy or of the rules. However, a problem is being created and I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is a need to discuss the issue carefully, in whatever way is most orderly, to find a way of easing the strain. I shall put the matter into perspective by saying that 99 per cent. of all passengers arriving in this country from the subcontinent last year were admitted without difficulty of any kind.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, by misusing the spirit of the regulations, hon. Members do a great disservice to immigrant communities?

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Whose spirit?

Mr. Soames: Would my right hon. Friend agree also that if this state of affairs continues, we shall have no option but to put visas on at the point of departure?

Mr. Hurd: I have already answered a question about visas. I agree with my hon. Friend that one of the problems and one of the symptoms of strain in the machine is that visitors who are wholly entitled under the rule that I have read to come into Britain on a visit are held up and inconvenienced, especially at terminal 3 at Heathrow, because of the increasing number of people who are not so entitled but who present themselves.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): Is the Home Secretary aware that one of the greatest abuses to which Asian and black people in Britian take exception is that they and their relatives are interrogated for many hours while white Americans who come over from the United States are allowed through immigration control, with virtually no difficulty whatsoever? This creates enormous problems in places such as Birmingham and elsewhere, which adds to the festering situation.

What does the right hon. Gentleman expect Members to do when they are knocked up in the middle of the night to find that someone, perhaps soaked to the skin, has come from Heathrow upon being told by an immigration officer, "Unless we hear from your MP by early in the morning, your elderly father will be sent back home"? Is that not an outrage to the integrity of our affairs? Does the right hon.

[Mr. Denis Howell]

Gentleman expect hon. Members to be sitting at home every day and every week, including weekends and holidays, to placate the demands of the immigration service as required by Home Office Ministers?

Mr. Hurd: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman, with his long experience in these matters, should place that sort of imputation on the way in which immigration officers do their job. Where there are specific complaints of maltreatment of something approaching that, the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues should take them up. I know from my own postbag and from the letters which I am asked to sign of the great care that the immigration service and my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State and officials in the Home Office devote to investigating all such allegations and dealing with them faithfully.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that he will find widespread support among the minority communities for any attempt to stamp out abuses of the immigration system? The minority communities have suffered quite enough in the past from those who have been only too willing to encourage them to attempt to deceive immigration authorities, and they have usually paid the penalty. Is he further aware that they will not thank anyone who, through his abuse of the system, further restricts the rights of those of us who seek to help visitors who are refused entry and who we believe sincerely are genuine?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is entirely right on both counts. It is crucial for good race relations in Britain that the immigration system we operate should be seen to be fair. I think that the whole House will agree with that. It would not be a good thing if the system were seen to be weak or open to misuse, and that is the problem.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): Is the Home Secretary aware that it may be that those who are abusing the system are some of the immigration officers themselves? How can he have any confidence in some of his immigration officers when he hears, for example, that a young man from India has come to Britain as he wishes to attend his sister's wedding in Scotland, that she is a British subject who is marrying a British subject and that they are to live in a house that is owned by a British subject, and yet there is difficulty in allowing that young man to come for a week to attend the wedding? Can he have any confidence in immigration officers when difficulties arise in a case such as that?

Mr. Hurd: I have read to the House the rule governing visits and the House can judge whether that rule is arbitrary, unfair or tyrannical. I do not think it is, and it has been there for a long time. Immigration officers are being criticised in the House. They do a remarkably difficult job under increasing strain—it is the strain we are talking about—and they do it with great patience and responsibility. I am surprised that the debate should have taken this turn, because the criticisms made are unjustified.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): How much has this misuse of privileges by a few Members of Parliament cost the taxpayer?

Mr. Hurd: The law provides that if a case drags on beyond two months, the cost of returning the person concerned to the country of origin ceases to be the responsibility of the airline and becomes the responsibility of the taxpayer. As the work load that we are discussing increases, it becomes more and more difficult to deal with every case in two months. We estimate that the cost to the taxpayer this year arising from these strains is likely to be about £1 million.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the Home Secretary understand that the strains to which he refers are caused by a thoroughly inefficient system that is too often operated without kindness, compassion or courtesy, and that it leaves genuine visitors in long queues waiting for interpreters and sometimes locked up for the night, or longer? In many cases, it is unfair to blame individual immigration officers because there are not enough of them, but to blame Members of Parliament who are trying to help their constituents in this awful system is like blaming doctors for death or disease.

Mr. Hurd: If the hon. and learned Gentleman studies the categories and the ways in which we believe that the system of Members' representations is being misused, then, because he is a fair-minded man, he will be forced to the conclusion that this is one element, though not the only element, in the strain that I am talking about. That strain does a disservice not mainly to the administrators, but to the genuine visitor who is qualified to enter and to the whole system that we are trying to preserve.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): I have 18,000 constituents who might want to make use of this service. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is not the function of any hon. Member to act as judge and jury in deciding whether or not an individual should be allowed entry, but only to make responsible and proper representations to the Home Office?

Mr. Hurd: That is right. That is the heart of the matter.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): It is quite clear from what the Home Secretary has said that he is straining at a gnat. Is he aware that last Thursday in the House, the Minister of State said that 1 million Commonwealth and Pakistani people had been allowed into the country last year and that he had representations during 1980 in only 1,000 cases and was expecting representations from Members in 4,500 cases this year? In other words, 1,000 was less than 0·01 per cent. If it is 4,500 this year, it will be less than 0·05 per cent. The Minister has referred to the rule. I have been in discussion with the Minister of State since last Friday—five days—about a black man whose brother is a British citizen. That British citizen has signed a statement, which I have here, with the Bangladesh High Commissioner saying he will keep, look after and be responsible for him and will see that he returns. That man has been refused entry into the country, kept on remand at public expense, and questioned during those five days. Can the Home Secretary look into that case? It constitutes a disgusting state of affairs, and I am very angry about it. It is one of the worst cases I have had for some years and it arises only because the man is black.

Mr. Hurd: I cannot comment on the hon. Member's individual case, but he is perfectly entitled to put it. There is no dispute about that. I will give again the figures which relate to his first point. Representations by Members in port refusal cases have grown from about 1,000 a year in 1980, 1981 and 1982 to 3,532 last year. Up to 22 October this year the total was about 5,000. That is the fivefold increase I was talking about, and that is what is creating the strains. In view of the general conclusion made by the hon. Member, I should add that the proportion of refusals to entry has remained basically static during this time. It is not true that immigration officers are turning away or refusing entry to a larger proportion of people.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): I am afraid my right hon. Friend is deluding himself if he thinks the situation will get any better. Would it not be better to get rid of all this nonsense by considering a visa scheme?

Mr. Hurd: As I have said, there are problems about any moves towards visas. I have said, and I chose my words carefully, that the matter of visa regimes is kept under continual review.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): Will the Home Secretary reconsider the answer that he gave in reply to the suggestion that there should be a bond system? Does he accept that if he were sympathetically to consider such an idea, he would be extending the bail system, which is totally unacceptable in matters of immigration? Secondly, I have no doubt that the whole House accepts that the system is under tremendous strain. In this get together of hon. Members to consider suggestions, will the Home Secretary acknowledge and assure the House that he will double the staff in the Private Office? If the system is under strain, surely it is a matter of the number of people employed.

Mr. Hurd: It is partly that, but primarily that under the misuse of the system quite large numbers — [HON. MEMBERS: "What misuse?"] "Misuse" is the word that I have used for the past half hour. One consequence of misuse of the system is that large numbers of people, whom Parliament did not intend under the immigration laws to be admitted as visitors, are being admitted as visitors.

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this House, having listened to a characteristically hypocritical statement from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should be grateful if the hon. Member would rephrase that and withdraw the word "hypocritical."

Mr. Whitfield: I withdraw that word, Mr. Speaker, and say the misleading statement by the right hon. Member for Gorton—Members would do well to read the excellent letter that the Secretary of State wrote to the right hon. Gentleman and to read the six forms of abuse that the Minister of State has listed in that letter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not read them all out.

Mr. Whitfield: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. Hon. Members should read that letter, which is in the Library, and acquaint themselves with the six forms of abuse which definitely exist. I have a lot of knowledge of those six forms. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the official Opposition are in danger of becoming the party that supports illegal immigration just as they support racial violence in our inner city areas?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Who is he?

Mr. Hurd: I do not entirely go along with all my hon. Friend's criticism of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman slightly misinterpreted the mood of the House. This is a serious problem which affects the whole House. I hope we can continue this debate with the thought that there is a real problem. It is not one that we invented. The strain is real and is being felt increasingly on the ground. As my hon. Friend said, it may get worse. I am deeply worried about it. I hope that between us we can find a parliamentary way in which this issue can be sensibly discussed and the right way found to maintain a facility to which the House attaches great importance.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Home Secretary accept that a system that allows 5,000 representations so far this year to be made to Members of Parliament evidently needs review as to the conventions that apply not only to Members of Parliament but to the rules? When discussing these matters with those of us who are ready to meet him will the Home Secretary consider the possibility of amending rule 17?

Mr. Hurd: I think that rule 17, which I read to the House, is a sane and thoughtful piece of work. I do not see defects in it. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the rest of his remarks.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): As one who has lived and worked in India, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka, may I say, with respect to these complicated cases, that I have the utmost confidence in my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington). I believe that the decision to require Sri Lankan visitors to have visas is right. That system is working well. Bangladesh leaders in Northampton and I believe that a simpler system is needed, whereby people can come to Britain on holiday for three or four weeks. I should be more than happy to work with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to find a way around this problem.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Home Secretary admit that the Minister of State lost his temper and made false allegations and that that is the cause of the whole problem? The Minister of State should apologise to the House.

It is understandable that the Home Secretary does not understand the operation of immigration control. He told my hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) that his story about what happened in Scotland was not typical, but he was wrong. These problems for our constituents occur every week. Genuine family members come here to visit their relations but they are turned away. Their only way in is by ringing their Member of Parliament. This causes an enormous amount—[HON. MEMBERS: "Their Member of Parliament—not you."] Let me say to those Conservative Members who shout that one of the reasons why Opposition Members are troubled by people who do not live in their constituencies is that they are telephoned by people who say, "My MP is racist and will not represent me."

Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us keep the temperature down.

Ms. Short: I believe that Labour Members should compile a list of the people who frequently approach them. The origin of this problem is the fact that too many genuine visitors are refused entry. If they were not refused entry, there would be no need for Members of Parliament, the Minister and the visitors' families to be troubled, and everyone would be happier. That is the solution.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Lady is ignoring the fact that the proportion of refusals is no higher than it used to be. These facts are clearly established, but they do not suit the hon. Lady's doctrine. She does not do herself or her constituents any service by protesting so vehemently and passionately about matters — the views of other hon. Members—of which she cannot have much knowledge.

On the hon. Lady's first point, I think that it would be a poor day if a Minister could not come to the House at Question Time to explain something and volunteer views on a matter that was causing all of us genuine concern. That is what my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State did, and I think that he would have been wrong not to do so.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the ability of Members of Parliament to make representations to the Home Secretary is a particular privilege and that, if that privilege is abused, it will damage us all? Is my right hon. Friend aware that on one occasion, when I refused to assist a person whom I thought was trying to obtain immigration clearance improperly, I was clearly told, "That does not matter. I can ring up a certain right hon. Member and he will get me clearance without any questions."? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it must be possible for hon. Members of good will on both sides of the House to agree to keep to a convention that assists us all?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has neatly encapsulated what I was trying to say.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the Home Secretary agree that, so long as visitors who are refused entry to Britain are denied any right of appeal, the rights of Members of Parliament to stop removal and have a review of the immigration officer's decision are of great importance? Does he also agree that the serious allegations by the Minister of State are clearly a smokescreen behind which the Government are preparing to introduce a visa requirement for citizens of the new Commonwealth and Pakistan who wish to visit Britain in the future? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking, therefore, that no such visa requirement will be introduced without the clear approval of the House, in order to avoid the embarrassment that the Government might incur by introducing visa requirements while the House is not sitting next week? Will the right hon. Gentleman give a clear assurance that, if visa requirements are introduced, no impediment will be put in the way of the children of British citizens to prevent them from coming here and, if refused entry, from exercising their right of appeal here?

Mr. Hurd: I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that there will be no change in the visa regimes next week while the House is prorogued. The hon. Gentleman's first point was not accurate. Parliament has granted a right of appeal, but——

Mr. Madden: Not here.

Mr. Hurd: Exactly; a right of appeal in the country of origin. By using the facilities about which we are talking, some hon. Members are prescribing something that Parliament has not prescribed — in effect, the right of someone to stay here while his case is looked at. That is not what Parliament intended.

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): Is not the real cause of concern the fact that there are no automatic checks to ascertain that visitors, including more than 900,000 last year from the new Commonwealth and Pakistan, leave the country? Will my right hon. Friend and the Home Office investigate the possibility of using modern technology and computer science to ensure that these checks are made automatically?

Mr. Hurd: As my hon. Friend knows, there are problems. That point is one that we must consider.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the current position is totally unacceptable to a civilised country and that it is getting worse? Does he know that this month I have had six cases, with another one today, concerning people kept in detention? Does the right hon. Gentleman know that Mr. Patel was kept in detention for three weeks and that it took me 12 days to get any information out of the Home Office? I should have thought that even a murderer would be told why he had lost his liberty. I was even told that I could not get a reply because the appropriate Minister was at the Conservative party conference and I would have to wait until he returned.

Is it true that there is a shortage of staff at the ports and that untrained personnel are manning the immigration desks? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise the distress that this is causing and the burden that this is imposing on constituency Members of Parliament — perhaps not constituencies like the right hon. Gentleman's but the constituencies of my colleagues — who must cope with the system's inadequacies?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman should realise that the policy which has been pursued for many years is to minimise detention—to use detention only when there are serious reasons for supposing, for example, that a person might abscond. The proportion of people refused entry who are then detained has been decreasing while the proportion of those who are granted temporary admission has been increasing. Between 1977 and 1984 the percentage of those refused entry and then granted temporary admission has increased as a percentage of all passengers refused entry from 22 per cent. to 47 per cent.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Is it not a fact that the Home Office is anxious that elderly parents and close relatives of people from overseas who are living in this country should be able to visit their loved ones? Is it not also a fact that there has been a surge of young people coming to Britain as holiday visitors, that many of them seek to change the status of their visit once they are here and that many of them disappear into the woodwork?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend has characteristically stated both wings of the problem, which can only be resolved by having a sensible rule. I am glad that I started by reading out to the House rule 17. I think it is a sensible rule.

Mr. Kaufman: The Home Secretary has demonstrated a misunderstanding of what concerns Opposition Members. In dealing with the analogy of a person whose Member of Parliament seeks to obtain for him or her an increase in social security benefit, he says that the social security benefit is not increased while the application by the Member of Parliament is being considered. When the Member of Parliament's application is being considered, the social security benefit is not removed. The person whould be removed from the country unless the hon. Member made the application. That is the whole basis of the stop procedure.

The Home Secretary said that he wishes to discuss these matters with the hon. Members concerned. If he is willing to have discussions now, why did the Minister of State not ask for discussions before making his reckless allegations to the House last Thursday? Throughout the exchanges today the Home Secretary has consistently used the word "misuse" and consistently withdrawn from the word "abuse" which was used by his hon. and learned Friend. Does the Home Secretary confirm and endorse the word "abuse" as used by the Minister of State? If he does, we want the names of the hon. Members who are said to be conducting the abuse. Unless he comes clean on this, it is he, his hon. and learned Friend and the Prime Minister who are guilty of an abuse of the House.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is working himself up again. He will get the names. That is clear from my statement and from the action that my hon. and learned Friend has taken today. I endorse every word of the letter that my hon. and learned Friend wrote to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Kaufman: "Abuse"?

Mr. Hurd: If the right hon. Gentleman had contained his passion long enough to read to the end of that letter, he would have seen that my hon. and learned Friend was suggesting discussions.

Mr. Kaufman: Not last Thursday.

Mr. Hurd: That was one of the final points in the letter that he wrote yesterday. That is the point that I have been emphasising today and on which I should like to end.

I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman. I can see that he does not want this done through the usual channels because he thinks that procedure is too narrow. I have some sympathy with that view. We need to work out among ourselves a way in which the stop facility—which I am not trying to abolish, but which I am trying to bring within proportions—will work. I am trying to find a way in which we can discuss it on a parliamentary basis and make it work.

Mr. Speaker: Statement, Mr. Stanley.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take the points of order after the statement. I can anticipate what the points of order are likely to be about.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): No, you cannot.

Mr. Speaker: I will take the points of order afterwards, as is my usual practice.

Mr. Faulds: No, this point of order has to do with this business.

Mr. Speaker: I will take it afterwards.

Later—

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall, Sir, that I was the Member—the hon. Member—[Laughter.] I wish that you could all say that about yourselves—to whom the original accusation was made that certain hon. Members had abused the immigration procedures. Yet I have listened to many hon. Members called to ask questions who have no concern with the immigration problem, including an hon. Member from some obscure point in the north of Scotland whose only connection with immigration could be occasional English visitors. The advice which is always available at your elbow and which is supposed to be totally impartial saw fit not to let you sight me on this matter. I think that it would be advisable—I say this, Sir, with the deep affection in which I hold you—to look again at the sense and rationality of postponing points of order which are relevant to the business under way until after other bits of business, which totally removes the relevance of the point of order. This is a major matter which should be re-examined, since I believe, Sir, it is a new development under your admirable Speakership.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: May I take one at a time? I sighted the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) earlier this afternoon and I sighted him yesterday. With the best will in the world, I cannot call every hon. Member every day. The hon. Member was called yesterday and I think that that was fair enough.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I assure you that my point of order has not lost its relevance because of any delay. I apologise for straining the patience of the House, but an important side issue has emerged from the exchanges about the immigration rules. It has been revealed that the Minister of State, Home Office, has written to 23 right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House asking for their permission to make public the correspondence that has passed between them and him. I assume that the correspondence will be made public by publication in Hansard or by copies being placed in the Library. However, the correspondence between an hon. Member and a Minister must be on the basis of confidentiality between the hon. Member and his constituent. No hon. Member has a right to reveal correspondence unless he has the explicit permission of the constituent to whom the correspondence refers.

Could I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is a very dangerous practice for Ministers of the Crown of any Government to come to the House and make an accusation about Members abusing their position and then defend that accusation by challenging them, on the following day, to allow him to publish the correspondence? I am glad that the Leader of the House has remained in his place, because this is a very serious intrusion into the way in which Members of Parliament carry out their work on behalf of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that is really a point of order for me, but, as I understand it, what the Secretary of State said was that he would seek the permission of those hon. Members to whom he had written to publish the correspondence. That is what I understood him to say.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that you are in an invidious position when it comes to the statement on immigration. My particular locality of north Bedfordshire has the highest immigrant population in the United Kingdom——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does this not sound like an extension of Question Time?

Mr. Skeet: Not entirely, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.] I am simply saying this, Mr. Speaker, and I want your guidance on it. When matters of this prominence come up and it is necessary for the Government possibly to bring in some code where they will have consultation with various Members — not only the 23 who have been nominated today—I think that it is only right that those Members who come from areas where there is a lot of evidence should have the opportunity to take part in that debate, which was referred to in the national press.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister, in the exchange over the immigration rules, repeated once more the insinuation and the allegation that a number of Members of Parliament have been acting improperly, and he now confirms that he has written to 23 of them. Presumably he will ensure that the names of those 23 will appear in The Daily Telegraph tomorrow. The issue, however, is that the Minister made a series of wholly unsubstantiated allegations against individual Members. He has failed to support those allegations with any detailed argument whatever this afternoon——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Corbyn: The point of order for you, Mr. Speaker, is this. Should not the Minister withdraw those allegations in their entirety? He is casting a slur on the character of individual Members of the House in the matter of the operation of the immigration laws.

The second point, Mr. Speaker, on which I look to you for guidance, is that the Minister is suggesting that he will write to those 23 and possibly seek discussions with them. Is that not a matter for the whole House, for public debate, rather than for private discussion among Members representing areas with a high proportion of immigrant people who are suffering disgracefully under the immigration laws?

Mr. Speaker: I am not responsible for any statements or allegations that are made by any Member in the House, as long as they are in order.

Cyprus Service Men (Trial)

4.53 pm

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the outcome of the trial concluded yesterday of eight service men under the Official Secrets Acts.

On 3 February 1984 a senior aircraftsman of 9 Signal Regiment based in Cyprus failed to complete unit clearance procedures prior to being posted back to the United Kingdom. On 6 February he was interviewed by the deputy unit security officer of the regiment. From this interview it appeared that a breach of security had occurred and the senior aircraftsman was arrested. His case was referred to the RAF provost and security service in Cyprus. Subsequently, the Army special investigations branch was also brought in since it appeared that soldiers as well as RAF personnel were involved. As is the standard procedure where a breach of the Offical Secrets Acts may have occurred, the Ministry of Defence security authorities brought the matter to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions during the course of their investigation.

On 15 March 1984, in view of the seriousness of the alleged breaches of security, the Director asked the Metropolitan police special branch to assume responsibility for the conduct of the investigation and in the light of its investigation he considered that the evidence justified prosecutions under the Official Secrets Acts. On 11 April the Attorney General consented to the prosecution of seven service men, who were charged on 13 April. The Attorney General subsequently consented to the prosecution of an eighth service man, who was charged on 8 June 1984.

As the House is aware, the service men charged have all been acquitted. Their future in the services will be determined in accordance with normal service regulations. These afford a right of appeal to the service boards, which include Ministers, before any final decision on their future is taken.

As the House is aware, the Security Commission reports to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. As my right hon. Friend stated to the House earlier today, she decided in June 1984 that, given the gravity of the apparent breaches of security and the length of time the trial proceedings would be likely to take, it would be right to make an immediate reference to the Security Commission. The reference was not announced at the time, so as not in any way to prejudice the course of justice. In the light of the acquittals, my right hon. Friend will consult the chairman of the Security Commission and report to the House in due course.

The House will wish to know of the steps that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has taken in the light of what has occurred. First, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was first informed of the possibility of a breach of security on 10 February 1984. In the light of further information he decided that there should be an investigation of the security arrangements and procedures in 9 Signal Regiment which was to be led by the security service. In parallel with this investigation my right hon. Friend instructed that further investigations should be carried out into security procedures in all other static communications units of all three services which handle sensitive traffic. These security investigations produced a large number of detailed recommendations for enhancing security at the units concerned. Most of them have been accepted, and either have been or are being implemented.

Secondly, my right hon. Friend has decided that there should be an independent inquiry into the way in which the service police carried out their investigations of the eight men originally accused. Mr. David Calcutt, QC, has agreed to conduct this inquiry and to complete it as quickly as is practical. He will start work next week. His terms of reference will be as follows:

"To inquire into the question of whether the investigations carried out by the Royal Air Force's provost marshal branch and the Army's special investigation branch into matters which formed the substance of charges subsequently laid under the Official Secrets Acts against SAC Geoffrey Jones, SAC Adam Lightowler, SAC Wayne Kriehn, SAC Christopher Payne, SAC Gwynn Owen, Lance Corporal Anthony Glass, Signalman Martin Tuffy, and Signalman David Hardman were carried out in accordance with lawful and proper procedures; to report with all practicable speed, and to make recommendations as to any relevant procedure."

Subject to the usual security considerations, it is my right hon. Friend's intention that Mr. Calcutt's report will be published.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The Opposition are relieved that, on this occasion at least, the Ministry of Defence has reacted to the anger and outrage expressed on both sides of the House and outside at the revelations during the spy trial at the Old Bailey and in particular at the way in which confessions were extracted from defendants who were subsequently acquitted by a jury.

The Minister has announced the setting up of an inquiry and we welcome that. We shall scrutinise its powers and await its conclusions with interest. I remind the Minister and the House that this is the third occasion in little more than a year when prosecutions have been brought under the Official Secrets Acts emanating from activities within the Ministry of Defence and that on each occasion an Old Bailey jury has acquitted the defendants, and I remind the Minister that in this case the jury also rejected confessions extracted from the accused by investigators and interrogators at the Ministry of Defence.

Some fundamental questions remain which cannot be dealt with by the inquiry. In effect, they relate to ministerial responsibility within the Department for the prosecutions and also responsibility to the House. Who on earth at the Ministry of Defence was responsible for putting together a case which turned out to be so full of holes and based to a considerable extent on confessions extracted by means at best dubious and at worst barbaric?

Secondly, were the Minister and the Secretary of State at any time informed in their capacity as Ministers of the course of the investigations? Were they told about the interrogations? Did they know what was going on? Were they told the length of time for which the accused were interrogated and how long many of them were incarcerated? What were Ministers told about the inquiries while those inquiries were going on? Are we to believe that the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, beavering away at his desk churning out all the answers for which he is famous, and the Secretary of State knew nothing whatever about the conduct of those investigations and interrogations? The House deserves to know exactly how much they knew about what was going on. Did no alarm bells ring when in a previous case another Cyprus service man was acquitted at the Old Bailey?

Thirdly, will the Minister explain the third paragraph of his statement, relating to the future of the service men involved? Will they have to go through another harrowing experience in terms of military discipline and procedures or are the Government prepared to accept the jury's verdict and to allow those service men to continue with their careers as they were doing before they were interrupted?

What thought has been given to compensation for the service men and for their families, who have also suffered, as those men's careers have clearly been blighted?

Finally, the Minister referred to the Security Commission. Has the Security Commission now cleared the security arrangements at that establishment in Cyprus?

Mr. Stanley: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has welcomed the setting up of the inquiry to be carried out by Mr. Calcutt. With regard to the conduct of the service police investigators, I suggest it would be much more proper to await the outcome of Mr. Calcutt's investigations and detailed inquiry before leaping to any conclusions on that. As for the responsibility for putting the case together, the decision to prosecute lies entirely with the Director of Public Prosecutions and the handling of the case is his responsibility.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether Ministers were informed in detail about the questioning of those facing the accusations. The answer is that they were not. The established procedure in the Department is that judges' rules apply, and the central issue that Mr. Calcutt will be examining is whether those conducting the questioning did so in conformity with judges' rules.

As for the future of the service men involved, I made it clear in my statement that they will have every opportunity to be considered within the service regulations. It goes without saying that the Department fully accepts the verdict on the allegations which were subject to the judicial proceedings in relation to the Official Secrets Acts. It also made it clear that the service men have a right of appeal to service boards on which Ministers sit. Compensation is not and never has been available in such cases.

The right hon. Gentleman's question about the Security Commission is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to address it to her.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Does my right hon. Friend accept that in the case of my constituent, Senior Aircraftsman Wayne Kriehn, the anger and bitterness of the young man's parents is deep and it is shared by many who know the boy in question? Does my right hon. Friend accept that in May 1984 I wrote to him passing on information given to me by the boy's parents that the confession had been extorted by interrogation in solitary confinement? Does he further accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) and I wrote to the Secretary of State in August 1984 detailing our wider concern in the light of further talks with two of the prisoners? Given that background, does my right hon. Friend feel that there is a lesson to be learnt with regard to the continuing role of the services and the Ministry of Defence in looking after the welfare of service men awaiting trial in civil proceedings?

Looking to the future, will my right hon. Friend be a little more forthcoming about the opportunities now open to a man such as my constituent Wayne Kriehn, whom the defending solicitor described as a high flier? Having put the matter to a civil court in preference to a court martial, it seems reasonable not to seek to reverse the process and attempt to try the people involved again.

Mr. Stanley: I assure my hon. Friend that there is no question of trying the individuals concerned in any other way in relation to the Official Secrets Acts. As for any other matters, I assure my hon. Friend that there is no contemplation of any further proceedings on the evidence available to us at the moment.

We are, of course, aware of the earlier correspondence and my hon. Friend rightly acknowledged that he was expressing the particular concerns that he described, but I am sure that he too will wish to await the conclusions of Mr. Calcutt's inquiry before reaching any final conclusion as to the validity of the complaints that were put to him.

On the wider policy issue of the continuing role of the services in being responsible for service men facing procedures in civilian courts, as the service men remain members of the services during that period I suggest that it is right that they should remain within a service environment and that the services should remain responsible for them. The crucial requirement is that they be afforded the same rights and protection as civilians in the same situation, and that is the object of the policy.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): There was no reference in the Minister's statement to any assistance having been sought from the Cypriot police authorities. Will the Minister explain why that was so? Is it true that the prosecution went ahead without any effort being made to ascertain whether any independent corroboration of the confessions was available in Cyprus? Secondly, is the Minister satisfied that no secrets have been lost in relation to the base in Cyprus, and does he accept that, even if he is satisfied, the House cannot be satisfied until there is parliamentary scrutiny of the security services?

Mr. Stanley: On the last point—this is as far as I can go—at the time of the original investigations it was the clear view of the Ministry of Defence security authorities that there was a real likelihood of a serious breach of security having occurred. That was the basis of the relevant papers being passed to the Director of Public Prosecutions. The decision to prosecute is, of course, entirely a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions in consultation with the Attorney-General and they were afforded full access to all the relevant information.

I cannot elaborate on the involvement of other agencies, but the hon. Member can be certain that all reasonable steps were taken to see whether there was any additional evidence in relation to the confessions made by the men.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the main point is whether the alleged statements made by the defendants were voluntary? The jury's verdict says one of two things—that the jury was not satisfied that the statements were voluntary or that it was not satisfied beyond doubt that the statements were voluntary. Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is now considerable public anxiety about this issue and that the manner in which he proposes to resolve this matter by setting up an inquiry is the most effective way of dealing with this problem?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his remarks. He has rightly addressed the nub of the case. He will understand that it would be improper for me to comment on how the jury arrived at their conclusions. I should like warmly to endorse his remarks about the inquiry we are setting up. It must be the correct response to the allegations which have been made. I am certain that Mr. Calcutt's inquiry will produce a proper and independent view of the validity of those allegations.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): What will Mr. David Calcutt's powers be when conducting the inquiry? Will he be confined to examining what happened in the five weeks between 6 February 1984 and 15 March 1984 when the Metropolitan police took responsibility for the case? Will he inquire into whether full details of the incarceration and the length of the interrogation were made available to the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Attorney-General when the decision to prosecute was taken?

Mr. Stanley: When the right hon. and learned Member examines the terms of reference closely, he will see——

Mr. John Morris: The powers.

Mr. Stanley: Yes. Mr. Calcutt's powers initially rest on the terms of reference. They are widely drawn. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that this is a non-statutory inquiry. Mr. Calcutt will of course have the full support of the Law Officers and the Ministry of Defence to ensure that he has access to all the available information.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the issue here is not the mere fact of the acquittals? It would be wrong to suggest that a criminal trial is unsuccessful simply because there is an acquittal. If the speculation that has appeared in today's quality press is true, and is substantiated, it means that people such as my constituent Mr. Geoffrey Jones have been placed in great jeopardy for a long time on the basis of confessions which are not just marginally inadmissible but wholly unsubstantiated. If Mr. Calcutt's inquiry shows that that was the quality of the confessions extracted, the House will expect an assurance that such a set of events can never be repeated.

Mr. Stanley: I agree with my hon. Friend that if the allegations should be substantiated by Mr. Calcutt's inquiry, that will be a serious matter. I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety, which I am sure is shared on both sides of the House. If such matters were proved, we would have to take all possible steps to ensure that there was no repetition of the circumstances.

I should like to repeat what I said previously: I am sure that the House would not wish to reach any conclusion until both sides of the case have been heard and the allegations have for the first time been subjected to detailed independent scrutiny.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): A new independent prosecuting service will shortly take over from the police, with the power to institute prosecutions in court in England and Wales. Will that new procedure apply to the police in the RAF, the Army and the Royal Navy? Will the right hon. Gentleman point out to his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that those young RAF technicians, working at an outstation of GCHQ, were not members of a trade union?

Mr. Stanley: The independent prosecution service will not impinge on proceedings relating to the armed services. I can assure the right hon. Member that, under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, we are bound to produce codes of guidance about questioning, and that is relevant to the case we are discussing. Those codes will ensure that our procedures conform with those adopted in civilian courts. We regard that as an essential policy requirement.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that those proceedings were instituted in accordance with the guidelines laid down by the Attorney General and that the proper legal processes were followed? Will my right hon. Friend squash the nonsensical suggestion that those proceedings should never have been brought?

Mr. Stanley: I understand that that is the case as far as my Department is concerned. I should like to make it clear that in matters such as this, where there is an alleged serious breach of the Official Secrets Acts, there is an obligation on my Department to submit the relevant papers to the Director of Public Prosecutions. This is not a matter where we have discretion, and the papers automatically go to the Director of Public Prosecutions in such cases in accordance with the rules which have been laid down.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): In reference to the last question, does the Minister agree that the inquiry should be broadened to include the decision-making process? The Minister told the House that the decision originated with the Air Force provost marshal. It then went to the Army investigation branch which sent it to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who sent it to the special branch, who returned it to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who finally sent it to the Attorney General, whose guidelines then became involved. Is there not a defect in a decision-making process which allows eight service men to be charged and brought to the Old Bailey on the flimsiest and most insubstantial evidence, which the jury must then consider? Is that not an appropriate subject for inquiry?

Mr. Stanley: I do not think that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) can fairly come to the conclusion that there is a defect in the procedures — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] Because, until Mr. Calcutt has reached his conclusions, there is no possible justification for saying that. The House must appreciate that it is a fundamental responsibility of all three services and of defence Ministers to take the necessary procedural and administrative steps to ensure that the classified and highly sensitive material with which many service men are involved is properly protected. Where breaches of security may have occurred, it is important that there is a procedure clearly laid down for bringing the appropriate cases rapidly to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions. There is nothing in this case which makes us feel anxious that the procedure was not followed.

It is essential that where the armed services' security authorities decide that a serious breach of security may have taken place and that there is a potentially serious breach of the Official Secrets Acts, the relevant papers are drawn to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Should not all concerned have justice? Have not the investigators been condemned outside the court, on the basis of no certain information, for using Gestapo methods? Do the rules of the service allow those investigators to take legal action to defend themselves if they so wish?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend made an entirely fair and necessary point in his opening remarks. Some of the statements made in relation to service police in advance of the independent assessment of the allegations have been quite unjustified, and any such criticisms should await the conclusion of the Calcutt inquiry. That is elementary, fair and necessary justice. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise that the service police investigators are just as entitled to a fair and independent hearing as anybody else.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Are any secret documents or codes still missing?

Mr. Stanley: At the time of the original allegations, it was clear to the security authorities in the services that a serious breach of security appeared to have occurred. That included the apparent loss of documents. I can say nothing more on that.

Mr. Dalyell: Are they still missing?

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will go a long way to stilling the apprehensions of many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and will be welcomed by all except those who would make political mischief out of this unhappy case?

Mr. Stanley: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Adverting to the question of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) will the Minister tell the House what powers Mr. David Calcutt will have — I repeat the word "powers" — if his investigations are to be thorough and complete? Are those powers to include the power to summon witnesses to take evidence on oath or to grant immunity? Surely, failure to give Mr. Calcutt such powers would render his investigation abortive. Does not the Minister agree that the case shows the great danger of allowing prosecutions to be brought on the basis of interrogation rather than collected and substantiated independent evidence?

Mr. Stanley: I understand that Mr. Calcutt will have power to take evidence on oath, but not power to compel the taking of evidence on oath. Immunity is a separate matter that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will be considering with Mr. Calcutt.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): My right hon. Friend will no doubt agree that in most Communist countries people who confess are never acquitted, and this case is a triumph of our system. Will not my right hon. Friend consider that regulations ought to be passed, closely following the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, to safeguard the accused persons, and to make sure that this does not happen again? The regulations should not follow only the evidential points, but should cover as wide a spectrum as possible.

Mr. Stanley: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's first point, that the mere fact of an acquittal is not a matter of criticism under British justice. That matter seems to have been forgotten by some. There are specific provisions in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act that make it necessary for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to publish codes to ensure that service men facing criminal charges will have the same protection as civilians in questioning and related areas.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Will the Minister deal with a specific point? Were the confessions of the service men ruled inadmissible by the trial judge? Upon being acquitted, did the defendants make an application for costs? Does the Minister appreciate that Mr. David Calcutt's inquiry is welcome, but it must take a certain amount of time, and in the intervening period, the acquitted defendants' service careers and reputation are in jeopardy? The Minister seems to imply by innuendo that being acquitted is not the same as innocence; therefore there is a continual slur upon the reputations of those defendants.

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman's last comment is wholly wrong. I believe I made it clear that those men have have been found innocent, and that verdict is totally accepted by Ministers and by the armed services. I give the clearest possible assurance on that point. In answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question, in the case of one service man the confession was ruled inadmissible on the grounds of the medical condition of the service man. The confessions of the remaining seven service men were not ruled inadmissible by the judge.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall allow questions upon this important matter to continue for a further five minutes. We have a very heavy day in front of us.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Minister give us some idea of what particular skill Mr. David Calcutt has in evaluating interrogation techniques involving duress and psychological techniques? Will he give us an assurance that the people who undertook the investigations in Cyprus and elsewhere will be suspended from duty pending Mr. Calcutt's report?

Mr. Stanley: There is no present intention to suspend any of the individuals concerned. That would not be a proper way to proceed in advance of the independent inquiry. Mr. David Calcutt is an extremely eminent silk. He is a former chairman of the Bar, and recently carried out the inquiry into the Falklands hospital fire. I think he is an appropriate person to conduct the investigation.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that in the outcome of this and previous cases neither he nor his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will flinch from taking the necessary action where a grievous haemorrhage of national security is thought to have taken place? May I assure him that he continues to enjoy the confidence of the House and many people outside in the sensitive way in which he has to make those judgments? Will he also take this opportunity to assure the Government and the people of Cyprus that the circumstances surrounding this case in no way undermine the confidence and friendship that we have for them in the common defence of our freedom?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I assure him that defence Ministers and other Ministers take their security responsibilities very seriously; they are a continuing obligation on us. We enjoy a close friendship with Cyprus and good relations with the Cypriot Government, and I am certain that these events will not impair that in any way.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the jury system, as the only shield against injustice, was never better vindicated than in this case; and that in serious matters like this, military tribunals are not effective? The service men would almost certainly have been found guilty under that system. Will my right hon. Friend reconsider compensation? I believe that most of us think that to be charged with treason is possibly worse than being charged with murder, particularly in the armed forces. Bearing in mind that those men and their families have suffered for 22 months, does he not agree that it is ludicrous to think that those men may want to stay in the forces which, bluntly, have treated them so badly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) pointed out? My right hon. Friend says that this has never been done before, but I do not believe that there has been a greater injustice than what took place over the past 22 months in this case. Should we not repay something for 22 months of injustice?

Mr. Stanley: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend's opening remarks, and all of us in the House endorse the jury system. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments about the correctness of ensuring that those proceedings were tried in the civilian courts. In the totality of jurisdiction there are many acquittals, but compensation in this case would raise wide issues which would have to be dealt with by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): As a former military policeman, I think that the important question is whether lawful procedures were followed. Section 75(1) of the Air Force Act 1955 gives protection to airmen against unnecessary delays in the criminal investigation of offences. If that section is found wanting, will the Minister assure the House that, when new primary legislation on military discipline is introduced, this and associated rights will be strengthened in the interests of young service men?

Mr. Stanley: I am sure that the House is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the benefit of his relevant experience. The question whether correct procedures were followed is central to Mr. Calcutt's inquiry. There can be no final answer on that matter until he produces his report. However, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if the report's conclusions suggest changes in procedures, the matter will be examined closely, because our objective is that service men facing charges should have the same protection as civilians.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will my right hon. Friend find time to discuss with the Solicitor-General what happens when several defendants are on trial together? The abuse of the right of peremptory challenge of jurors can mean the introduction of bias into our courts instead of its removal.

Mr. Stanley: I think that my hon. Friend will understand tht that important point is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Can the Minister make a couple of factual observations which do not affect the inquiry? Were the original investigating officers in the case of the Cyprus seven the same officers who investigated the case of Paul Davies?

Secondly, will the Minister confirm that Mr. Costas Elenas, who was referred to throughout the trial, undertook to act as a witness, but that the Attorney-General was not prepared to give him immunity against prosecution in Britain? The Minister has not been forthcoming on the powers of the tribunal. Will witnesses get immunity from prosecution when they appear before judges? Will the evidence be taken on oath? Will witnesses be compelled to come forward and give evidence on oath? Will protection be given to members of the services who give evidence, so that their careers will not be prejudiced in any way?

Regarding ministerial responsibility, the Opposition find it hard to accept that Ministers who have prosecuted Pontin, Paul Davies and now the Cyprus seven did not know what was going on. They should have seen the warning lights about discrepancies that were likely to appear and that there would be a powerful case for the defence in confessions taken under duress.

Regardless of the Prime Minister's concerns, is the Minister convinced that security in Cyprus is now secure — or, following the acquittal, are we looking for somebody else?

Mr. Stanley: As I said in my statement, as soon as this case came to light, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State rightly initiated an exhaustive study of the security procedures in Cyprus and related establishments worldwide. Recommendations arising from detailed investigations have been accepted and have been or are being implemented. No one can express absolute confidence in security, because any security is vulnerable. That is self-evident. I believe that my right hon. Friend has taken the correct steps. A number of changes in security have been made. We have done our utmost to prevent a repetition of this case.

I do not know whether the investigators involved in the earlier proceedings were also involved in this case. I will be happy to look into the matter and give the hon. Gentleman that information. Immunity for witnesses must be a matter for the Attorney General. I have already dealt with taking evidence on oath and with immunity. I made it clear that the question of immunity will be discussed between Mr. Calcutt and the Attorney General.

Board and Lodging (Regulations)

5.42 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said a little earlier that we had a heavy day ahead of us. There seems some prospect that the day might be lightened if the Government were not to move the social security regulations relating to board and lodging payments. Since the Leader of the House is present, perhaps you could give him the opportunity to assist the House. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Joint Committee reported that these regulations may be ultra vires, and the Department is aware that they may be ultra vires. Rather than having the prospect of the Government shooting themselves in the foot again later tonight, can we have the position made clear?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): That was a most helpful intervention on the part of the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General met the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments this afternoon to discuss the effect and meaning of the draft board and lodging regulations. Following this meeting, I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend wishes to give further consideration to some of the points raised by the Committee. In these circumstances, the Government do not believe that it would be right to ask the House to debate these regulations tonight.

Access to Personal Files

5.43 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide access for private individuals to information relating to themselves maintained by certain authorities, institutions and persons; to allow individuals to obtain copies of, and require corrections to be made to, such information; and to provide for the enforcement of these provisions.

The House will be aware that a similar Bill was before us as recently as last Session. In July 1984 the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) introduced a measure in very similar terms. This Bill, as did that, has all-party support. This Bill, as did that, will no doubt fall when the House is prorogued tomorrow afternoon.

The sponsors of the Bill have deliberately sought to draw the attention of the House to this measure on the last day of the parliamentary Session. This is done on the basis that it has merits which are unique and on which I hope to address the House briefly in a moment. We also seek to highlight opportunities in the forthcoming ballots for private Members' Bills, bringing with them, as they do automatically, the parliamentary time required to translate any such Bill to the statute book. Statutory provision for putting this Bill on the statute book is the goal of the sponsors, and nothing less will do.

If I did not run the risk of straying out of order, Mr. Speaker, I would spend the rest of my 10 minutes engaging in a commercial or a trailer for the private Members' ballot, because this Bill is unique in as much as it is achievable, it is non-controversial and a lot of time has been spent in making it such. It would have a profound impact in changing attitudes to secrecy in this country, and it would have widespread support. If it found favour this afternoon, the Bill would be in a printed form.

The timing of the measure is particularly appropriate. It is the next most obvious step in the whole campaign for freedom of information, which it would be in the interests of the country to achieve.

The need for the Bill is urgent and self-evident. Two major problems currently arise. Factual errors can be made, sometimes caused by carelessness, and at other times made in good faith. However the errors are generated, they can result in Executive action and administrative decisions leading to quite inappropriate treatment, in a health context, or other equally serious personal injustices.

The most recent example that has come to my notice was the tragic death of four-year-old Jasmine Beckford, where it became clear in the subsequent inquiry that the report on the foster parents, when Jasmine Beckford was taken from them, was quite inaccurate and may have contributed to the decision by the social work department to return her to her stepfather and natural mother. Alternatively, situations can arise where information of a highly subjective or speculative nature or pure opinion can be included in a file which, if promulgated unchallenged, can cause distress and damage which can be prejudicial to individuals. As an example, health records may contain comments such as "Doesn't like doctors." This health record pursues the person throughout his medical history and can have unfortunate and unjustified results.

There have been some encouraging signs. Some of these problems are being recognised in some quarters. Some authorities and professional bodies already actively encourage a policy of free access, and the results of this experience, such as have been reported, are wholly beneficial. The experience reported from other countries which operate a policy of free access is also wholly encouraging. The House should study with care the results of the introduction of free access in America, where a staggeringly high number of reported errors and inaccuracies was found when the policy was introduced.

Our Government have, in a limited way, introduced systems which allow some access in certain situations. For example, the Housing Act 1980 means that housing applications are now covered to some extent. There is also the Education Act 1981 and the DHSS circular of 1983 on guidance to social work authorities. These are all encouraging and very welcome signs.

The Bill will also redress the anomaly that will exist in November 1987 after the full implementation of the Data Protection Act, which creates a statutory right of access to electronically but not manually stored information. We shall then be in the ridiculous position that if a person lives in a part of the country where records are stored electronically he can have access, but if they are not so stored he is denied access.

The powers of the Bill allow an individual to discover whether certain records are held, allow for the supply of copies of any records, allow inaccuracies to be corrected, allow individuals to seek compensation where damage or distress can be proved to have flowed from errors, and allow recourse to the courts if the authority holding the information fails to comply with the law.

The Bill embraces the principal public authorities providing services to the public. This includes health authorities, individual doctors, education authorities, social work departments, any credit agencies that keep records of the ratings of an individual and certain administration of justice records, and authorities whose duties include the administration of benefits, grants and other types of assistance to the public.

The restriction to these public authorities is a deliberate compromise. Some sponsors would like the Bill to be much more widely drawn, but it is deliberately limited to enhance the prospects of wider acceptance, and therefore increase the chances of its getting on to the statute book.

The important part of that compromise, and the important exceptions built into the Bill, can be briefly stated. They are that information will not be released when it involves the privacy of any other person, when it reveals the identity of someone who gave information on a confidential basis, when someone other than the applicant might be subjected to physical harm as a result of the release of the information, or when, in a few cases, it is the opinion of a doctor that it could cause mental distress to a patient. Finally, information will not be released when it would breach established legal, professional privileges.

The Bill is well thought out and properly drafted. I pay tribute to the work being done by the Campaign for Freedom of Information, which is widely respected and straddles all strands of opinion in the country, political and otherwise, and which has done a great deal of work. The past 18 months have been spent in extremely thorough consultation with the interested parties and in winning over some of the professional bodies which originally had doubts about the Bill. It is a highly popular issue with the public, and therefore it is extremely unlikely that it would be actively opposed by the Government.

We need access as of right to information recorded about ourselves, and we need the right to ensure that such information is both fair and correct. The legislation to create those rights will do more to enhance the quality of our democracy and redress the balance between the administrative arm of government and the individual than almost any other Bill that could be introduced by a Back-Bench Member. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will give the Bill careful consideration when the private Members' ballot is held. I hope that the Bill will find favour with the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Mr. Robin Corbett, Mr. Robert Maclennan, Mr. Steve Norris, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Donald Stewart, Mr. James Wallace and Mr. Dafydd Wigley.

Access to Personal Files

Mr. Archy Kirkwood accordingly presented a Bill to provide access for private individuals to information relating to themselves maintained by certain authorities, institutions and persons; to allow individuals to obtain copies of, and require corrections to be made to, such information; and to provide for the enforcement of these provisions:

And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill No. 214.]

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

I hope that we shall not spend long debating the motion, and will instead move swiftly to considering the amendments to the Bill that have come from the other place.

The vast majority of the amendments are purely drafting and technical, but a significant number make important and constructive changes, notably the additional provisions to ensure that the interests of elderly and disabled passengers receive due attention. These amendments, and more of the other substantive amendments, were initiated by the Opposition or by Back-Bench Members of the other place. We tried wherever possible to respond positively where we felt that amendments were genuinely seeking to improve the Bill rather than to undermine its fundamental principles. I said before the Second Reading that we wanted to fashion a better Bill, and these amendments go towards achieving that.

Last night, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) did not know whether to attack the amendments or to welcome them. I can understand her dilemma, because the amendments reinforce the Bill, whereas she simply wishes to wreck it. True to form, the Opposition have tabled a number of amendments, some of which raise again the fundamental issues of policy underlying the Bill. I shall be disappointed if the Opposition choose to waste time today on the motion, rather than getting on with considering the issues.

This is a long and complex Bill, but, despite the guillotine, it has received very thorough consideration by Parliament. In this House alone, the time spent so far amounts to some 174 hours. In the other place, the Bill received some 70 hours of debate, and there were some 20 Divisions. The supplement to the order will ensure that we have a further 4 hours of debate this evening. I know that a large number of amendments have been accepted for debate. It is a bit hard to respond to the Opposition by being flexible and accepting amendments and then to be accused, as I was last night, of not having prepared the Bill properly.

It is time that the Bill was on the statute book. It puts the customer first, by removing unnecessary restrictions over competition between operators. It applies to the bus industry the market approach that is regarded as perfectly normal, and indeed vital, in most other sectors of the economy. Urgent action is needed to stem the sorry pattern of declining patronage, rising costs and escalating subsidy. No Government could sit on their hands and allow the decline to continue. That would not be in the interests of passengers and it would certainly not be in the interests of the industry and those who work in it.

It was in July last year that we set out in the White Paper our reasons for believing that customers on local bus services now deserve the same benefits as passengers on express services have enjoyed since 1980. We consulted widely on the White Paper and we brought forward a Bill, dealing not just with deregulation, but providing for a comprehensive package of measures to enable competition to operate fairly, within a stable framework of safety controls and financial support for socially desirable services. The Bill has now received the fullest possible examination by Parliament over a period of nine months.

Operators and local authorities have much to do between now and deregulation day on 26 October next year to prepare for the new system. The order will ensure that the House has the opportunity to decide at a reasonable hour this evening the last few remaining issues to be resolved. The Bill can then complete its final stages and the industry, and those who work with it, can get on with the task of making the transition to deregulation. The time for arguing is coming to an end, and the time for action is about to begin.

5.58 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It is instructive to look carefully at the Bill that we are now hurrying on to the statute book with the aid of a timetable motion. It will initiate a revolution not just in local public transport but in parliamentary procedure, and the results of the experiments prove that there should be no repetition of the methods used by the Secretary of State.

The Government have a manifesto commitment to more competition in the bus industry, and that was taken as justification for ignoring the whole of the normal consultation procedures. The White Paper on buses, published in July 1984, was written without any of the normal discussions and in a form that made it difficult for people to respond easily to it. There were 7,000 respondents. They were required to let the Department have their views during the two summer months. That shows the depth of anger that this extraordinary legislation has aroused.

It is interesting to note that only a handful of the 7,000 who responded supported the Government's plans. One of their supporters, from the Adam Smith Institute, was a bankrupt bus operator. That there were 7,000 replies shows the depth of anger aroused by the Bill. When it was published in February 1985 it was found that bus substitution had been added to the original legislation, yet this had been discussed only in a Green Paper that applied to Wales. This was to become law on the basis of no real examination of its implications for the whole of the United Kingdom.

The Government showed how much interest they have in informed discussion through their choice of Committee members. Many Tory Members of Parliament who are known to have an interest in transport were deliberately excluded. Committee membership was top heavy with Parliamentary Private Secretaries and the most junior Members of the House. The Government's fear of open debate went even further. They refused to wait until the Select Committee report on buses was published, although they were aware that it was a detailed and useful examination of an enormous lacuna in this legislation. The Government went further still by making personal attacks on the Chairman of the Select Committee, a most valued and highly independent Member of Parliament whom we shall miss very much indeed.

The Committee stage began on 21 February. By April fool's day—94 debating hours and one non-Government amendment later—the Government asked, for the first time, for the imposition of the guillotine. Only 11 clauses had been debated. The only non-Government amendment made at that stage was the reduction in the retirement age for traffic commissioners from 70 to 65. By 7 May the Committee stage was completed, after another 55 hours of debate—a total of 150 hours of discussion. During that time the Government allowed two non-Conservative amendments——

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: They allowed rail and ferry travel to remain within the concessionary fares rules, including the change to which I have already referred.

Then the Government allowed Tory Back Benchers to stage probably the most phoney rebellion that one has ever seen in a Committee. To say that it was ill rehearsed is to put it mildly. Suddenly we were told that no longer would the public be allowed to object to the issue of public service vehicle licences when operators were thought to be unsuitable by the customer. Later the Government repented and introduced a very much amended and weaker version which still excludes the general public and includes only local authorities and the police. The Government were clearly terrified of allowing the general public to have a say. Therefore, they decided to remove that aspect from the legislation. By that stage the Government had amended their Bill no fewer than 122 times.

Mr. Forth rose——

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Report stage on 22 May made the new parliamentary procedure much clearer. During the two days of debate the Government blocked all 17 amendments from Opposition Members, but 138 Government amendments and 13 new clauses were passed. The Government used the House as a departmental drafting body. Although hon. Members were allowed to vent their anger, they were outvoted. The tidying up of the Government's unformed schemes went ahead unaffected. The result was that 13 hours of debate produced more change than the 150 hours of detailed discussion. The Government could not have shown more clearly their deep contempt for the House of Commons as a place of debate and enlightenment.

Mr. Forth rose——

Mrs. Dunwoody: In July the Government proved that they could go one better. The other place debated the Bill in Committee for six days. Well over 300 amendments were discussed—mainly Government amendments. The same drafting method was applied in another place. On Report in another place between 14 and 17 October the drafting system was used to deal with over 400 amendments—again, tabled mainly by the Government. Finally, on 24 October, on Third Reading in another place, there were still 86 amendments to be dealt with. The Government made 420 amendments to their Bill during its passage in another place, but only one non-Government amendment was accepted. It watered down the effect of the Tory rebellion in Committee in this place.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I shall give way in a moment.

During the nine months in which the Bill has been debated in Parliament, the Government have amended it 680 times and added over 30 new clauses. However, they have not made the slightest gesture in the direction of the views of the general public, of anybody involved in the transport industry or of the local authorities which will be most directly involved.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): Does the hon. Lady accept that many of the Government amendments were tabled in response to points raised either in Committee or after consultation with local authorities, bus operators and others in the industry?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I do not. If one looks at the number of amendments that the Government are still trying to write into the Bill, one finds that many of them arise not from changes of principle — certainly not from consultations, which this Secretary of State does not understand in any practical way—but from the fact that the Bill was badly drafted and ill conceived. It should not have been introduced in this Session of Parliament. There should have been consultation on a Green Paper.

We are dealing with one of the greatest changes in public transport in 50 years, yet the Secretary of State has followed no real consultation procedure. He has rejected the normal parliamentary procedures. Instead of legislation being introduced with a view to considering the reaction of hon. Members, the legislative procedure has been turned into a sham in a ruthless attempt to save time. The only real discussion that was allowed took place in the Department. The House has been regarded as a very minor step in the presentation of the Secretary of State's views —or perhaps I should say his prejudices. He knows that he has been found wanting by the courts of this land. I shall not refer to his theft of £50 million from the Greater London council for London Regional Transport. Consultation is an important aspect when framing legislation. I remind the Secretary of State——

Mr. Ridley rose——

Mrs. Dunwoody: I shall give way in a moment to the Secretary of State.

I remind the Secretary of State of a point made by the judge when one case was brought before the courts. It was pointed out to the Secretary of State that consultation means more than simply telling people what will be done. When he consults the House, he must be willing to listen to the arguments. The fact that 680 amendments were made, only two of which were Opposition amendments, shows how little the Secretary of State has learnt. About 1,700 amendments were tabled. The Secretary of State can congratulate himself upon the fact that no real account has been taken of the views of the general public or of anybody who recognises how vital public transport is to the people of this country. I congratulate him upon having acted in an unacceptable way. He has behaved in an even more arrogant fashion than is his wont.

		"In section 53(1), the words "the" before the words "traffic commissioners" and the words "or section 45".".

Mr. Ancram: This is a group of consequential and drafting amendments. Their most important purpose is to bring the terminology of the Transport Act 1968, the Energy Act 1976 the Public Passenger Vehicles Act 1981 and the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 into line with that of the Bill, and to provide that phrases such as "stage carriage" in previous legislation, including local and subordinate legislation, have a continuing meaning.

The amendment to clause 2 ensures that separate "fares" in that clause has the same meaning as in section 2 of the 1981 Act, thus preventing the evasion of registration by bogus free services.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 3

TRAFFIC COMMISSIONERS

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 3, line 2, leave out "section" and insert "sections".

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall discuss the following Lords amendments: No. 3, in page 3, line 31, at end insert—

"5.—(1) Every traffic commissioner shall publish, in such form and at such times as may be prescribed, such information with respect to the exercise, or proposed exercise, of any of his functions under this Act or the Transport Act 1985 as may be prescribed.

(2) Where the traffic commissioner for a traffic area publishes information under this section he shall—

(a) send a copy of the publication—

(i) to every chief officer of police, Passenger Transport Executive and local authority whose area falls partly or wholly within that traffic area; and

(ii) where that traffic area falls wholly or partly within London, to London Regional Transport; and

(b) make a copy of it available (by post if required and on payment of such fee as may be prescribed) to anyone who asks for one.

(3) In this section "local authority" means—

(a) in England and Wales, the council of any non-metropolitan county, any district or London borough or the Common Council of the City of London; and

(b) in Scotland, any regional or islands council.".

No. 11, in clause 6, page 7, line 5, leave out from first "to" to second "the".

No. 13, in clause 6, page 7, line 25, leave out subsection (9) and (10).

No. 20, in clause 7, page 9, line 33, leave out subsection (15).

No. 270, in clause 110, page 109, line 38, after "Act" insert—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

"(b) traffic regulation conditions determined under section 7 of this Act;"

No. 321, in schedule 2, page 127, line 27, leave out from "or" to end of line 30.

No. 378, in schedule 6, page 148, line 23, at end insert—

"(7A) In section 56(1) (records of licences etc.) there shall be added, at the end, the words "and shall allow the record to be inspected at all reasonable times by members of the public"."

No. 409, in schedule 7, page 152, line 44, column 3, leave out "(1)" and insert "in subsection (1)"

No. 410, in schedule 7, page 152, line 45, column 3, at end insert "and subsection (2)"

Mr. Ancram: These amendments put the traffic commissioners' publication "Notice and Proceedings" on a statutory footing, and remove the separate and then redundant requirement for the Traffic Commissioners to send details of registrations to local authorities and the police. The amendment provides for the content of notices and proceedings to be specified in regulations. It will cover registrations, traffic regulation conditions and applications for operators' licences, among other things. It will be provided free to local authorities and the police, and will be a general sale. The group also includes amendments simplifying and codifying the requirement on the traffic commissioners to keep records of licences, traffic regulations and so on, and make them available to members of the public.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 3 agreed to.

Clause 4

INQUIRIES HELD BY TRAFFIC COMMISSIONERS

Lords amendment: No. 4, in page 4, line 17, at end insert—

"(4A) Where a traffic commissioner holds an inquiry he may, in such circumstances as may be prescribed and subject to any provision made under subsection (4B) below, make such order as he thinks fit as to the payment, by such party to the inquiry as he thinks fit, of costs incurred by him or by the Secretary of State in connection with the holding of the inquiry.

(4B) Regulations may make provision, in relation to orders under subsection (4A) above, as to—

(a) the method of calculating the amount of any costs incurred as mentioned in that subsection; and

(b) the maximum amount which may be ordered to be paid under such an order.

(4C) Any amount so ordered to be paid by any person may be recoverable from him—

(a) in England and Wales, as a debt due to the Crown; or

(b) in Scotland, by the Secretary of State.".

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This amendment gives the traffic commissioner a power to award costs, which will be used to deter delaying tactics and similar abuses, for instance by people called before him for possible disciplinary action.

The amendment gives power to the commissioner to recover only his costs, and those of the Department in providing accommodation and clerical assistance for an inquiry. It does not enable the commissioner to order one party to pay the costs of another. We understand from the commissioners that they would not welcome the responsibility of adjudicating in such a way, and, of course, in many public service vehicle operator licensing cases, particularly the disciplinary ones of which we are primarily thinking, there is only one party—the person whom the commissioner has called to the inquiry.

The regulations we shall make under subsection (4A) will limit the recovery of costs to cases where the person against whom the award is made has acted vexatiously, frivolously or the like. The vast majority of people appearing at commissioners' inquiries, for whatever reason, need not fear an increased expense. Indeed, they and all licence holders will benefit if the commissioners' costs are kept down because all costs are met from fees. We see that power as a deterrent and, we hope, an effective one—and not a way of raising money.

The regulations will lay down the way in which costs are calculated, and a maximum. That will prevent the commissioners' task from being invidious.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 6

REGISTRATION OF LOCAL SERVICES

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 6, line 2, leave out second "a" and insert "an unconditional".

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall discuss the following Lords amendments:

No. 6, in page 6, line 4, after "bus" insert "belonging to that person".

No. 7, in page 6, line 5, at end insert—

"(4A) In subsection (4) above "unconditional", in relation to a PSV operator's licence, means a licence which does not have attached to it a condition imposed under section 26(1) of this Act prohibiting, or having the effect of prohibiting, the operator from using vehicles under the licence to provide the service to which the application in question relates."

No. 8, in page 6, line 9, leave out "at the instance of" and insert

("on an application made by")

No 9, in page 6, line 14, leave out from "commissioner" to "and" in line 15, and insert "accepts the application".

No. 10, in page 6, line 43, leave out paragraph (e) and insert—

"(e) for an application for registration or for the variation or cancellation of a registration not to be accepted by the traffic commissioner to whom it is made unless the applicant gives to the commissioner such information as he may reasonably require in connection with the application.".

No. 12, in page 7, line 24, at end insert—

"(kk) for excluding from the application of this section services which are—

(i) excursions or tours; or

(ii) excursions or tours falling within a prescribed class.".

No. 14, in clause 7, page 7, line 44, leave out from "service" to end of line 45 and insert

"means any local service to which section 6 of this Act applies".

No. 32, in clause 12, page 14, line 41, at end insert—

"(5A) in subsection (5)(b) above "local service" does not include an excursion or tour.".

No. 50, in clause 25, page 25, line 36, at end insert—

"(2A) Where the effect of a condition attached to a PSV operator's licence under subsection (1) above is that the operator of a local service registered under section 6 of this Act is prohibited from using vehicles under the licence to provide that service, the traffic commissioner attaching the condition may—

(a) cancel the registration; or

(b) where the service is registered with another traffic commissioner, direct that it be cancelled.

(2B) Where a direction is given under subsection (2A)(b) above, it shall be the duty of the traffic commissioner with whom the service is registered to cancel the registration.".

No. 269, in clause 110, page 109, line 21, leave out paragraph (a) and insert—

"(a) applications for the registration of services under section 6 of this Act and for the variation of such registrations.

Mr. Ancram: This group of amendments closes some possible loopholes in the registration system, by precluding registration by operators with conditions on their operators' licences, preventing them from running local services, or by education authorities which are using contract services rather than their own vehicles to provide school transport. That makes it more flexible by allowing for the exemption of certain excursions or tours from registration. We propose to require only these excursions that are hard to distinguish from ordinary local services to register. The other amendments in the group are drafting improvements.

Mr. Ridley: These amendments are all consequential on the enactment of the Local Government Act 1985. As the House knows, that Act became law after this Bill had left the House, and the amendments are a result of that Act now being on the statute book.

If any hon. Member wishes to ask about any particular amendment, I shall be happy to reply. However, it is a complex and technical story which I would spare the House if it does not wish to hear it.

New Clause

TAXI LICENSING: CONTROL OF NUMBERS

Lords amendment: No. 38, to leave out clause 16 and insert the following new clause—

"16. The provisions of the Town and Police Clauses Act 1847 with respect to hackney carriages, as incorporated in any enactment (whenever passed), shall have effect—

(a) as if in section 37, the words "such number of" and "as they think fit" were omitted; and

(b) as if they provided that the grant of a licence may be refused, for the purpose of limiting the number of hackney carriages in respect of which licences are granted, if, but only if, the person authorised to grant licences is satisfied that there is no significant demand for the services of hackney carriages (within the area to which the licence would apply) which is unmet."

6.30 pm

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient to take at the same time Lords amendment No. 381, schedule 6, in page 149, leave out lines 30 to 38 and insert—

""(3) Without prejudice to paragraph 5 of Schedule 1 to this Act, the grant of a taxi licence may be refused by a licensing authority for the purpose of limiting the number of taxis in respect of which licences are granted by them if, but only if, they are satisfied that there is no significant demand for the services of taxis in their area which is unmet.""

Mr. Ridley: This group of amendments changes substantially clause 16 from the form in which it left the House. The main change is to the criteria according to which a district council may refuse to grant a taxi licence to limit the number of taxis, a rather convoluted provision that we had taken from the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which had attracted some adverse comment in this House and was the subject of litigation in the Scottish courts. It has been replaced by a much clearer set of words.

As well as that change to the criteria, the form in which they are expressed has been changed in response to constructive criticism in another place. The amendment to the Town Police Clauses Act 1847 is now made by reference rather than textually. Such a method of amendment is, generally, the inferior one, but in a case such as this—for which the antiquity of the statute is to blame—it produces a clearer result, and there is no need to refer to the interpretation Act or to the "prescribed distance", a concept which is a throwback to the last century.

I should perhaps emphasise that there is no fundamental change in policy. It is the Government's clear view that the restriction of numbers in any industry is justifiable only in the most exceptional circumstances and that the strict limits which many district councils have imposed have been bad for the trade and for its customers. The Bill opens the way for the taxi trade to expand into new markets, in particular those at shared fares. It would be a tragedy if it failed to take advantage of these opportunities, kept out new blood and remained wedded to the past. It would be a tragedy if the only way someone could start a new small taxi business was to spend many thousands of pounds on buying someone else's plate.

The Bill does not, however, and never did, simply abolish quantity control. It allows a district council to refuse a licence application so as to limit numbers—as well, of course, as on grounds of unsuitability—but it puts the onus on the council of satisfying itself that there is no significant unmet demand. Any applicant who is refused a licence will be able to appeal to the Crown court, and I am sure that the court will test whether the council had good grounds for its refusal.

It will not be sufficient that the existing taxi trade says that it can cope or that it has always been the council's policy to have no more than, say, 87 taxis. If a new applicant intends to tap new markets—for instance, by running registered local services—I do not believe that any council could refuse the licence. But if there is demonstrably an over-supply of taxis in a district, as there may be in some cities, a licence could be refused.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify, in relation to the Scottish position, whether he is requiring district councils to review from time to time the number of taxis in their areas? He will be aware that I raised that matter in Committee.

Mr. Ridley: The amendment changes the wording of the Scottish measure so that the arrangements are the same as for England. Therefore, what I have been saying applies equally to Scotland.

I hope, therefore, that all district councils will review their policies and act liberally, as the law will require, and that we shall no longer see the sort of under-supply that has led to taxi plates changing hands at ridiculous prices. We shall, of course, monitor carefully what happens; and take everything into account in the review of taxi and hire car legislation that we shall undertake once the Bill has been implemented.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): I argued in Committee, as did a number of other hon. Members, that the Bill as originally drafted, by a liberal interpretation of the Scottish wording, allowed a local authority effectively to bring back quantity control by the back door. The amendments will make it much more difficult for a local authority to bring back quantity control without good reason. Consequently, I welcome them.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): What extra funds does the right hon. Gentleman intend to make available to local authorities for the monitoring of the position?

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues, in particular the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), for their responsive attitude when I brought to them a group of taxi drivers from my constituency. I am grateful for the consideration that Ministers have given to the points that were made and the way in which the Bill, as amended, will implement the requests that were made.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for taking on board many of the points that have been made during the passage of the Bill. I am certain that the way in which he has listened to the representations made by taxi drivers and licensed operators will be appreciated in that trade. I particularly welcome his undertaking to review carefully what happens as a consequence of this legislation. That is important, because there is much scope for change and certain things may not go as planned. To have that undertaking for the future will give reassurance to this important trade.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I welcome the amendment. Its presence may have something to do with the fact that the noble and learned Lord Denning, as well as my noble Friend Lord Winchilsea, spoke on this issue in the other place. Common sense has at last prevailed in the description of the situation. For example, from the point of view of Liverpool, when all controls were removed, there were too many taxis on the streets with too few customers in them, and that led to much unrest and bickering between taxi operators.

Had the amendment not been proposed, I should have feared the worst in my constituency, certainly out of season. However, even in season, in Ryde esplanade and elsewhere, there would have been many arguments, because we already have too many taxis in competition. The amendment will introduce some balance into the situation, and for that it is to be welcomed.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) and for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) for their remarks. It is known that we shall be reviewing the whole of taxi legislation. That will be a mammoth task, but it will provide an opportunity to monitor the progress of this provision to see that it is operating correctly. As I said, we shall keep a close eye on it to make sure that all is well.

The answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) is that we, not the local authorities, will be doing the monitoring, so no question of extra expense for local authorities arises.

Clause 17

LONDON TAXI AND TAXI DRIVER LICENSING APPEALS

Lords amendment: No. 39, in page 18, line 28, leave out from "to" to end of line 29 and insert "the appropriate court".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following Lords amendments:

No. 40, in page 18, line 38, leave out from "to" to end of line 39 and insert "the appropriate court".

No. 41, in page 18, line 40, leave out "a magistrates" and insert "the".

No. 43, in page 19, line 17, at end insert—

"(10) In this section "the appropriate court" means the magistrates court for the petty sessions area in which the licensing authority has his office or, if he has more than one office, his principal office."

Mr. Mitchell: This group of technical amendments have the effect of changing the magistrates court to which appeals are to be made from that for the area in which the appellant resides to the court for the area in which the licensing authority has its office. It was pointed out in another place that the previous arrangement might prove inconvenient in that many taxi drivers live well outside London. That is a valid point and we are making these amendments to improve a position that has been generally welcomed.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Bermondsey and Southwark): I am grateful that at last we shall have got right a clause which we have long needed. The House will be aware that the system under which licences were revoked or suspended disappeared into a silent mist originally in the office of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. One could never get at the facts. The system is to be moved to the Department of Transport, and with this amendment we shall get it into the court structure so that somebody who has his livelihood taken away will be able to challenge the decision in an open place, know the evidence against him and be able to argue against that evidence.

The Under-Secretary of State has cleared up the problems which rendered it inappropriate for a person's case to be determined where he resided. It is to be welcomed that it will be possible to argue a case, if someone is to be deprived of his livelihood, in the place where he earns his livelihood. I hope this part of the statute will be implemented soon. I do not agree with every part of the Bill, but I think that this part of it is good. I hope that its implementation will not be delayed after the Bill becomes law, so that taxi and cab drivers may have justice.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I think that this is a good example of the many instances where the Bill has been improved in its passage through the House.

PERMITS UNDER SECTION 19: REGULATIONS

Lords amendment: No. 44, in page 22, line 14, leave out subsection (3).

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 280, in clause 117, page 114, line 8, leave out from beginning to "in" in line 11.

No. 281, in clause 118, page 115, line 13, at end insert "; and in subsection (2) of that section (duty to consult before making regulations under section 59 or 60 of that Act) the words "section 59 or 60 of" shall be omitted".

No. 412, in schedule 7 page 153, line 9, column 3, at end insert—

"In section 61(2) the words "section 59 or 60 of"".

Mr. Mitchell: The amendments tidy up the requirement on the Secretary of State to consult representative organisations before making regulations under the 1981 Act or parts I or II of the Bill. They are technical, and I suspect that they will meet with the approval of the House.

Clause 24

LIMIT ON NUMBER OF VEHICLES TO BE USED UNDER A RESTRICTED LICENCE

Lords amendment: No. 45, in page 24, line 22, after "not" insert

", except in any prescribed case or class or case,".

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is designed to recognise the special position of the Post Office, which runs a large number of post buses under restricted licenses. The Post Office, therefore, needs an exemption from the limitation of two to the number of vehicles that may be run under such a licence.

New Clause

OBJECTIONS TO APPLICATION FOR PSV OPERATORS' LICENCE

Lords amendment: No. 46, after clause 24, insert the following new clause—

" .—(1) After section 14 of the 1981 Act (Grant of licences) there shall be inserted the following section—

"Objections to application for PSV operators' licence

14A.—(1) Where an application is made for the grant of a PSV operator's licence under this Act any chief officer of police or local authority may object to the grant of the licence on the ground that one or more of the requirements mentioned in section 14(1) and (3) of this Act are not satisfied in relation to the application.

(2) An objection under this section shall be made within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner and shall contain particulars of the ground on which it is made.

(3) The onus of proof of the existence of the ground on which an objection is made shall lie on the objector.

(4) In this section "local authority" means—

(a) in England and Wales, the council of a county, district or London borough or the Common Council of the City of London or a Passenger Transport Executive, and

(b) in Scotland, a regional or islands council.

(5) This section does not apply in relation to any application for a special licence (within the meaning of section 12 of the Transport Act 1985)."

Read a Second time.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I beg to move amendment (a) to the proposed Lords amendment, in line 6, after 'authority', insert 'or any individual resident living in the area of the relevant traffic authority'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendment: No. 55, in clause 30, page 28, line 33, at end insert—

"(2A) Where an application for a PSV operator's licence is granted under this Act and a person who duly made an objection to the grant under section 14A of this Act is aggrieved by the grant of the licence he may appeal to the Transport Tribunal."

Mrs. Dunwoody: Amendment No. 46 tends to put together some of the ingredients which were found in the Bill as it first came before the House. It highlights the absurdity and, indeed, farcical quality of much of the debate that has taken place.

Clause 22 of the original Bill included the perfectly sensible undertaking that those who wished to make representations to the traffic commissioners could do so where they had reason to believe that those who were being considered for licences were not suitable. We then had an extraordinary element of humour in the Committee because, half way through Committee, Conservative Back Benchers discovered that the clause was dangerous and had to be taken out of the Bill. Ministers agreed with astonishing alacrity. It is obvious that they reconsidered the position and appreciated that there would be those who wished to give evidence to the traffic commissioners. After much humming and hawing, we have a milder, much weaker undertaking that provides that those who are involved with local authorities and the police can object. We think that is excellent.

Where there are environmental matters, it is important that local authorities should have a say. It is quite possible that the police will know something about prospective operators and their past records. However, those who may still be in the best position to weigh up the real impact of an application are other operators, members of the public or business men and professionals with local knowledge. They will be unable to object.

The Government repeatedly said that the Bill is about protecting the interests of the public. We know that that claim is totally hollow and that their aim is to break up efficient public enterprises so that their friends can take the profits on the good routes while casting the remainder to the winds and the few crumbs of subsidy that will be left.

If the Government really are a caring Administration who mean what they say, let them accept the amendment.

6.45 pm

Mr. David Mitchell: The amendment to the amendment is undesirable——

Mrs. Dunwoody: Why?

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. Lady will allow me, I shall explain. The amendment is undesirable because we must keep to the minimum the number of people able, by appealing against the grant of a licence, to prolong the time during which a new operator is uncertain whether he has a stable business or not. It is unnecessary, because if anyone—operators, suppliers or private individuals—has reason to know that an applicant for a licence does not satisfy the requirements as to good repute, financial standing and professional competence, and tells the traffic commissoner, the commissioner is bound to consider what he is being told. He cannot ignore the facts, if they are relevant, merely because the person has no formal status as an objector.

We considered this matter fully in Committee and there is nothing further which can be said. I have explained that the amendment is not desirable because it will cause delay and uncertainty. We want to encourage new operators. We do not wish to erect barriers to bar them, as the hon. Lady would. The hon. Lady would regulate everything out of existence if she had the opportunity to do so.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I think it will be noted by the general public that at a time when there are considerable worries about the safety of public vehicles, the Minister feels that there is no need to give the general public the right to make representations on important matters such as new operators and their suitability for licence.

Mr. Mitchell: I want the hon. Lady to be quite clear that she is completely wrong in what she has just said. There is nothing to stop the people to whom she is referring from making representations——

Mrs. Dunwoody: They have no standing.

Mr. Mitchell: They do not have the status of objectors which enables them to appeal against the traffic commissioner's findings, but they do have the right to make representations. The hon. Lady is entirely wrong to suggest that they have no right to do so.

Clause 25

CONDITIONS ATTACHED TO PSV OPERATORS' LICENCES

Lords amendment: No. 48, in page 25, line 27, leave out "shall not" and insert "may"

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 49, in page 25, line 29, leave out from "subsection" to second "or" in line 31 and insert

"if, but only if, it appears to him that the operator did not have a reasonable excuse for his conduct".

Mr. Mitchell: Under the clause as drafted the traffic commissioner may attach conditions preventing an operator from running local services in future if he has broken the registration rules, but he may do so only if the operator's conduct was intentional, reckless, dangerous or frequent. The amendment substitutes the words "without reasonable excuse" for "intentional or reckless". "Intentional or reckless" was taken from the 1981 Act, where it qualifies the circumstances in which a road service licence may be revoked because of breaches of conditions by operators. "Without reasonable excuse" is used in the clause which deals with loss of fuel duty rebate for contravention of registration rules, and is more modern and appropriate.

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO CONDITIONS ATTACHED TO PSV OPERATORS' LICENCES UNDER SECTION 25

Lords amendment No. 51: in page 26, line 19, leave out from beginning to "or" in line 22 and insert

"if he, within the prescribed period, received a request for an inquiry from the holder of, or (as the case may be) applicant for, the licence."

Mr. Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 52, in page 26, line 22, leave out "or (b)" and insert—

"(2) Subsection (1) above shall not apply where the traffic commissioner"

APPEALS UNDER THE 1981 ACT

Lords amendments No. 55 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 56, in page 29, line 25, at end insert—

"(5A) Where a traffic commissioner has given a direction under subsection (5) above he may withdraw it at any time."

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following Lords amendments:

No. 57, in page 29, line 27, after "above" insert "or withdraws such a direction".

No. 58, in page 29, line 28, leave out second "it" and insert "such a direction".

No. 59, in page 29, line 31, leave out "Subsections (3) to (7) above do" and insert "This section does".

No. 60, in page 29, line 35, leave out from beginning to end of line 43.

No. 61, in page 30, line 9, leave out from beginning to "may" in line 13 and insert—

"(2) Where the refusal by a certifying officer or public service vehicle examiner to remove a prohibition under subsection (1) of section 9 of this Act (including a prohibition under that subsection as it applies by virtue of section 9A of this Act) has been referred to a certifying officer ("the referee") under subsection (8) of that section by a traffic commissioner, any person aggrieved by the refusal of the referee to remove the prohibition".

No. 62, in page 30, line 24, leave out from "officer" to "for" in line 25.

No. 63, in page 30, line 26, leave out

"or public service vehicle examiner".

No. 375, in schedule 6, page 148, line 4, at end insert—

"(2A) In section 9 (power to prohibit driving of unfit public service vehicles), in subsection (8), after the word "examiner", in the second place where it occurs, there shall be inserted the words "or certifying officer" and for the words "by a certifying officer and" there shall be substituted—

"(a) in the case of a refusal by a public service vehicle examiner, by a certifying officer; and

(b) in the case of a refusal by a certifying officer, by another certifying officer;

and"."

Mr. Mitchell: This is a group of amendments to the clause which deals with appeals. The main change that the clause makes to the present law is to transfer appeals relating to PSV operators' licences from the Secretary of State to the transport tribunal. The amendments remove a right of appeal because a traffic commissioner has not reached a decision in a reasonable time. That was ill-defined and could have caused a tribunal much trouble.

The amendments also disapply anything relating to traffic regulation conditions, appeals on which go to the Secretary of State under clause 9. They also give the traffic commissioner the right to withdraw any stay of execution that he has granted pending an appeal, so that if one is withdrawn the operator affected can apply to the tribunal to have it granted.

Finally, the amendments tidy up the relationship between this clause and section 9 of the 1981 Act as to appeals against refusals to remove prohibitions on vehicles.

These are tidying-up amendments and do not represent any major change in policy.

Clause 33

EXTENSION OF SAFETY CONTROLS TO CERTAIN PASSENGER VEHICLES OTHER THAN PUBLIC SERVICE VEHICLES

Lords amendment: No. 65, in page 31, line 15, at end insert—

"as it applies to a public service vehicle".

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments:

No. 66, in page 31, line 16, at end insert—

"motor vehicle as it applies to a public service".

No. 67, in line 17, leave out from "the" to the end of line 22 and insert "omission of subsection (4)".

Mr. Ancram: The substantive effect of these amendments is to make the penalty for driving a passenger vehicle with more than eight passenger seats, which has had a prohibition placed on it, identical irrespective of whether or not it is a public service vehicle. The penalty level is level 5, and it will be for the courts to fix penalties in the light of all the circumstances of an offence.

"secured by the Board under section 4A of the 1962 Act (Board's power to secure the provision of bus services where a railway service has been temporarily interrupted or discontinued)."

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following Lords amendments:

No. 105, in page 54, line 40, leave out from "apply" to end of line 41.

No. 258, in page 102, line 38, leave out from beginning to "the" in line 40 and insert

"(i) in paragraph (a), sub-paragraph (iii) and".

No. 259, in page 103, line 36, leave out

"in the Executive's area of any bus substitution service"

and insert

"of any bus substitution service between places in the Executive's area or between such places and places outside that area but within the permitted distance for the purposes of section 10(1)(ii) of the 1968 Act as it applies to that Executive (that is to say, twenty-five miles from the nearest point on the boundary of that area).".

No. 260, in clause 105, page 104, line 41, at end insert—

"(4A) Where the proposed withdrawal of service relates to a service or part of a service which is subsidised by the Passenger Transport Executive for any passenger transport area under any agreement made with the Railways Board by virtue of section 104(3) of this Act, the Board shall not publish a notice with respect to the proposed withdrawal under subsection (1) above without the consent of the Executive to its publication.

(4B) If in any such case the Board publish such a notice before obtaining that consent, the notice shall be of no effect unless before the end of the period fixed by the notice for objecting to the revocation or variation of the relevant bus service condition either—

(a) the Executive have informed the Board in writing that they consent to the publication; or

(b) the Secretary of State, on an application made for the purpose by the Board (whether before or after the publication of the notice) and after offering the Executive what the Secretary of State considers a reasonable opportunity to make any representations, has directed that the notice shall have effect notwithstanding that the Executive have not consented to its publication.".

Amendment (a) to proposed Lords amendment No. 260, leave out lines 9 to 22.

No. 261, in page 104, line 42, after "Where" insert—

No. 262, in page 104, line 43, leave out "of service".

No. 263, in clause 106, page 105, line 22, leave out from beginning to "lodge" in line 25 and insert—

"Where, in the case of any withdrawal of service to which section 105(4A) or (5) of this Act applies, notice of the withdrawal has been published under subsection (1) of that section, the Executive concerned may, within the period specified in the notice for objecting to the withdrawal".

No. 264, in page 105, line 27, at end insert—

"The fact that the Executive concerned gave their consent to the publication of the notice shall not affect their right under this subsection to oppose the withdrawal of service."

No. 265, in page 105, line 30, at end insert—

"(8) References above in this section to a notice published under section 105(1) of this Act do not include a notice which under subsection (4B) of that section is of no effect."

No. 266, in clause 108, page 108, line 25, leave out

""or" (in the third place where it occurs)"

and insert

""and to the Bus Company"".

No. 372, in page 46, line 14, column 1, leave out "charges and licences".

No. 396, in page 151, line 11, column 3, leave out

""or" (in the third place where it occurs)"

and insert

""and to the Bus Company"".

Mr. Mitchell: These are technical amendments. Amendment No. 70 corrects a drafting imperfection and exempts from London local service licensing not only permanent bus substitution services provided by BR, which under the clause as drafted are already exempted, but also any temporary BR bus services provided in London. This brings them into line with temporary replacement services outside London.

Amendments Nos. 105 and 258 are minor drafting improvements. Amendments Nos. 266 and 396 correct a technical imperfection to retain for the Secretary of State the power that he has under existing legislation to give directions to BR, LRT or LRT subsidiaries in connection with a closure consent. Amendment No. 372 simply corrects the description of the transport tribunal.

Amendments Nos. 259 to 265 ensure that the PTEs have the power to support bus substitution services, as they have under existing legislation to support rail services, and that where PTEs do support bus substitution services, their role in the case of a proposal by the board to withdraw the service is exactly parallel to that which they now have in relation to proposals to withdraw PTE-supported rail services.

(b) facilitating or improving the operation of public passenger transport services, other than excepted services; in the area of that authority or (as the case may be) in the area comprising the areas of both or all those authorities.

(3) Subsection (2) above shall not apply in relation to expenditure appearing to the authority or authorities in question to be of a capital nature.

(4) This section applies to the following authorities—

(2) In subsection (1) above "voluntary organisation" means a body the activities of which are carried on otherwise than for profit, but does not include any public or local authority."

Amendment (a) to proposed Lords amendment No. 241, in line 3, leave out from 'Transport' to end of section and add

'shall make grants to any voluntary organisations that it thinks fit, in order to ensure the provision of adequate public transport facilities for disabled people with special needs.'".

No. 268, after clause 109, insert the following new clause—

The Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

—(1) There shall be established in accordance with this section a body to be known as the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

(2) The Committee shall consist of—

(a) a chairman appointed by the Secretary of State; and

(b) not less than ten, nor more than twenty, other members appointed by the Secretary of State after consultation with such bodies as appear to him to be representative of the interests of persons likely to be significantly concerned with matters within the competence of the Committee.

(3) The Secretary of State shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, secure that at all times at least half of the membership of the Committee consists of persons who are disabled.

(4) The Secretary of State may appoint one or more members of the Committee to be deputy chairman or (as the case may be) deputy chairmen of the Committee.

(5) It shall be the duty of the Committee to consider any matter, relating to the needs of disabled persons in connection with public passenger transport, which is referred to them by the Secretary of State or which they think it appropriate to consider without such a reference and to give such advice to the Secretary of State on any matter which they have considered as they think appropriate.

(6B) The Secretary of State shall consult the Committee before issuing any such guidance.")

(7) Schedule (the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee) to this Act shall have effect with respect to the Committee.".

No. 342, before Schedule 5, insert the following new Schedule—

"SCHEDULE

THE DISABLED PERSONS TRANSPORT ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Administration, etc.

1. The Secretary of State shall make arrangements for the Committee to be provided with such administrative support and office accommodation as he considers appropriate.

2. The Secretary of State shall provide the Committee with funds with which to pay to their members such travelling and other allowances, and to defray such other expenses in connection with their functions, as he may determine.

(6A) The Secretary of State shall from time to time issue guidance as to measures that may be taken with a view to—

(a) making access to vehicles used in the provision of public passenger transport services by road easier for disabled persons; and

(b) making such vehicles better adapted to the needs of disabled persons.

(6B) The Secretary of State shall consult the Committee before issuing any such guidance.".

No. 420, in the title, in line 7, after "concessions" insert—

"to make further provision with respect to the powers of London Regional Transport".

No. 421, in line 11, after "1965" insert—

"to establish a Disabled Person's Transport Advisory Committee".

Mr. Ridley: The Government have introduced a number of amendments and have accepted others designed to ensure that proper attention is paid to the needs of disabled people as users of public transport. It might be useful to the House if I deal with them briefly together, although of course I shall respond if anybody wishes to probe any of them further. One of the amendments may well give the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) an opportunity to do so.

As a whole, the amendments clarify the responsibilities of local authorities to provide new powers for the support of minibus services meeting the needs of elderly and disabled people, and for the provision of grants for vehicles, or modifications to vehicles, and give LRT a new power to support dial-a-ride services in London, establish a new disabled persons' advisory committee and place an obligation on me to issue guidance on the measures that can be taken to make vehicles more accessible to disabled people. Taken together, the amendments will lead to a real improvement in the way in which public transport meets the needs of disabled people.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I had hoped that the Secretary of State, in his new mood of reasonableness, would be happy to accept the amendment in our name. It would have made the matter simpler.

I had thought that the Secretary of State would not only accept that we need a committee to make recommendations, but make sure that it had some hope of seeing those recommendations adopted and brought into use. I had hoped that at long last the Secretary of State would accept that the amendments that we are proposing are constructive.

TRANSFER OF OPERATIONS OF THE BUS COMPANY TO THE PRIVATE SECTOR

Lords amendment: No. 81, in page 43, line 13, after "Company" insert

"or any subsidiary of theirs".

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments:

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

No. 82, in page 43, line 13, at end insert "or any such subsidiary".

No. 83, in page 43, line 17, leave out from "employment" to the end of line 18.

(ii) a member of such a person's family;".

No. 90, in page 49, line 9, after "loss" insert "reduction or limitation".

No. 91, in page 49, line 11 at end insert—

Amendment (a) to proposed Lords amendment No. 91, in line 3, leave out 'may' and insert 'must'.

Amendment (b) to proposed Lords amendment No. 91, in line 6, leave out from 'privilege' to end of line 8 and add

'and must include provision for the maintenance of pension rights of equal value to those existing prior to implementation of the disposal programme'.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): It is understandable that we have become a little confused, because of the rapid rate at which we are moving through the amendment paper. It might be as well if we slowed that pace and examined precisely what the other place has been doing in other major areas of concern.

Mr. Speaker's selection list has caused us some difficulty with respect to amendment No. 83, which is in this group of amendments. The Opposition are attempting to disagree with the Lords in the said amendment, but, because of the time factor, and because of the ludicrously tight guillotine, I do not intend to pursue our arguments on amendment No. 83, but will deal more specifically with our arguments on amendments (a) and (b) to proposed Lords amendment No. 91.

Our intentions are obvious. The pension provision for people in the National Bus Company is causing concern. There have been broadly two approaches to pension funds in privatisation plans—both maintaining some version of "no worsening" plans. In my industry, in British Telecom, privatisation meant that the entire pension fund was paid over en bloc. When the predecessor of the present Secretary of State decided to sell off Sealink, the staff remained in the British Rail pension scheme.

In the case of the NBC there will be no company left, because it is to be broken into smaller units, in line with the Government's competition theories. This means that there will be no large company with the resources to underwrite the current pension funds.

So long as the Government's predictions on inflation and investment returns are exactly correct, for the next 40 or more years, there will be no problem. The Government appear to want NBC staff to believe that this is possible. However, if in any one year there is a shortfall, pensions will have to be topped up from some other source. There are two possible sources. The new staff of NBC paying into the fund is one source. That will end when NBC closes, thus turning the National Bus pension fund and BEST into "closed" funds.

The other guarantee was a straight payment from NBC. That will also go. We heard recently that the Government intend using some insurance companies to assist them in this dilemma. At present, 15,000 former employees and 10,000 staff dependants receive funds from the NBC pension fund. In addition, NBC had 51,000 staff at the end of April 1983. All those people who have been paying into the pension funds believe that their pensions will be cut and that the provisions will no longer be forthcoming.

Mr. David Mitchell: Nonsense.

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman might say that that is nonsense, but he will have the opportunity later, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to assuage some of the fears of people in the industry. In spite of what he may say, he has not yet done that. If he had done so, perhaps we would not have had the strike by bus men, which is the only way in which they could demonstrate their rejection of his pension proposals.

The amendments which were tabled in the other place provide for a guarantee by the Secretary of State that at normal retirement date, employees of the NBC or its subsidiaries will receive pensions no less than those which they were entitled to receive on the day the NBC was privatised. Lord Belstead said that this was calling for a guarantee which the Government could not give. He said:

"It would be an open-ended commitment of taxpayers' money and in that respect it would go further than NBC does already." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 October 1985; Vol. 467, c. 347.]

I remind the Secretary of State of the two examples that I quoted. I remind him of the employees in British Telecom who were former civil servants, then former public servants, and who now work for a private company. Their pension provision, from Civil Service status to public service status to private status, has been maintained and guaranteed, so the principle has been established. The people who were employed by Sealink are still members of British Rail's pension fund, so there has been no worsening of their position.

What does the Secretary of State propose to do with the employees' pension provisions in British Airways when it is sold to private enterprise? I understand that the Secretary of State has given a nod and a wink to the idea that their pension provisions will be secured and they will be looked after. If so, why will only people in the transport industry — the bus men and bus women who have worked in the industry all their lives—see their pensions at risk? That is why we have tabled these amendments.

I understand that in the case of NBC the Government propose to hand over the entire assets of the BEST pension fund to the Standard Life Assurance Company, which proposes to reduce the benefits already earned.

Mr. David Mitchell: Nonsense.

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman may say that that is nonsense. We shall have to see on closer examination whether he can persuade us that that is the case. I remind him that sitting next to him is the Minister of State—the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker)—who has been quoted on a number of occasions on this matter. She claimed that staff pensions would not be worsened by the provisions of the Transport Bill 1985 and that it would be "wrong if it did". In 1985 that pledge has been broken. I do not know whether the hon. Lady can justify those claims, which were made when the position was put to her by not only the Labour Front Bench but by members of the transport industry.

These amendments on the pension fund issue are our last chance to put this matter right. Throughout the whole year of discussions on this wretched Bill there has been an acceptance of certain technical and drafting amendments. These amendments were "technical" and "drafting" to facilitate the lunacy of the Secretary of State. They were not in any sense a response to the sensible and orchestrated opposition to the Bill from almost every section of society. If the Secretary of State has any doubts about that, I can supply him with a Marplan poll concerning his proposals. He would get a big shock on seeing what people think about the ruination of co-ordination of transportation.

We are at the eleventh hour—it is almost midnight for the Bill. If we do not get any movement on the question of pension schemes for NBC staff, this will be to the immense electoral disadvantage of the Secretary of State and his party at the general election. I spent the summer travelling around the country talking to people employed in the transport industry. I talked to bus men and bus women in their garages and on their buses. I had big meetings in Dover and in Chippenham. I had meetings in the south of England, in the good underbelly of Tory Britain. The bus men were worried.

Mr. Ridley: What did the hon. Gentleman tell them?

Mr. Stott: I told them that their trustees did not accept the Government's scheme. The trustees of the NBC's pension scheme have rejected the Government's proposal.

Mr. Ridley: They do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. Stott: The Secretary of State says that they do not know what they are talking about. The right hon. Gentleman has the habit of leading with his chin. I hope that Hansard has got that intervention for posterity and that it is there for all to see. Sometimes I despair when I am trying to plead with the Secretary of State for common sense to prevail. We are asking for acceptance of amendments (a) and (b) to Lords amendment No. 91 which we believe are in the spirit of what the hon. Member for Wallasey meant when she said that it would be wrong if there was a worsening of the position.

In Committee I said that people employed by the NBC had arrived at a point where their pensions were secure. Their pension entitlements have been negotiated by the trade union with their employer. It is not the employer or the trade union, but the Government who are moving the goal posts. The Government are changing the scene. It is not the fault of the NBC or the TGWU, but the fault of the Secretary of State. He has moved the goal posts and muddied the waters. If he has changed the ball game, he should accept responsibility to ensure that the pension rights are maintained.

Mr. Stephen Ross: I wish to support amendments (a) and (b) to Lords amendment No. 91. Even at this late hour, I hope that we will have an explanation from the Government of whether the points just made from the Opposition Front Bench are right. I have read the debates in the other place. Unfortunately, by four votes the final effort to pass something similar to the amendments was lost.

Lord Shepherd is a former chairman of the NBC and was no doubt briefed by the company. In the other place he said:

"at the present moment the advisers to the trustees take the view that what the Government are proposing does not rank in any way equivalent to what the members themselves have subscribed for and would have expected to receive on the dissolution of the National Bus Company".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 October 1985; Vol. 467, c. 350.]

Is that right?

I am briefed by the manager of Southern Vectis, who, incidently, is a supporter of privatisation and is not completely opposed to the Bill. In a letter to me he said:

"In the case of NBPF,"— that is, the National Bus pension fund—

"ten major insurance companies have been approached by the Department of Transport but none would agree to carry on the existing basis of linking pensions to individual salary increases, and we in the Group feel that this is essential if existing pension rights are to be preserved.

In all other cases where nationalised companies have been privatised guarantees have been given by the Government to secure the pensions of current employees and existing pensioners."

I believe that we received that assurance in the other place, but I hope that it will be confirmed.

The letter from the manager of Southern Vectis continues:

"I note from Lord Shepherd's speech on 14 October that Mrs. Lynda Chalker has said that it would be quite immoral for the government in any way to take such action as would reduce the benefits of a scheme.

The present proposals of the Government simply do not go far enough as they do not rank in any way equivalent to what we ourselves have subscribed for and would have expected to receive on the dissolution of National Bus Company. What we are asking is that the government gives guarantees that are equivalent to guarantees at present given by the Trustees of the pension funds of the National Bus Company."

As I understand it, that is what the amendments seek.

I have had experience of what happens when companies are privatised. I am still suffering from the privatisation of Sealink. The latest problem is that pensioners' travel cards issued by British Rail are not being honoured by Sealink, although its competitors are allowing pensioners to travel free. Pensioners from the Isle of Wight have to pay to travel on Sealink although they can travel free on trains at either end of the boat journey. The manager of Sealink has taken a retrograde step about which I have complained bitterly.

That is the sort of thing that has happened, and that will no doubt happen again when the National Bus Company is broken up into smaller companies. The employees of the smaller companies should have priority to enable them to buy shares and take over the companies themselves. That was done with the National Freight Corporation. If it is not done with the National Bus Company, it will be disastrous. Some people want to get their hands on bus companies, not to provide a service to the public, but merely to make a profit. The managers and employees of the bus companies are entitled to a guarantee from the Government that their pensions are safe. We have not yet had that guarantee.

7.15 pm

Mr. Parris: At the end of the day, NBC employees will receive a fair deal, but the Government seem to have tied themselves into a Jesuitical knot so that they may give them that deal. As I understand it, for ideological reasons, the Government are unwilling themselves to offer an open-ended, "no worsening", guarantee to a private company. The Government are convinced that there will be no worsening. They want to arrange for the trustees of the pension fund to insure against there being any worsening. The premium for that insurance will have to be paid by the Government.

If insurance proves necessary, apparently it is to come out of the employers' contribution. If so, to the extent that that costs the employers money and commits them to future costs, it will reduce the price for which the National Bus Company can be sold, because it must be sold with the commitment to pay out of the employers' contribution a premium for an insurance scheme against any worsening of the pension scheme. In the end, through its reduced receipts on the sale of NBC, the Government will pay for an insurance policy to provide a guarantee which they themselves are unwilling, partly for ideological reasons, to provide.

If the Government are convinced that there will be no worsening and that the pension scheme is not threatened in any way, it would be cheaper for them to provide the guarantee themselves than to pay a private insurance company to provide it. They will be paying not only for the guarantee but for the BMWs owned by the directors of the insurance companies. All insurance is irrational, except insurance based on the belief that the insurers have incorrectly assessed the risks that are being insured against. If they succeed in persuading the NBC trustees to seek a guarantee privately, the Government will have tied themselves, as I said, into a Jesuitical knot.

Nor am I sure that the trustees will be right in purchasing the premium. Better use of the trustees' funds might be to put them straight into the pension scheme. If the trustees are convinced that the funds are not under threat, it is not right to use them to insure against a threat. It would be better for them to put the money towards the payment of pensions. At the end of it all I do not think that NBC employees have anything to worry about, so I shall support the Government.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): On most of the Bill, especially on the whole idea of privatisation, the Government have thrust upon us ideological views which we do not like, but we must accept that they have a majority.

The amendments suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) seek to prevent the Government using bus men and bus women and their pension funds as pawns of the Government's political will. There is great anger among bus men and bus women about this. The Government will correct me if I am wrong, but I have never known a national strike, as today's action has been, about pensions.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan has said, what can bus men and bus women do when no one will listen to them, their unions or their employers? The Government will not even listen to the employers, who have valiantly put the case for the preservation of existing pension rights. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan has pointed out that it is not the bus men and bus women, the NBC or even the trustees of the pension funds, but the advisers to the trustees — actuaries and accountants versed for a lifetime in pension matters — who have stated categorically that the Government's proposals are worse than the existing scheme.

It is no answer for the Secretary of State to say, as he did, that those advisers do not know what they are talking about. I see the Under-Secretary of State nodding, but I am sure that all Members in the parliamentary pension fund would listen if I, as a trustee, told them what our advisers were saying, as opposed to what the Government's advisers were saying. The NBC and its employees feel exactly the same about what their advisers say.

The amendment merely seeks to ensure that bus men and bus women—drivers, conductors, inspectors, garage staff, the tens of thousands of people in the industry — should receive no worse treatment than the Government have provided when other industries have been privatised. There is no political polemic in this. We are simply fighting for present pension funds and levels of benefit to be preserved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan referred only to the NBC, perhaps due to lack of time. I wish to refer briefly to the PTEs and municipal companies. Their worry is expressed as follows:

> "The current Transport Bill makes provisions for PTEs and municipal transport undertakings to be set up as PLCS which will be deemed to be admissible bodies for inclusion in the Local Government Superannuation Fund. However, as the deeming option is not mandatory and is merely permissive there can be no guarantees that employees being transferred into their new companies will maintain future pension rights."

As a Member sponsored by the Transport and General Workers Union, I realise that that case bears no comparison with that of the NBC employees, who are really done down by this option. I do not suppose that the Secretary of State will take any notice of the words of Lord Shepherd, a former chairman of the National Bus Company, who has stated without any hesitation that the attempted Standard Life scheme based on a guarantee of RPI plus 1·5 per cent. bears no comparison with the skilful management of the existing scheme, which is based on current wage levels.

If the Government cannot accept our amendments on this last day of term—I appreciate the difficulty in that respect—I plead with them to bring in legislation in the next Session to achieve justice and equity for people who have paid into pension schemes, many of them in private companies even before the NBC was set up, but whose pensions are now in jeopardy because the Government will give no guarantee that their position will not worsen as a result of the Bill.

The Conservatives know that they deal with pensions at their peril. When the Chancellor made noises and flew kites last year about attacks on pension schemes, all of us, and especially Conservative Members, were inundated with letters from people who feared that their pensions might be affected. When the present Secretary of State for Social Services says that he intends to review the state earnings-related pension scheme, the reaction from the country is enormous. The bus men and bus women of this country know that the Government may be tampering with their pension scheme. I must tell the Government that they do that at their peril.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I support the amendments because they seek to do what we have sought to do throughout the proceedings on the Bill—to secure a fair deal for people working in the bus industry.

The action taken by people in this industry today shows their clear belief that even at this late stage the Government have not provided the guarantee of fairness to which those employees are entitled. Last night's Lancashire Evening Telegraph quotes Mr. Marshall, general manager of the Burnley and Pendle area, on the subject of the strike. Like most of the employees, whether in management or on the buses, he is cynical about the Government's actions. He is reported as saying:

"I believe the whole protest is futile"

and

"The Government will simply not commit the new bus companies to expensive pension schemes."

The article continues:

"Mr. Marshall added that all pension payments made to the date of the introduction of the new bus companies next year would be fully safeguarded."

We are concerned not just about existing pensions, but about the future pension rights of people in the industry. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) said that the provision that we seek would reduce the selling price of the industry, but why should people working in the industry suffer so that the Government can obtain the maximum price? That is wrong and entirely unacceptable to Labour Members. Those employees should have the guarantees that we have sought for so long.

When the Bill is passed, the bus companies will have to go out to tender and they will face competition from people who do not have to comply with any conditions of employment or service. They will have to face competitors who do not provide adequate pensions, sick pay and all the other benefits to which workers are entitled. It stands to reason, therefore, that the NCB, the PTEs and the municipal undertakings will not be able to win tenders and to remain in business if they do not compete on equal terms. Indeed, the NBC has already withdrawn from the National Joint Council for the Omnibus Industry because it knows that it will have to worsen the conditions of its employees.

7.30 pm

Pensions are important, and more and more people are taking this issue extremely seriously. We know that if the state earnings-related pension scheme is abolished or phased out, the two categories hardest hit will be women and manual workers. People in the bus industry will lose in two ways. They will not have the benefit of a backup from SERPS and a guaranteed minimum pension, and they will also lose their existing scheme. We must take notice of what the trustees and advisers have said, and we must recognise that the trustees have a statutory duty to ensure that the maximum benefit is preserved for the people whom they represent—the employees, those who are already on pension and those who will be on pension in the future.

The amendment is reasonable and fair. Even at this late stage the Government should wake up and accept it. In Committee, a number of hon. Members expressed sympathy, and made all the right sounds, but when it came to the vote they supported the Government. I fear that they will do the same today. I shall be surprised if the Secretary of State for Transport says that he is prepared to accept the amendment, however fair and justified it may be. He is not a reasonable man, and I cannot believe that he will accept the amendment.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): I echo the remarks of my hon. Friends when I say that these are unique circumstances. The House, as I understand it, will for the first time be effectively passing legislation which will worsen people's pension prospects. However objectionable previous privatisations may have been, at least pension rights were secured.

My hon. Friends are correct to say that today's industrial action reflects the anger and incredulity which has built up over the last few months among many people in the bus industry. They were opposed to many aspects of the Bill and were staggered by the inanity of much of it. They were opposed to privatisation, but they nevertheless believed that it would be inconceivable for the Government not to leave their pensions "no worse off". Even in the past few days, while the Bill was in another place, it dawned on people that the Government are seriously and cynically not prepared to protect those pensions.

People in the bus industry have expressed anger and incredulity; they do not know what has hit them. They feel outraged that they have been robbed. They are being robbed of all they have contributed over many years—over a whole lifetime in the industry in many cases—by the Government's refusal to creat a "no worse off" position.

Those circumstances are not unique to pensions. I am not sure whether the Secretary of State and his colleagues sincerely believe the nonsense that they have talked about the protection of pensions, and other matters, throughout the Bill's long and sordid history. When the Secretary of State replies I shall ask myself whether he believes the nonsense—the Jesuitical nonsense as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) described it in a Jesuitical speech—that in some obscure way there is protection.

It is extraordinary, as my hon. Friends have said, that the trustees can say that there is no protection, and that the National Bus Company management, from the most senior to the most junior level up and down the country, and everyone involved can say that the assurances given are meaningless and do not create a "no worse off" position.

The Secretary of State has the arrogance to say that the experts do not know what they are talking about and that the whole world does not know what it is talking about. That statement is made by a man who has been in and out of the courts in the past few months and who has been found to have acted illegally on one occasion after another in his job as Secretary of State for Transport. It is extraordinary that someone who has had such a career in the courts with so many judgments against him has the audacity to come here tonight and say that the pension fund trustees do not know what they are talking about when they advise National Bus Company employees.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) said, this matter involves not just the NBC. I have an interest in the matter. I am glad that when I came here, I opted to transfer my service as a previous PTE employee in the local government superannuation scheme into the House pension fund. If I had not done that and had retained my service, I should be worried about what would happen.

[Mr. Bob Clay]

A clause which states merely that something "may be" held in a local government superannuation fund is nothing like the same as a clause which says that it "must be" held.

The Secretary of State must be aware that local managers in various parts of the country, not just in the NBC but in PTEs and municipalities, are already saying informally and, in some cases, formally, to their trade unions, "You know that we shall be unable to maintain the value of pensions. We are not certain that the future company will stay in the local government superannuation scheme. It will depend upon the competition. If we are competing with people who do not provide that kind of pension, how do you expect us to provide it?" That gives the lie to the assurances that are being given by the Government. They must be aware of that, and of the fact that those things are being said.

The Government must also be aware that all the nonsense that was talked about the Bill creating employment has already been given the lie because Northern General Transport, even before the Act has received the Royal Assent, has formally told its trade unions that it will dismiss 25 per cent. of its staff. That is a most extraordinary example of how all the nonsense that was discussed in Committee and on Report is contradicted by what is already taking place.

I recall the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) making a long and detailed speech on Report in which he took apart every detail of the misleading impressions being given by the Under-Secretary and others. He quoted chapter and verse. He said that many of the things that the Minister claimed that he had said or written were untrue. The hon. Member said that the only way he could conclude that what was happening was not fraud was to assume that it was gross incompetence. That came from a Conservative Member. He was listened to by two or three other Conservative Members, two of whom voted with the Opposition, as did the hon. Member for Wellingborough. However, when the Bell rang, the Lobby fodder came flooding through to defeat the Opposition amendments. No doubt the same will happen tonight.

Bus men, bus women and many other workers will notice the House's final disgusting hypocrisy. It has its own pension scheme, which must be one of the best available to anyone anywhere. In July 1983, the House improved that pension scheme but it is apparently not going to find itself able tonight to prevent the Government from robbing NBC, PTE and municipal employees of their pension rights.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): We do not need a nasty turn of mind to consider what the Secretary of State has in store for the transport workers. Wherever he goes there is despondency, unhappiness and misery. The workers tremble whenever the Prime Minister suggests a new office for him. There is heartache in the country because the people know his state of mind. We do not need a nasty approach because there is the record.

It is the Secretary of State's Bill. He listens to no one. All the advice that has been made available to him has been swept aside. He has arbitrarily deprived transport industry workers of their pension expectations and rights. He has a responsibility to tell the House what is inhibiting him from acting reasonably. What is stopping him from applying a provision for the maintenance of pension rights for transport workers in the same way as it has been accorded to other people who have gone into the private sector? What actuarial basis is there for his resistace to what is reasonable?

How many Conservative Members will go to their constituencies this weekend—there is plenty of time, as we prorogue tomorrow — and address the transport undertakings that will be privatised? Will they say to them, "We fought for your pension rights," or "We spoke in Standing Committee," or "We spoke in the House of Commons"? Will they say that they put the case sympathetically on their behalf? But they will omit to say that they went into the wrong Lobby.

What is the position of the Conservative party—the caring party, as they like to tell the nation, but the uncaring party, as the nation has learned? Having taken that arbitrary action, is not the Secretary of State conscience-striken that he has not taken the opportunity that was there for other people transferred from the public sector to private enterprise? The opportunity to do what is right for transport workers is there, but for some reason he is not taking it.

The House is entitled to know the position. Either there are some strong arguments that we have not yet heard that support his view or there is a doctrinal, rigid or dogmatic approach, in which the Secretary of State has shown no sensitivity. We have reasonable men and women working in the transport industry and some of the highest standards of transportation in the public sector. I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the havoc that will come from privatisation.

There is an employment problem for the workers in the transport industry, apart from their pension problem. All at once the Conservative Government have decided that there must be a state of unsettlement in the transport industry and a state of denial for the workers. Is some spite or prejudice being exercised here? Although I do not agree with the principle of privatisation, why is the favourable, sustainable, and reasonable treatment for one section of the public service that has been transferred to the private sector not applied to another? Why are the Government behaving differently towards so many thousands of people who provide an excellent public service for their community?

Let me put in a caveat. Privatisation has caused problems on our roads. There is an inquiry going on, so I cannot comment on it, but we must bear in mind the consequences of the transport measures we have had in the past two or three years. We not only have congestion on the roads but the Government's expression of concern is constipated. The Government will not respond to reasonable submissions in Standing Committee and elsewhere, to get the best out of the Government's overall principle, that come hell or high water they will privatise. The Minister could get his own way on privatisation, but he must respond to the consequences, and if he believes that some people will suffer when he does not intend them to suffer, let him say so.

Will the Secretary of State tell the House those things now, because Conservative Members have to go to their constituencies? I hope that all the transport workers will nobble them. Two years after the vote, they might have got over it. Conservative Members are entitled to learn from the Secretary of State what is the case for not giving the transport workers their pension rights, no more or less than before. We are not asking for any hand-outs. We are asking for nothing other than what has been actuarially decided upon — a valuable pension scheme, to be sustained when the Secretary of State hit transport workers out of the public sector into the private sector.

Will the Secretary of State spell out the reasons why he cannot allow us to have this reasonable amendment? Are there any practical difficulties, or has he decided, meaning that that is the end of the matter?

7.45 pm

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): I shall be extremely brief, because the arguments on both sides have been more than adequately rehearsed and because I am sure many hon. Members will be keen to get off to their supper.

I appreciate the points made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his correspondence to me on this subject. Despite that, rightly or wrongly, much concern has been expressed in my constituency over the pensions issue. Bus men from depots in Langley Mill and Alfreton have taken a great deal of trouble courteously to explain and put their fears to him. I accept, although there are strong arguments on both sides, that their concern is genuine and not politically motivated. I feel that my right hon. Friend should have given the same guarantees to National Bus workers as were given to workers after previous denationalisations. Therefore, I shall not support the Government in this case, although I must say that the specious arguments of Opposition Members nearly made me change my mind.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): It is absolutely astounding that some hon. Members should give their supper a higher priority than workers' pension rights. However, I am grateful for the fact that the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) has decided that he cannot support the Government on this issue.

The points against the Government have all been made by my hon. Friends. It is scandalous for any Secretary of State to treat any group of workers in this fashion, particularly considering that many thousands of transport workers have given a lifetime of loyal service to the public transport industry. It is scandalous that they will not even be allowed to retire with the guarantee of a decent pension. In some areas, with certain provisions, they might have the pension rights that we are seeking to guarantee, but that will be left to local variants, and in many cases they might not have proper pension rights.

I should like to re-emphasise the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) in respect of PTE employees. I welcome the fact that the PLCs that will be set up will be deemed to be admissible for inclusion into the local government superannuation scheme. However, the failure to make that mandatory is unjust and heartless to the extreme. If it is worth while to include the provision in the Bill, why not make it mandatory? I appeal to the Secretary of State, even at this late hour, to make it mandatory. If he cannot do it tonight, will he take steps to do it as soon as possible? If not, why not? How can he justify such a cruel decision? Can he not change his mind at the last minute and make the provision mandatory?

Mr. Ridley: I want to make it clear that I thoroughly share the views of all hon. Members that this is a very important matter, which has been rightly discussed at every stage during the Bill's progress both in the House and in another place. I want to try once more to persuade Opposition Members that they have not entirely grasped what is going on and that they are wrong in many of their allegations.

The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) and the hon. Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) referred to local government pensions. It is clear that they do not understand that any accrued rights of bus men employed in local government are safeguarded. Accrued rights for past service will remain in the local government scheme up to the time of seperation.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) was wrong when he said that he had been wise to move his pension into the House of Commons scheme. It would have been equally safe in the local government scheme. We are discussing future arrangements for local government pensions, not accrued rights. That is an illustration of how some hon. Members have not grasped the point.

Future benefits in the National Bus Company are a different issue. The debate has been about accrued rights in the NBC scheme.

> "It is not our policy to affect any existing pension rights—that is, pension entitlements that employees have already earned and paid for through their contributions. The Bill contains nothing that would have that effect, and it would be wrong if it did." — [Official Report, Standing Committee F, 18 March 1982; c. 345.]

Since many hon. Members have quoted my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I should tell the House that that is a quotation from her speech on the 1982 Bill. I feel that I am justified in repeating it in this debate.

I shall take a little time to go through what has happened, because I am sure that hon. Members mean it when they say that they want to be reassured. Throughout I have stressed the importance of ensuring that the assets of the funds are adequate to meet their liabilities. It is the Government's clear undertaking to ensure that any deficiencies in the funds are eliminated at the time of privatisation following a fresh actuarial valuation on a prudent and reasonable basis. In Committee, many hon. Members and trustees did not think that that was sufficient assurance. They argued that something further should be done so that trustees would have more security to offer their members. Always helpful, I proposed that private sector insurance of the fund should be examined. I did that on Report, and not recently, as the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) alleged.

That insurance is not in some way purchased by the Government, as the hon. Member seemed to suggest. It is a way by which the trustees could seek to ensure that their funds are adequate for their responsibilities for many years to come. Throughout the summer recess my Department and the trustees of the NBC and their advisers pursued these matters with insurance companies. The result has been that private sector insurance is available to assure present funds at a price within their reach. In other words, it should be possible for the trustees to provide for members one or more of the household names in the insurance industry as security for the benefit that members have built up. That option is now available.

Nevertheless, the trustees faced further difficulties. They might want to purchase the insurance now, which would have the effect that the House wants, but how could they be sure that they could also cover by insurance the extra benefits that would accrue in the scheme over the next few years until privatisation is completed? Indeed, it might also be difficult to buy insurance straight away because some of the pension funds' assets, particularly property, might be difficult to realise and to turn quickly into cash to pay to the insurance company. Those difficulties were encountered during the summer.

However, the Government met the problem by making an offer to the trustees through the NBC and proposed that the company should make cash available to the trustees, in the form of a bridging loan, so that they could purchase insurance now if they wished, although they may not have sufficient liquid assets to do so.

We further proposed that the NBC should make available, through the employer's pension contributions, such further finance as may be necessary to ensure insurance cover over the next few years up to the end of the disposal programme. In this way, the trustees can now offer their members the certainty that has been asked for by hon. Members throughout our proceedings on the Bill. It is now available to the trustees to offer as they wish.

I take exception to the hon. Members who have alleged that accrued rights will be cut down, eroded or threatened. Worse still, Mr. Bill Morris of the Transport and General Workers Union was asked on Radio Four last week:

"But they won't lose the benefits that they've already accrued?"

He replied:

"Yes, in some instances there will be massive reductions of the pension benefits already earned by people employed in the National Bus Company."

That is not so, as I have demonstrated. It cannot be so. When the leader of the union says that there will be massive reductions in benefits, I do not find it surprising that great alarm, fear and despondency have been stirred up among bus men about their pensions.

Mr. Stott: I am listening closely to the Secretary of State. The kernel of the issue is whether the trustees, who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring that the NBC pension fund is adequate for the purposes for which it was set up, accept what the right hon. Gentleman says about the new plan that he has devised.

Mr. Ridley: I will answer that question, but I wish first to refer to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris). In a sense, he is right, in that the commitment to buy insurance will cost something, which will increase the financial exposure of the NBC and thus of the Government. However, I have always made it clear that the Government were prepared to ensure that sufficient money was made available to ensure the adequacy of the pension fund. This is the form in which such a pledge will be implemented if that is what the trustees decide to do.

My hon. Friend's argument is faulty, because if the Government gave a guarantee at the taxpayers' expense, that would save the insurance premium, but the saving would go not to the Government, but to the fund and, therefore, it would be an unequal transaction.

We think it right to propose that the benefits in one of the schemes, which are currently linked to average national earnings, should instead be linked to the rise in retail prices plus 1·5 per cent. and not just to the rise in the retail price index, as Mr. Morris and some Opposition Members seem to think.

I have had an analysis done of which has been better over the past 10 years—the earnings index or retail prices plus 1·5 per cent. In five of the years, one was better and in the other five years, the other was better. I believe that the difference is equivalent. It would make the insurance more cost effective and it would give the fund member the certainty of a fixed percentage over and above prices. The benefits to be obtained from the insurance option are at least equivalent, therefore, and in many circumstances could be said to be better. One of those circumstances would be if we ever had the disaster of an Alliance or a Labour Government. I am certain that we would all rather have 1·5 per cent. more than RPI, than earnings under them. There could be many times when it would be wiser to go for RPI plus 1·5 per cent.

The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) referred to the advisers to the pension fund trustees. I think that he was trying to make the point that the Department's suggestion on how to secure insurance might lay them open to legal challenge. I can only tell him that my legal advice is that that is not so. I do not know of advice other than that which they have received, but I can say that this basic choice exists for the trustees, because it is they who are responsible for these funds and for paying the pensions, the accrued rights. They can take some form of insurance option to give that extra security which many hon. Members have sought, my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) prominent among them.

Or the trustees will be able to say, "We are better fund managers and we can be sure that the funds that we have set up will be adequate to provide that security because we believe that we are cleverer than an insurance company." Then they will have taken the responsibility to themselves. The responsibility in this matter lies not with the Government but with the trustees of the pension funds.

This brings me to all the examples quoted by the hon. Gentleman on the Opposition Benches — British Telecom, British Airways, Sealink and many other firms that have been or will be privatised. In not one single case has a Government guarantee been given to the pension fund. It has always been recognised that the trustees are the people who are responsible. In no case has a Government guarantee be given nor will it be given in the future. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) is therefore quite wrong. These employees are receiving treatment which is identical to that given to the pension assets of every other group of privatised workers.

I could say that we have gone far further in relation to the bus men's pensions than with any other group of privatised workers because we have taken immense trouble to facilitate the provision of insurance, if they wish it, and to make sure that the funds will be adequate to buy that insurance, if that is what the trustees prefer.

An occupational pension is not a pension produced or guaranteed by Government, not even in the nationalised industries. Even if the National Bus Company were to remain in the public sector, the Government would not guarantee its pension funds. There is, therefore, a complete difference between what the Opposition are seeking, which is a Government guarantee of a private pension fund, and the reality of security, which is what the bus men actually want.

The measures that I have outlined give the option of that very full security. I should have thought it more likely that some of the great insurance companies of this country would still be solvent long after the country had gone bankrupt under a Labour Government. I would rather have a guarantee from the Standard Life company than from any conceivable Labour Government. If we are talking about security, that is where security comes. I will therefore ask Opposition Members to stop trying to frighten the bus men, to make them fear for their own pensions, in order to make these cheap political points against the Bill. I ask the House to reject their amendments.

Mr. Stott: Although this has been a very interesting debate, sadly we have made little progress in persuading the Secretary of State of the very genuine fears in the industry regarding pension provisions. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), to use his own phraseology—turned round on him by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay)—made a very Jesuitical speech. Those of us who have served on Standing Committees with him over the past few years are used to his making that kind of speech. He is a past master at walking on barbed wire. According to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill, (Mr. Craigen), he is the only person who could talk himself out of his own arguments. There was more than a grain of truth in what the hon. Gentleman said, and in his approach to this serious matter he demonstrated the way in which, in conscience, he ought to vote on this issue.

Not so his hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) who is taking the middle road out of all this. He believes neither the Secretary of State nor me, so he will not support either of us. He will sit on his hands. If he thinks that that is going to save him from ignominious defeat at the next election, I must tell him that it will not because there is a great deal of resentment among people in the transport industry.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): If the hon. Member is a sporting man, I will be quite happy to take a bet on his statement.

Mr. Stott: We will see about that. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I have as much concern, or more concern, with this matter and the other matters that we will debate before 10 o'clock, when I have to go to my supper.

The Secretary of State has outlined the way in which he has moved. I concede that he has moved on this matter. He has moved because he has been forced to do so, because we have highlighted the difficulties and the seething resentment about this matter in the transport industry. Yet the Secretary of State has still not got the message. I will put a forthright question: do the trustees of the National Bus Company's pension fund accept what he says and agree with him? They do not. They do not believe that what he proposes will be beneficial to the members of the pension fund.

The Secretary of State had the audacity to say that he had taken legal advice. This is the man who has been before the courts of this country, not once, not twice, but three times, on the legal advice of his officials, and been found guilty on every count of being irrational and irresponsible and of acting illegally. Even today, the High Court has overturned his own legal advice on an appeal against the GLC lorry ban. We cannot take seriously the Secretary of State's legal advice or the way in which he interprets these matters.

We have tried persuasion. We have tried argument. We have tried to put forward the views expressed to us by the thousands of people who will be affected by this legislation. The Secretary of State has taken no notice of the most important issue concerning them. I am left with no option but to invite my hon. Friends to come into the Lobby with me and vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Perhaps it would be helpful if I remind the House that we are now dealing with Lords amendment No. 81. I will ask the hon. Gentleman, when we get to amendment (a), which will be after the Lords amendment No. 90, to move the amendment formally for a Division.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 82 and 83 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 84, in page 44, line 38, after "under" insert "the preceding provisions of".

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 85, in page 44, line 38, at end insert—

"(12) The Secretary of State may by order dissolve any company which is a subsidiary of the Bus Company and incorporated by local Act or by an order under the Light Railways Act 1896.

(13) An order made under subsection (12) above may provide for the disposal of any remaining property, rights or liabilities of the company dissolved and may contain such supplementary, incidental and consequential provisions (including the repeal of any statutory provision) as appear to the Secretary of State to be necessary or expedient."

Mr. Mitchell: The amendment deals with some remnants of history. It provides the Secretary of State with an order-making power to disolve subsidiaries of the NCB that are statutory companies constituted under local Acts of Parliament or an order under the Light Railways Act 1896. There are three such NCB subsidiaries. All are dormant companies, and it is highly unlikely that any private purchaser would want to acquire them, particularly as at least one of them would have a duty to provide certain services. The preferred solution is therefore to dissolve them by order.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 85 agreed to.

Clause 49

THE BUS COMPANY'S POWERS OF DISPOSAL

Lords amendment: No. 86, in page 46, line 12, leave out from beginning to first "the" in line 13 and insert "any subsidiary of theirs".

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 87, in page 46, line 15, leave out "any of their subsidiaries" and insert "that subsidiary".

Mr. Mitchell: These are drafting amendments to simplify clause 49(3) which enables the NCB to set up an employee share scheme when it disposes of a subsidiary. The clause inadvertently provides for an employee share scheme to be established in one subsidiary as part of the sale of a different subsidiary. Therefore, the amendments are necessary to remove that anomaly.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 87, 88, 89 and 90 agreed to.

Clause 53

FINANCIAL PROVISIONS

Lords amendment: No. 91, page 49, line 11, at end insert—

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following Lords amendments: No. 94, in page 51, line 34, at end insert—

(bb) in subsection (5), as it applies to Scotland, for the word "designated" there shall be substituted the words "passenger transport",".

No. 96, in page 52, line 16, leave out from beginning to "and" in line 17.

No. 334, in page 133, line 9, after ("1") insert ("(a) to (d) and (f)").

No. 401, in page 152, line 10, after "paragraphs 1" insert "(a) to (d) and (f)"

Mr. Ridley: These amendments reinstate section 9(5) of the Transport Act 1968. That provision, which allows district councils to assist a PTE, and vice versa, was proposed to be repealed as it applies to Scotland because Scottish district councils no longer have transport functions. However, as a result of representations from the Strathclyde PTE, that under this power they enter into agreements with district councils for such matters as the cleaning and maintenance of bus shelters, it was decided to reinstate section 9(5) for Scotland, with a minor drafting change to alter the description of the area from "designated" to "passenger transport".

""social services functions" means functions which are social services functions for the purposes of the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970;

"social work functions" means functions which are social work functions for the purposes of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968;"

Mr. Ancram: I believe that these changes will be welcomed in all parts of the House. They place new duties on authorities to consult about their transport policies, to publish a statement of those policies and to liaise with one another to secure better co-ordination between social services, education and transport authorities on how best to meet all their transport requirements. When it left the House, the Bill contained certain consultation duties on county, regional and island councils, but not on PTAs, and co-operation duties on education and transport but not on social services authorities.

These amendments fill those gaps. They also ensure that county, regional and island councils which exercise all three functions must equally have regard to all their responsibilities when drawing up their transport policies. It was impressed upon my right hon. Friend in Standing Committee that a requirement on authorities to publish a statement of policies would usefully improve accountability to the electorate. These amendments do that while avoiding unnecessary burdens on authorities. The amendments also require PTAs, county, regional and island councils to consult each other where their policies may affect each other's areas. I am sure that this will be welcomed by authorities and passengers alike.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 98, in page 52, line 21, leave out subsections (1) to (4) and insert—

"(1) It shall be the duty of the Authority for any passenger transport area to formulate from time to time general policies with respect to the descriptions of public passenger transport services they consider it appropriate for the Executive for their area to secure for the purpose of meeting any public transport requirements within their area which in the view of the Authority would not be met apart from any action taken by the Executive for that purpose.

(2) The Authority shall seek and have regard to the advice of the Executive for their area in formulating their policies under subsection (1) of this section.

(3) It shall be the duty of the Executive for any passenger transport area to secure the provision of such public passenger transport services as they consider it appropriate to secure for meeting any public transport requirements within their area in accordance with policies formulated by the Authority for their area under subsection (1) of this section.

(4) The Executive shall have power to enter into an agreement providing for service subsidies for the purpose of securing the provision of any service under subsection (3) of this section; but their power to do so—

(a) shall be exercisable only where the service in question would not be provided without subsidy; and

(b) is subject to sections 83 to 86 of the Transport Act 1985 (tendering for local services, etc.)."

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following Lords amendments: No. 122, in clause 61, page 59, line 28, after "county" insert

No. 123, in page 59, line 38, after "area" insert

No. 124, in page 59, line 42, leave out subsection (3).

No. 127, in page 60, line 12, leave out subsections (5) and (6) and insert—

Mr. Ridley: These amendments have an important purpose. On Report in another place the Government were asked to remove any possible scope for misunderstanding about the roles of the PTA and the PTE which could conceivably arise from the drafting of the Bill. The amendments seek to state the roles of the authority and its executive more clearly. I hope that the House will welcome it if I describe briefly what those roles are.

The PTA will be responsible for assessing the transport requirements which exist within its area. It will also be responsible for formulating general policies about the descriptions of services which should be secured to meet those requirements. It will then be the responsibility of the executive, the PTE, to secure the services which, in its professional judgment, it believes to be appropriate to implement the policies of the authority. It will have the power to do so by entering into agreements for service subsidies, subject to the tendering provisions of the Bill, but this power is to be exercised in accordance with the authority's general policies. The amendments also make clear the responsibilities of non-metropolitan authorities. If any hon. Member would like me to do so, I can go into those at length.

Mr. Mitchell: These amendments are carefully designed to meet points which were made not only by hon. Members but in another place. Some concern was expressed about the Bill's requirement for PTEs to form a company for the purpose of carrying passengers by road within, to and from, but not completely outside, their areas. The Government initially had doubts about whether this phrase would prevent the initial company from maintaining services outside its area, which, for historical reasons, the PTE had assumed responsibility for and had confirmed that it would provide. We carefully considered the arguments that were put to us, particularly in relation to the services run by the Greater Manchester PTE in Glossop and agreed that there might be some doubt about the position.

These amendments were tabled to put an end to that doubt. They make it clear that the initial company should be formed to provide any of the services now carried out by the PTE, including any outside its area. They also make quite sure that the new company will have adequate scope to make alterations to the services which it provides, including the provision of related new services, by classifying a later clause to make it clear that the company may engage in any activities, including new ones, which can conveniently be carried on in association with the executive's existing activities. I am sure that hon. Members will be glad to have a constructive response from the Government to a genuine doubt which arose during the passage of the Bill.

New Clause

PROTECTION OF EMPLOYEE BENEFITS ON TRANSFER AND DIVISION OF BUS UNDERTAKINGS

Lords amendment No. 121, after clause 60, insert the following new Clause— Protection of employee benefits on transfer and divisions of bus undertakings—

"—(1) In this section, as it applies in relation to the Passenger Transport Executive or (as the case may be) in relation to the Passenger Transport Authority for any passenger transport area—

"the first transfer" means the transfer under section 58(7) of this Act to the initial company of property, rights and liabilities of the Executive for that area; and

"the second transfer" means the transfer under section 60(11) of this Act to companies formed under that section of property, rights and liabilities of the initial company; and "the first transfer date" and the "the second transfer date" mean respectively the date on which the first transfer and the date on which the second transfer takes effect.

(2) The Passenger Transport Executive for any passenger transport area shall have power to make, in such manner as they think fit, such provision as appears to them to be appropriate in connection with either the first or the second transfer for the maintenance to any extent of any concession, benefit or privilege of a description enjoyed immediately before the first transfer date by—

(a) persons who then were or had been employed in such part of the Executive's undertaking, or of the undertaking of any wholly-owned subsidiary of the Executive, as was transferred on that date to the initial company; or

(b) members of the families of any such persons.

(3) Subject to subsection (4) below, the Passenger Transport Authority for any passenger transport area shall have power to make, in such manner as they think fit, such provision as appears to them to be appropriate in connection with the second transfer for the maintenance to any extent of any concession, benefit or privilege of a description enjoyed immediately before the second transfer date by—

(a) persons who then were or had been employed in any undertaking or part of an undertaking transferred on that date to a company formed under section 60 of this Act; or

(b) members of the families of any such persons.

(4) Subsection (3) above shall apply to any concession, benefit or privilege of a description to which subsection (2) above applies.

(5) Where provision for the maintenance of a concession, benefit or privilege of any description may be made under subsection (2) or (3) above provision may instead be made, in any cases or classes of case to which that subsection applies, for the making of any payment or the provision of any other concession, benefit or privilege in compensation for he loss or (as the case may be) for any reduction or limitation of concessions, benefits or privileges of that description."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Stott: I beg to move amendment (a) to the proposed Lords amendment, in line 18, leave out from 'as' to 'enjoyed' in line 21 and insert—

'will guarantee, in connection with the first or second transfer, the maintenance of all concessions, benefits, privileges and pensions.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss amendment (b) to the proposed Lords amendment, in line 30, leave out from 'as' to 'before' in line 33 and insert—

'will guarantee, in connection with the second transfer, the maintenance of all concessions, benefits, privileges, and pensions enjoyed'.

Mr. Stott: It is important to examine exactly what their Lordships have done in amendment No. 121. The Government's response by the noble Lord Trefgarne to the amendments moved by Lord Banks appear to be reasonable, but on close examination a number of inadequacies are revealed. We can narrow them down to four. Let us first examine the financial liability. Any service by an employee within a superannuation scheme up to the date of transfer to the company is protected. It leaves aside the question of how the pension increases are to be funded in the absence of any central Government funding. There are two options. The first is for the company. If an employee is transferred to a company, the cost of funding pension increases from previous service could be borne by the company as a transferred liability from the executive. That would affect the company's ability to compete because the cost would be substantial.

[Mr. Stott]

The cost could be retained by the executive, but it would then become the first charge on the revenue grant from the authority as that would be the only source of income. That would adversely affect the ability to subsidise services and grant concessionary fares unless the Secretary of State allowed an additional amount above the EFL for that purpose.

Even though the gratuity schemes are covered by the amendments, no reference is made to former employees who retired before their employing authority brought transferred employees within the scope of superannuation. In some instances, these schemes have been unfunded and payments have been made by the executive out of general income. There is protection for any such scheme under local powers, but some have their origins in acquired undertakings.

It is expected that this liability will continue to be borne by the executive, but in some cases there might be no legal obligations to do so. With the pressure on the precept which will be the only source of funding for the executive, there can be no guarantee. The suggestion is that there should be some protection for retired employees in receipt of gratuities.

Earlier, the Secretary of State referred to the employees' option. The Government intend to alter the local government superannuation regulations to allow company employees to be admitted to the scheme. That is the deemed option. The option is given to the company or local authority, not to the employee. If that option is not exercised by the employer, the employee's position could be adversely affected since the new scheme might not be as good as the local government superannuation scheme. Alternatively, the employers might not be prepared to admit the employees to the scheme on grounds of ill health or old age. In such circumstances, it could be impossible for the employee to protect himself by private arrangements. It is therefore important that the employee should have the right to opt.

God forbid that bankruptcy should occur, but one never knows. Bankruptcy is not covered. That might be acceptable in respect of new employees, but it could be grossly unfair to existing employees since it could affect previous service as well as service with a particular company. Employees with local authority sectors in transport undertakings work for organisations which cannot go bankrupt. Thus, they enjoy complete security. They organise their personal affairs accordingly. Their position is altered by the Bill and employees might now be unable to protect themselves adequately in the absence of a Government guarantee in respect of their superannuation rights.

A serious problem is revealed by our discussions on pensions and superannuation, not just for the National Bus Company and its employees but for the thousands of employees of the PTEs and municipal undertakings throughout the country.

I do not wish to press our amendments to a Division, but I hope that the Secretary of State will examine what I have said and perhaps devise a way of incorporating in legislation the spirit of what I have said.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has made a constructive, detailed and complicated speech which I shall try to answer as fully as I can. I shall be happy to supplement my reply with a letter, because some of his remarks were highly technical.

Before replying I shall say something about the Lords amendment which the Government recommend the House to accept. It was introduced by the Government to give power to PTEs and PTAs to provide for the continuance of staff benefits for employees of their bus companies who, as the result of deregulation or restructuring, might otherwise lose staff benefits—principally free or reduced price travel or, as the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) said, gratuities.

Alternatively, it provides for compensation to be paid if the benefits are not to be continued. The intention is simple and limited. This proposed power will be complementary to the scheme-making process, allowing the arrangements for fringe benefits to continue so far as is practicable and for the negotiation of adequate replacements in cash or in kind when they are not.

PTE employees are currently all members of the local government superannuation scheme. They will have a benefit accrued in that scheme representing their service up to the time of transfer to the public transport company. I stress, as I said when we debated the last amendment dealing with pensions, that whatever arrangements are made for the future, transferred staff will be entitled to keep their accrued benefit preserved in the local government superannuation scheme, where it is now.

The hon. Member for Wigan asked what would happen if a company went bust. If the employees had accrued benefits with the local government superannuation scheme, they would be preserved in the event of the company going bust, up to the time of transfer. It is impossible to imagine that a local government scheme would go bust. That is a remote possibility only. No statutory provision is needed for that; it already exists in the rules of the scheme. That preserved benefit will be increased in line with prices until the person concerned retires and receives it as a pension. Thereafter, the pension, too, will be increased in line with prices.

It is important that I should make it clear that staff can keep their accrued benefit in their existing pension schemes and that it is covered, in relation to increases in the cost of living, in the way that I described. I again take issue with Bill Morris, who seemed to imply that that was not so. Talking about the strike, he said:

"The strike is not a strike against the Government. It is an argument with the employers. The employers have it in their authority to guarantee our members continued membership of the local government superannuation scheme. We want to make that absolutely clear."

I do not want him to mislead bus men into thinking that in some way they are being taken out of the scheme for accrued rights. That is not the case, as I have said.

The hon. Member for Wigan asked about the cost of this to the local authority. The employees of PTEs and bus undertakings stay the same. Costs can be allocated by local decision to a PTE or a company. We have said that we will look at the GRE if costs shift between different types of authority. In any event, the pensioners are secure. Thus, thought is being given to that as part of ensuring that the local authority financial regime will accommodate what is being done.

As for the future, we shall not impose any pension arrangements on the public transport company. It would be strange if we did, because the whole point of setting up these companies is to ensure that they can be run as independent, free-standing concerns able to respond to local travellers' needs and local commercial circumstances. It is exactly on that sort of local managerial flexibility that the prosperity of the bus industry and its employees must depend.

Thus, we must leave the company free to negotiate pension arrangements with staff, just as it would negotiate any other term or condition of service — just as any other company is free to negotiate with its employees. We must not give the new companies an unfair disadvantage compared with their competitors. That point was made in the earlier pensions debate.

8.45 pm

I am in no doubt that the companies will be thoroughly responsible employers and do their best for their staff. The hon. Gentleman referred to ill health and old age. It is unlikely that any employer would set up a scheme which excluded his own staff. Most modern pension schemes have no health test, so it is good management practice which these companies should, as many companies do, seek to follow.

They will have the option to continue to participate in the local government superannuation scheme as far as transferred employees are concerned. We recognise that, and we shall make it possible by making the necessary changes to the relevant regulations. Thus, the PTE, with the agreement of the company, can arrange for continued membership of the LGSS for transferred employees. In other words, the Government are willing to make options available for local decision by the company and its parent.

The hon. Gentleman then asked why we could not allow individuals the choice of deciding whether or not to stay in the local government superannuation scheme. Individual choice would be inconsistent with the principles of the LGSS, and with most other occupational pension schemes, too. Apart from anything else, the decision has cost implications for the employer, and therefore for the financial success of the company as a whole.

The decision must ultimately be for management, but, as responsible employers, they would want to consult carefully the staff representatives. The hon. Gentleman will realise that in no occupational scheme is it an individual decision; it is a decision taken by the employer after discussions with his staff and maybe the trade unions.

I hope that those remarks are of help to the hon. Member for Wigan. I believe that he will agree that his amendment would not be appropriate. Accordingly, I hope that he will not press it.

Mr. Stephen Ross: I may have the position wrong because I am not an expert on pensions. If, under the local authority, the municipal bus services as they now exist are privatised and the new owner of the privatised bus company wishes to avail himself of the opportunity of remaining within the local government pension scheme, I gather that he can do so. In other words, it is entirely a matter for the proprietor.

However, if it is part of the National Bus Company, that situation will not apply because that company's pension scheme is to be would up and the accrued benefit will go to those employees who at the time of the winding up, are still in the employment of the National Bus Company or one of its subsidiaries. From then on they will be at risk if their new employer does not run a suitable pension scheme. Is that right or wrong?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman was not right in his second point. If a local government bus operation became a company, whether or not it had private capital in it, the company could opt to stay in the LGSS. The accrued rights up to the time of the transfer must stay in the local government scheme and be available.

With the National Bus Company there is no continuing pension fund, unless the trustees decide that they would like to do that. If the trustees were to decide not to take insurance but to continue to run the fund, they would be able to do that and to safeguard the assets which had accrued at the time of transfer. They would have to run it for perhaps another 50 years because people with service would still be drawing pensions from the fund in 50 years' time. That is from where the desire for greater security came.

The privatised subsidiaries or companies from the National Bus Company could decide either to stay with such an arrangement, if it were to come into existence, and leave their pension business with that fund, or to set up their own funds for future service.

Obviously, they cannot decide to set up their own funds for accrued rights, but they can for the future. There is an analogy between both instances: for future service the choice is with the future company; for past service the choice is with the LGSS for local government bus operations and with the National Bus Company pension funds for past service with the NBC. The earlier arguments concerned how best to guarantee and give security to the accrued rights of the National Bus Company fund.

Mr. Stephen Ross: that is a clear explanation, and it is valuable that it will be on record.

(b) where the authority or one of the authorities concerned in establishing the scheme are a Passenger Transport Authority for a passenger transport area in England and Wales,

No. 226, to insert the following new clause—Right of eligible service operators to participate in travel concession schemes—

" .—(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, where any operator or prospective operator of an eligible service which runs or will run between places within the limits covered by any scheme under section 87 of this Act applies to the authority or authorities responsible for administration of that scheme to be admitted to participate in it in respect of that service, the authority or authorities in question shall be obliged to admit that operator to participation in the scheme in respect of that service as from any standard admission date under the scheme not later than the one next following—

(a) the end of such period as may be prescribed beginning with the date of his application; or

(b) the date on which the service begins;

whichever last occurs.

(2) The Secretary of State may, on the application of the authority or authorities responsible for administration of any such scheme, exempt the authority or authorities in question from the obligation under subsection (1) above in relation to any service or description of services; and the Secretary of State may at any time withdraw or vary any exemption granted under this subsection.

(3) An exemption may not be granted under subsection (2) above on the application of a Passenger Transport Executive, or on the joint application of authorities who include such an Executive, unless the application is made with the consent of the Passenger Transport Authority for that Executive's area.

(4) Subject to any regulations under section 88(1)(d) of this Act, where it appears to the authority or authorities responsible for administration of any such scheme, in the case of any operator or prospective operator of an eligible service who applies to be admitted to participate in the scheme in respect of that service, that fares currently charged or proposed to be charged by that operator for relevant journeys on that service include a special amenity element, the authority or authorities in question shall not be required by subsection (1) above to admit that operator to participation in the scheme in respect of that service unless that operator agrees to appropriate modifications of the current reimbursement arrangements for eligible service operators participating in the scheme.

(5) Subject to any such regulations, where it appears to the authority or authorities responsible for administration of any such scheme, in the case of any operator of an eligible service participating in the scheme, that fares currently charged by that operator for relevant journeys on that service include a special amenity element, the authority or authorities in question may by notice of not less than such period as may be prescribed exclude that operator from participation in the scheme in respect of that service unless before the end of that period that operator agrees to appropriate modifications of the current reimbursement arrangements for eligible service operators participating in the scheme.

(6) For the purposes of subsections (4) and (5) above fares for relevant journeys are to be regarded as including a special amenity element if they are significantly high in relation to the general level of fares for comparable journeys in the principal area covered by the scheme (within the meaning of section 87 of this Act).

(7) References in those subsections to appropriate modifications of the reimbursement arrangements there mentioned are references to such modifications of those arrangements as the authority or authorities concerned consider appropriate for providing reimbursement in respect of travel concessions provided for relevant journeys on the service in question by reference to the general level of fares mentioned in subsection (6) above instead of by reference to the actual fares charged (or proposed to be charged) for those journeys.

(8) For the purposes of this section "relevant journeys" are journeys on which travel concessions are to be provided under the scheme in question.

(9) For the purposes of this section and section 89 of this Act, references to a prospective operator of an eligible service are references to a person who has registered a local service under section 6 of this Act but is not yet operating that service."

No. 227, to leave out clause 89 and insert the following new clause—

Compulsory participation in travel concession schemes

"89.—(1) Subject to subsection (8) below, where the arrangements currently adopted by the authority or authorities responsible for administration of a scheme under section 87 of this Act with respect to the terms on which operators of eligible services may withdraw from participation in the scheme require such an operator to give notice before withdrawing from the scheme in respect of any such service, any such operator shall be obliged to provide any travel concessions required by the scheme on journeys on any such service in respect of which he is participating in the scheme until he gives the required notice of withdrawal and the period of notice has expired.

(2) Subject to the following provisions of this section, the authority or authorities responsible for administration of any such scheme may at any time by notice in writing served on any operator or prospective operator of an eligible service (including an operator already participating in the scheme) impose on him an obligation to provide travel concessions in accordance with the scheme on journeys on any such service operated by that operator to which the notice applies.

A notice under this subsection is referred to below in this Part of this Act as a participation notice.

(3) The power under subsection (2) above to serve a participation notice shall not be exercisable in relation to any such scheme until after the date (or whichever last occurs of the respective dates) of first publication under section (Publicity requirements for schemes and reimbursement arrangements) of this Act of particulars of the scheme and of the current reimbursement arrangements for eligible service operators participating in the scheme as they are to apply on initial establishment of the scheme.

(4) An obligation imposed by a participation notice shall, subject to subsection (8) below and sections 90 and (Release from compulsory participation) of this Act, be effective in relation to any service to which the obligation applies as from the appropriate commencement date for that service until the end of such period beginning with that date as may be specified in the participation notice.

(5) Subject to subsection (9) below, for the purposes of subsection (4) above the appropriate commencement date for any service to which an obligation imposed by a participation notice applies is—

(a) the date immediately following the end of such period of notice as may be specified in the participation notice; or

(b) the date when the service begins;

whichever last occurs.

(6) Where it is proposed—

(a) to vary a scheme under section 87 of this Act; or

(b) to vary the current reimbursement arrangements for eligible service operators participating in any such scheme;

the authority or authorities responsible for administration of the scheme may, not less than such period before the variation is to take effect as may be prescribed, by notice served on any operator of any such service who is under an obligation under this section to provide travel concessions in accordance with the scheme, require him to indicate, within such period and in such manner as may be prescribed, whether or not he is willing to continue to participate in the scheme after the variation takes effect.

(7) Any notice under subsection (6) above shall give particulars of the proposed variation.

(8) Where in pursuance of subsection (6) above an operator indicates that he is not willing to continue to participate in the scheme after the variation takes effect, any obligation of that operator under this section to provide travel concessions in accordance with the scheme which was current at the date of the notice under that subsection and would still apart from this subsection be in force on the date when the variation takes effect shall cease on the latter date (without prejudice, however, to the service of a new participation notice).

(9) Where a notice is served on an operator under subsection (6) above the preceding provisions of this section shall apply, on and after the date when the variation in question takes effect, in relation to any obligation of that operator under subsection (2) above to provide travel concessions in accordance with the scheme in question which—

(a) was current at the date of the notice; and

(b) does not cease (by virtue of subsection (8) above or otherwise) before the date when that variation takes effect; as if the latter date were the appropriate commencement date for the purposes of subsection (4) above for each service to which the obligation applies.

(10) The exercise of the power to serve a participation notice under this section on any person—

(a) by a Passenger Transport Executive; or

(b) by authorities responsible for administration of a scheme under section 87 of this Act who include such an Executive;

shall require the consent of the Passenger Transport Authority for the Executive's area."

No. 228, to leave out clause 90 and insert the following new clause—

Further provisions with respect to participation notices.

(b) such particulars for the current reimbursement arrangements for eligible service operators participating in the scheme and of any variations of those arrangements;

as have been published under section (Publicity requirements for schemes and reimbursement arrangements) of this Act before the date of the notice.

(2) Subject to the following provisions of this section, a person on whom a participation notice has been served may apply to the Secretary of State for cancellation or variation of that notice on either or both of the following grounds, that is to say—

(a) that there are special reasons why his participation in the scheme in question in respect of the service or any of the services to which the notice applies would be inappropriate; and

(b) that any provision of the scheme or of any such arrangements as are mentioned in subsection (1)(b) above are inappropriate for application in relation to operators other than operators voluntarily participating in the scheme.

(3) Subject to subsection (4) below, an application under subsection (2) above may be made by notice in writing given to the Secretary of State before the end of the period of twenty-eight days beginning with the date of the participation notice.

(4) A person may not make such an application unless he has given notice in writing of his intention to do so to the authority or authorities by whom the participation notice was served—

(a) if a period allowed for that purpose is specified in the participation notice, before the end of that period; or

(b) in any other case, at any time before the date of the notice given to the Secretary of State under subsection (3) above.

(5) Where on any such application the Secretary of State finds the ground mentioned in subsection (2)(a) above established, he may cancel the participation notice or (as the case may require) vary it by excluding from it any service operated by the applicant in respect of which he considers the applicant's participation in the scheme would be inappropriate.

(6) Where on any such application the Secretary of State finds the ground mentioned in subsection (2)(b) above established, he shall cancel the participation notice unless he considers that a direction under subsection (7) below would meet the case.

(7) Where on any such application the Secretary of State does not cancel the participation notice, he may direct that the current arrangements for reimbursement of eligible service operators participating in the scheme shall apply in the case of the applicant or (as the case may require) in the case of any service operated by the applicant to which the participation notice applies with such modifications as may be specified in the direction.

(8) If the Secretary of State cancels a participation notice under subsection (6) above he shall give to the authority or authorities by whom the notice was served a notice in writing indicating in what respects the scheme or (as the case may be) the current reimbursement arrangements for eligible service operators participating in the scheme are inappropriate for application in relation to operators other than operators voluntarily participating in the scheme.

(9) Any obligation under section 89(2) of this Act which has come into effect before the determination of any application under this section with respect to the participation notice by which under obligation was imposed shall—

(a) cease to have effect, if the notice is cancelled; or

(b) have effect, if the notice is varied, subject to a corresponding variation;

on such date as may be specified by the Secretary of State in determining the application."

(2) Subject to the following provisions of this section, any such operator may at any time by notice in writing apply to the Secretary of State to be released from that obligation in respect of any such service on the ground that the authority or authorities responsible for administration of the scheme have failed to comply with their obligation under section 87(7) of this Act.

(3) An operator may not make such an application unless he has given notice in writing of his intention to do so to the authority or authorities responsible for administration of the scheme not less than twenty-eight days before the date of the application.

(4) A notice under subsection (2) or (3) above shall give particulars of any alleged failures of the authority or authorities in question to comply with their obligation under section 87(7) of which the operator complains.

(5) On any such application the Secretary of State may, if he finds the applicant's ground of complaint established, determine that the applicant's obligation under section 89(2) shall cease on such date as may be specified in the determination."

Mr. Ancram: When the Bill left the House, it contained eight clauses concerned with travel concessions. It now returns to us with 13 clauses, all of which contain amendments and all but three of which were only tabled in their present form in another place. I would like to explain to the House why the Government felt such radical action was necessary.

During the Bill's passage through the House the Government gave a commitment to introduce provisions for operators of local serv to be required to enter a concessionary fare scheme if they were unwilling to do so on a voluntary basis. This power complements the right that operators have to enter any concessionary fare scheme established on a voluntary basis and enjoy its benefits. At short notice, on the Report, the Government tabled new clauses to make the necessary provision for compulsory participation. The principles behind these clauses remain in the amendments that we are now considering, although it has been necessary to refine much of the detail.

I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not go into all the technical changes that have been made. These have been fully examined in another place. The advent of the compulsory participation provision, which was requested by this House, has required us to recast the form of many of the clauses as they originally appeared in the Bill.

However, more substantively, we recognise that in giving this power to local authorities we have to ensure that it is not used to the detriment of the operator. Following representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), an amendment was introduced to allow compensation to be awarded to an operator who can show that the terms under which he is reimbursed for his compulsory participation are inadequate, either when the initial compulsory participation is imposed or at any time during its course. There is also provision for the Secretary of State to release operators from compulsory participation at any time if the reimbursement is inadequate. There is provision for a time limit to be set on the duration of a single period of compulsory participation so that an authority has to take stock of its arrangements from time to time.

None of these amendments diminish the power of an authority to use its power to invoke compulsory participation—they merely ensure that it is done fairly. Before the amendments on compulsory participation were introduced, it was felt in some quarters that too much of an advantage rested with the operators. With these amendments, I feel that we have now reached an equilibrium between the interests of the operators and authorities.

A number of other amendments have been tabled to clarify the powers of local authorities and to ensure the effective provision of concessions. A concessionary fares scheme may now be limited to only part of an area so that an authority can use its powers to establish schemes for children, for example, selectively to top up whatever is commercially available. The definition of "children" has been more precisely formulated so that authorities have the power to provide concessions for school children at any time up to their 19th birthday.

The amendments meet the concern expressed by some authorities that they may find difficulty in running an effective scheme by providing that within limits they may control the times of entry to and exit from their scheme by operators. Steps have also been taken to meet the concern expressed by operators that the administration of a scheme might be left to one dominant operator in an area to the disadvantage of his competitors. The Secretary of State now has the power to make regulations to cover that.

Provision has been made also for concessions to be provided on the limited number of services that will continue to be operated directly by the PTE or local authorities following the formation of the new public transport companies.

Finally, I draw the attention of the House to two sets of amendments that are now incorporated within clause 87 that should allay fears that were expressed in another place about the adequacy of local authorities' powers to provide concessions. As it left the House, the Bill was designed to reproduce the powers which authorities already had under the Transport Act 1968 in relation to the services to be covered and the provision of concessions for pensioners, the blind, and those suffering from handicaps which severely impair their ability to walk. It also gave authorities the power to provide concessions for children. However, it became clear during debate and in the light of consultation with the authorities that there was a problem over rail services in the non-metropolitan counties.

The powers in the Bill as drafted reflected the situation in which the metropolitan counties had powers to provide concessions on rail services in their areas as a result of their general responsibilities for the support of those services under section 26 of the 1968 Act. However, there were no corresponding powers for authorities in the shire areas. It appears that a number of non-metropolitan authorities and their equivalent in Scotland are already providing support for rail services. Indeed, in some instances local rail services are at least as important to local transport facilities as the bus services that were covered by the powers under the 1968 Act.

It was therefore decided to remove the distinctions between metropolitan and other areas so that all authorities will have the power to provide concessions on all forms of public passenger transport services.

Mr. David Marshall rose——

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. The powers of the non-metropolitan authorities will be extended to cover local travel by rail and services such as ferries and social car schemes. I am sure that the House will agree that this is an improvement.

Mr. David Marshall: The Minister has anticipated what I was about to ask him. I rose to seek clarification on concessionary fares on the ferries in Strathclyde.

Mr. Ancram: It was for that reason that I finished the section with which I was dealing before giving way to the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that he appreciates that there have been areas in Scotland where ferries have been dealt with in the same way previously. The amendment will regularise the position throughout Scotland as well as the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Perhaps the Minister will be rather more explicit. In Coventry there are at least half a dozen routes which do not make a profit although they are well used by holders of concessionary tickets. What will happen, when the Bill is enacted, to ensure the continuance of service on these routes? The Minister has mentioned that operators who might be interested in tendering for such routes are already expressing doubts about their ability to handle the necessary administration of such schemes.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is bringing together two slightly different aspects of the legislation. In the areas where services currently require subsidy, the Bill provides that those routes should be put out to tender, if the local authority so wishes, to ensure that they are run in the most cost-effective way to the level required by the local authority.

On concessionary fares, authorities will be allowed to draw up their schemes, and it is for them to decide in what areas and to what extent such schemes should apply. That matter is now being regulated, especially by the restructuring part of the Bill that has come to us from another place.

I accept that there are some complexities in what I am setting out, but it is important to appreciate that, if we are to have a scheme that works fairly and properly—many of the ideas for the scheme have come from hon. Members on both sides of the House — we cannot produce something as simple as was originally envisaged.

I come now to another group of amendments from another place, which were tabled by Lord Carmichael of Kelvingrove, Lord Stallard and Baroness Stedman. I hope that the House will give the Government credit for accepting these amendments. Although they give my right hon. Friend a wide general power to add additional groups to those eligible to receive concessions under clause 87 by order, they reflect the debate in another place about specific problems that have arisen in relation to groups of people who are eligible to receive assistance with travelling expenses under the terms of the National Assistance Act 1948.

Those groups, including people such as the mentally handicapped and the deaf and dumb, are eligible to receive support from social services authorities. However, it has become clear that in some cases—Greater Manchester springs to mind—concessions are being provided not by the social services authority that has the statutory powers, but by the transport authority.

We have reached the conclusion that it would be appropriate to provide a machinery for removing the financial and administrative problems that would result if transport authorities did not have the power to provide concessions for people in those groups. It is in the light of those problems that we accepted the amendments, which I hope will be welcomed by the House.

My right hon. Friend, in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, will consider how best the order-making power can be used to extend the coverage of schemes to those in groups covered by the 1948 Act. It is obviously only right that any decision should be taken jointly by both my right hon. Friends, bearing in mind their common responsibilities and the continuing interest that social services authorities inevitably must have in that area. I must, however, emphasise to the House that, in accepting the amendments, the Government have in mind the problems in relation to the 1948 Act.

Although the amendments on concessionary fares are substantial in number, they continue, in a more refined form, the central policy to which this House has already agreed, and extend the coverage of concessionary fares in a manner which I hope the House will support.

I am sorry to have dealt with this matter at some length, but the provisions are new to the House. I hope that I have, at least in outline, explained the way in which the Government see them working.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): I wish to speak to the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) to Lords amendment No. 223.

The Minister did not have the benefit of a Scottish education — [Interruption.] Well, he did not have a Scottish primary or secondary education. At one stage I thought that he was in danger of getting his three Rs wrong because he spoke of radical action, refining much of the Bill and recasting many of its clauses. Frankly, we take the view that the Government, rather than extending the area of concessionary fares and the principles that underlie the system, have actually narrowed the application.

The Minister referred to Lord Carmichael of Kelvingrove. I have just seen a long letter that my hon. Friend wrote to Lord Belstead after the long passage of the Bill in the other place, expressing some misgivings about the way in which the Government sought to restrict some of the concessions which will operate in practice.

I noted what the Minister said about the National Assistance Act of 1948 to which Lord Carmichael also referred in his letter. I am not unmindful of the way in which the legislation applicable to Scotland operated in recent years under the Concessionary Travel for Handicapped Persons (Scotland) Act 1980. When discussing concessionary fares we must bear in mind that one of the largest restraints on the operation of concessionary fare schemes is the way in which the Government continue to cut the amount of aid to local authorities. That will be the biggest constraint on the ability of local authorities to provide and finance adequate concessionary schemes. No matter what is said, and no matter what legislation the Government say is there in a discretionary form, if the resources are not available to local authorities the schemes will become inoperable.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that in recent months when I have gone to see elderly people, on every occasion the inevitable question is, "What is going to be done about concessionary fares?" That is the fear uppermost in people's minds. It is a justifiable fear because, as my hon. Friend said, at the end of the day it depends on the amount of money available from the Government. It is remarkable that a Government who pay lip service to the elderly and the care of the elderly should, in effect, be putting the concessionary fares scheme in danger.

Mr. Craigen: My hon. Friend did not have the advantage that we had of serving hour after hour on the Transport Bill Standing Committee. Even if he had, he would still be unable to assuage the fears of his elderly constituents, because the Minister did not give the guarantees necessary to eliminate those genuine fears. We had a lot of soft soap from Ministers and, as the hours wore on, even some of the most dim-witted Government Backbenchers—there were one or two—began to realise that the concessionary scheme was not going to do all that the Minister claimed it would do.

The second main area in which we have to be wary about the Government's pronouncements is about the extent to which local authorities will be able to exercise discretion. Even where there is a will, we now have ratecapping, and the Government, by reducing the amount of transport subsidy, will have a second bite at local authorities, because, effectively, the Government can reduce what local authorities are able to do to sustain concessionary schemes.

In Scotland the average fare in the regions and islands works out at half fare and, in some instances, at a third fare. I am afraid that that will be squeezed even more because of the reduction in the transport subsidy forthcoming from central Government and because of the way in which the Department of the Environment, the Scottish Office and the Welsh Office will work the principles of rate capping.

The Minister referred to the arrangements for the blind, and I shall put on my spectacles for a minute. Bodies such as the Royal National Institute for the Blind and the National League of the Blind and Disabled are worried about the position of the partially sighted passengers as a group. Their numbers are not inconsiderable. In March 1982 there were about 58,000 registered partially sighted people in England. In March 1984 the figure was 3,271 in Scotland and 4,876 in Wales. In December 1983 there were 1,230 registered partially sighted people in Northern Ireland.

Will the Minister make it clear that these people will not be disadvantaged by the radical changes, recastings and refinements in the other place? Lord Carmichael of Kelvingrove went into the matter in some detail in his letter to Lord Belstead, but I shall not weary the House with the details. It is understandable that a person who spent a bit of time looking at the Bill during its passage through the other place took pen to paper and wrote three pages to the Minister. I hope that the Minister can assuage some of our genuine fears.

Mr. David Marshall: My hon. Friend is right to voice concerns about the future of concessionary fares. Does he agree that it is a matter of not only the lack of resources but the possible lack of services? Does he agree that many areas which have services used by people who benefit from concessionary fares are likely, because of the Bill's long-term effects, to have drastically reduced services or even no services? What use is a concessionary fare if there are no services to use it on?

Mr. Craigen: I can tell that my hon. Friend was not hauled up the Clyde in a barrel. Obviously, services need to be running before we can benefit from concessionary fares. Our colleagues and I have taken issue with the Government over the rest of their obnoxious legislation. We are well aware that the other clauses will seriously cripple the ability of operators in many parts of the country to run adequate services.

I have been trying to keep within the confines of order, so I have concentrated merely on dealing with concessionary fares. I hope that the House will in due course agree the amendments standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) because they seek not only to broaden the range of groups who should be eligible for concessionary fares but to avoid any confusion from a Government team that was clearly mystified by the whole process during the Bill's passage.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I shall speak in a positive tone, unlike the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) who showed a negative view. I should like my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to comment further on the partially sighted to whom the hon. Member for Maryhill rightly alluded. In another place on 24 October the Government accepted an amendment intended to help disabled passengers. I welcome that.

9.15 pm

I want to make a point which may be in danger of being overlooked. Surely our aim is to ensure that the partially sighted are not excluded from the categories for whom concessionary fares may be provided, if local authorities wish. The Government have agreed to include a power for the Secretary of State to specify "other classes of persons" as eligible for concessions in addition to those already listed in the Bill. In other words, we are going further than pensioners, children, full-time students under the age of 18, blind people and those with a seriously impaired ability to walk.

I understand that it is the Government's intention to make an order specifying the other categories who are to be eligible. Lord Belstead, the Minister in another place, referred to the mentally handicapped, the deaf, the dumb and other passengers. He said that the Government would consider how far it would be appropriate for transport authorities to provide concessions for disabled people other than those named in the Bill.

The point should be registered that partially sighted passengers often have the same mobility needs as blind people and should be among those for whom transport authorities may make provision. Partially sighted people may use buses to avoid a hazardous journey by foot involving busy road crossings. A partially sighted person's level of sight may be affected greatly by changing light conditions, such as darkness on a winter morning or shadowy light and dark. Partially sighted people are often found in low income groups and may have difficulty in finding work. Public transport is vital for them.

I am glad that the Government intend to improve the provisions for eligibility for concessionary fares and I am concerned to make sure that the partially sighted are included, numbering as they do a small category compared with the 130,000 registered blind in the United Kingdom. The Government have argued previously that groups outside those listed in the Bill can be covered if social services departments decide to use their powers under the National Assistance Act 1948. Reference has already been made to that. The Government's acceptance of the amendment in the other place is a welcome recognition that problems arise and that the powers of transport authorities should be widened.

Some authorities include wider categories. The Concessionary Travel for Handicapped Persons (Scotland) Act 1980 extends eligibility in Scotland without the legal complications that arise in the rest of Britain. For example, Tayside and Fife regional councils are among those who give concessionary fares to partially sighted passengers. Thus there is a strong case for that group to be included in categories that are specified as eligible under this legislation. If they are not included, they may be left worse off than they are now.

Mr. Allan Rogers: Opposition Members are disturbed because the Bill places more emphasis on giving fair treatment to operators than to those who are willing to use the transport services. That is demonstrated dramatically in the provisions for concessionary fares. Unfortunately, because of the time restriction, we have to rely on the arguments that were put forward previously.

This is a key issue that will affect many people. In Committee the Government refused to accept amendments which would have ensured a future for concessionary travel instead of the patchwork system which may result. The word "may" in the clause does not give sufficient security for the general provision of concessionary travel throughout the country.

It is hypocritical for any Member to suggest that the Conservatives are concerned about elderly or disabled people not being socially mobile unless there is a concessionary fares system, when the whole public transport system will be severely truncated as a result of the Bill. Conservative members have said in Committee and again today that they want to look after these groups of people but they know that the Secretary of State for the Environment will immediately start cutting the money available and that there is no provision in this or any other legislation to ensure that within the general targets laid down for local authorities or in the rate support grant settlements money can be made available specifically to support concessionary fares schemes.

This is a missed opportunity. The Bill should have provided an opportunity for the Government to go forwards rather than backwards and to show that they are caring and compassionate and want to provide a decent concessionary travel scheme throughout the country. The opportunity has been missed because they do not care. They probably never use public transport and do not appreciate the enormous difficulties that old people, disabled people and young people face, especially in rural areas. The Government have been found lacking in this respect and I hope that some Conservative Members will support the amendment.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): In Committee, Conservative Members were anxious to protect and, indeed, to improve the provisions for concessionary fares. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State delivered our hopes in full on Report and he seems, indeed, to have improved on that today.

I seek my right hon. Friend's clarification on one aspect — the protection of the legitimate budgeting of local authorities. Members will recall that in Committee I outlined a mechanism whereby a local authority could establish a fair and reasonable valuation of the concessionary pass and thus know at the beginning of the financial year its total commitment for that year. The administrative mechanism whereby that budget was shared among the operators was not in my view, or in that of local authority treasurers, an insurmountable problem.

I seek an assurance from the Government today that under the new provisions local authorities will still be able to establish a finite budget. If they cannot do so, the fear of an open-ended commitment may force some authorities to move reluctantly from a pass scheme to a token scheme when they do not wish to do so. If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State can give an assurance that finite budgets and therefore passes will still be possible, I believe that the last remaining fears of local authorities can be set aside

We have heard the customary noises from the Opposition and the main thrust of the argument made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) has been that even if the Bill achieves all these things, any failure to deliver a concessionary fares scheme will be the fault of wicked central Government failing to provide the resources. In fact, as anyone who has been involved in local government knows, it is not central Government who will determine whether the provision will be made. The rather perverse priorities of some authorities will be the key to whether old age pensioners are threatened. Local authorities which have their priorities right will always find the money for a scheme of the kind that has been set out today.

Mr. Parris: It is rich of Opposition Members to spend their weekends storming up and down the country telling elderly people that their concessionary fares scheme will be taken away, and then spend the weekdays reporting to the House that they have encountered much alarm among elderly people about the future of their pension schemes.

The Government have been able to allay two anxieties which existed in Derbyshire. We were worried about our ability to support concessionary fares schemes on the railways as well as the buses and my hon. Friend has confirmed that that will now be possible. Secondly, we were worried about provision for the mentally handicapped. We knew that we could make such provision through the social services but it would be more sensible to make it through the county council's transport department. My hon. Friend the Minister said that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be able to arrange for that by order. Those are two small but helpful alterations to the Bill and I welcome them.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friends for the appreciation that they have shown for the amendments which have been made. As I said earlier, I believe that the scheme we are putting forward now is an improvement. It is largely based on the suggestions made by hon. Members during the progress of the Bill. It is significant that in Committee and on Report Opposition Members argued about the details of the concessionary fares provisions within this legislation. Tonight they cannot do that. Only one Opposition Member spoke to the details of Opposition amendments. They could merely revert to singing the same old tune—that deregulation was not going to work, that there were going to be fewer buses and that local authorities would not be provided with enough money.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Be careful.

Mr. Ancram: We have heard all these words and songs over and over again during the passage of the Bill. I am reassured tonight that the provisions we are putting forward on concessionary fares are right, because Opposition Members were cautious not to criticise the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) who moved an amendment which contained four extra categories of fares but did not mention any of them. That shows the level of confidence the hon. Member has in his amendment, so we need not spend much time dealing with it.

A number of important points have been raised during what has been a useful debate. The first relates to the partially sighted. It was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) and by the hon. Member for Maryhill. The partially sighted are included among the group for whom assistance may be provided under the National Assistance Act 1948 and they are affected by the provisions I referred to earlier.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport now has powers under the amendments which have come from another place. Subsection (8)(f) of the new clause which is Lords amendment No. 223 allows him by order to specify other classes of person. I should like to tell my hon. Friend the Member for York that my right hon. Friend will wish to consider whether the partially sighted should be covered under a new order made by the order-making power.

It is important to state that in terms of a number of the categories mentioned tonight, that new order-making power is available, and serious consideration would have to be given to individual cases.

Mr. Craigen: Will the Minister guarantee that he will include that category?

Mr. Ancram: The purpose of having that power available is so that when categories are brought to my right hon. Friend's attention, he can consider them. The hon. Member for Maryhill referred to a letter from his noble Friend Lord Carmichael. Lord Carmichael asked us to accept his amendment and we did so. I believe that the points made by Lord Carmichael in that letter have been met by these provisions.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) suggested that the purpose of these amendments was to be fair to operators. I must say openly that we wish to ensure that we are fair to operators and also to authorities. During the debate there has been a tendency to swing from one to the other, but I believe that we now have the equilibrium right; it is for that reason that the provisions are welcomed by my hon. Friends.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) mentioned the ability of authorities to operate concessionary fare schemes without having to move to tokens. Depending upon the method of reimbursement that they adopt, authorities can be reasonably clear at the start of the financial year about the cash that they will have to pay over that year. To ensure that operators are properly reimbursed for journeys that they carry out, authorities may need to make adjustments after the end of the financial year. There cannot be precise, finite budgeting on such a matter, but I believe that within these provisions there is sufficient flexibility to allow past schemes to continue.

9.30 pm

Throughout the course of the legislation there has been debate about whether concessionary fare schemes would continue. Hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) have talked tonight of people's fears as to whether concessionary fares would continue. I do not suggest that it was necessarily him, but Opposition Members started to put about the scare story that the Bill meant the end of concessionary fares long before the provisions were discussed in Committee. That has caused a great deal of unnecessary distress and fear. We are debating a concessionary fare scheme which, I believe, will provide for the type of concessionary fares that we wish to see across the country. I hope that my hon. Friends will reject the amendments moved by the Opposition and will approve the amendments from another place.

Lords amendment No. 132 agreed to.

New Clause

Co-operation between certain councils and London Regional Transport

Lords amendment: No. 133, after clause 61 insert—

" .—(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, any non-metropolitan county or district council in England and Wales and London Regional Transport shall each have power to enter into any agreement or arrangements with the other undert which that council or (as the case may be) London Regional Transport underake to contribute towards any expenditure incurred by the other party to the agreement or arrangements in making payments to a person providing a public passenger transport service under any agreement entered into by that other party in exercise of any power that other party may have to secure the provision of that service.

(2) The agreement under which the payments are made must have been entered into in pursuance of the agreement or arrangements between the council in question and London Regional Transport.

(3) The power of London Regional Transport under section 3(2) of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 (contracting-out powers) to enter into and carry out agreements with any person for the provision by that person of any public passenger transport service, if exercised in pursuance of any agreement or arrangements entered into under this section, shall be limited to cases where the service in question would not be provided without subsidy and shall also be subject to sections 83 to 86 of this Act.

(4) Section 28 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 (agreements with respect to the provision by London Regional Transport of extra services and facilities financed by certain other authorities) shall cease to apply in relation to agreements with district councils, and accordingly—

(a) in subsection (1) of that section—

(i) the word "or" shall be inserted at the end of paragraph (b); and

(ii) paragraph (d) and the word "or" immediately preceding it shall be omitted; and

(b) in subsection (2) of that section—

(i) the word "and" shall be inserted after the word "borough"; and

(ii) the words "and the council of any district" shall be omitted.

[Mr. Ancram]

(5) Subsection (3) above is without prejudice to section 6 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 (obligation of London Regional Transport to invite tenders for carrying on activities in certain circumstances)."

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: No. 215, in clause 82, page 83, line 36, at end insert and in sections 83 to 86 of this Act include references to London Regional Transport in relation to any exercise of their power under section 3(2) of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 (contracting-out powers) which by virtue of section (Co-operation between certain councils and London Regional Transport) (3) of this Act is subject to those sections."

No. 415, in schedule 7, page 154, line 11, column 3, at beginning insert—

"In section 28, in subsection (1) paragraph (d) and the word "or" immediately preceding it, and in subsection (2) the words "and the council of any district"."

Mr. Ridley: An important objective of the Bill is to ensure that local authorities co-operate with one another to achieve the most effective use of public funds. That co-operation will be especially important in the case of cross-boundary services, because travel patterns do not always respect adminstrative boundaries. Without these amendments, the Bill would not provide for such an arrangement between London Regional Transport, which is of course not a local authority, and adjoining county and district councils in subsidising services in which they both have an interest. The amendments put that right. They enable LRT to take the lead with a contribution from the council or vice versa. When LRT takes the lead in securing services under such an arrangement, it will be bound by the Bill's tendering provisions for local bus services in the same way as local authorities.

No. 188, in clause 71, page 74, line 41, leave out "person" and insert "council".

No. 212, in clause 79, page 82, line 7, leave out "(3) and".

Mr. David Mitchell: The purpose of this group of amendments, voluminous though it is, is to clarify the meaning of "joint undertaking". Some bus undertakings exist under agreements giving rights over assets to more than one council, and would have fallen outside the definition of "joint undertaking" as originally drafted. Transfers by order under clause 65 would not have applied. It would, however, be inappropriate for the property rights and liabilities of those undertakings to be transferred under the scheme which makes provisions that apply to other district councils, since the parties might not be able to reach agreement about the allocation of property and other assets and the order — making procedure would be needed to settle matters. The amendments make it clear that in cases of that sort the undertakings fall within the definition of "joint undertaking", and are therefore subject to the order making process. We have also clarified that public transport companies can be formed as joint companies under the provisions only by two or more councils.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 137 to 141 agreed to.

Clause 65

ORDERS FOR TRANSFER OF JOINT UNDERTAKINGS TO COMPANIES FORMED UNDER SECTION 63

Lords amendment: No. 142, in page 65, line 12, after "undertaking" insert (whether or not then vested in that council)"

Mr. Mitchell: I beg to move, that this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 144, in page 65, line 21, after "undertaking" insert "and (without prejudice to that) to all property rights and liabilities of the body carrying on that undertaking"

No. 155, in clause 66, page 68, line 22, leave out "and"

No. 156, in page 68, line 28, at end insert
"; and (e) with respect to the consideration to be provided by any such person for any transfer under the order."

No. 159, in clause 69, page 70, line 41, at end insert —

The reference above in this subsection to the transfer to a public transport company of its initial undertaking is a reference, in relation to any such company, to the transfer or (if more than one) the first transfer of property, rights and liabilities to that company under section 58(7), 60(10), 64(7) or 66(2) of this Act."

No. 189, in clause 71, page 74, line 3, leave out from "company" to "any" in line 4 and insert
"so formed by way of consideration for"

No. 199, in clause 75, page 76, line 42, leave out from "in" to "requires" in line 1 on page 77 and insert
"pursuance of any provision made by any scheme or order under this Part of this Act in connection with any transfer of property, rights and liabilities to the company in question for which that scheme or order provides"

No. 200, in page 77, line 26, leave out "and" and insert "or"

No. 202, in clause 76, page 78, line 25, leave out "and" and insert "or"

No. 207, in clause 78, page 79, line 17, leave out "or" and insert "and"

No. 210, in clause 79, page 80, line 44 leave out "subsection (6) below" and insert
"the following provisions of this section"

No. 211, in page 81, line 10, at end insert—
"(6A) Any order under this section may make modifications in Schedule 4 for the purposes of its application to a transfer effected by that order."

No. 271, in clause 113, page 111, line 12, leave out "and" "or"

No. 273, in page 111, line 17, at beginning insert "(or partly in one way and partly in the other)"

No. 274, in page 111, line 19, at end insert "(including in particular, but without prejudice to the generality of that, provision with respect to the consideration to be provided by the transferee for any transfer under the scheme)"

No. 275, in page 111, line 20, leave out "subsection (4) below" and insert
"the following provisions of this section"

No. 276, in page 111, line 34, at end insert—
"(5) The Secretary of State may by order make modifications in Schedule 4 for the purposes of its application to transfers under section 50(4), 58(7), 60(10) or 64(7) of this Act."

Mr. Mitchell: This is a group of technical amendments relating to transfer schemes, designed to ensure that they can work properly in all the circumstances that might arise. The amendments also make it clear that the proposals to transfer property, rights or liabilities put forward if a council participates in a joint undertaking may relate to property, rights or liabilities, which at the time the proposal is put forward, are vested in the joint undertaking rather than in the individual authority.

Lords amendments Nos. 143 to 191 agreed to.

Clause 72

APPLICATION OF LOCAL AUTHORITY FINANCIAL CONTROLS TO PUBLIC TRANSPORT COMPANIES

Lords amendment: No. 192, in page 74, line 33, leave out from beginning to end of line 21 on page 75.

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 193, in page 75, line 22, leave out
"Subject to the following provisions of this section"

No. 195, in page 75, leave out lines 30 to 45 and insert—
"(5) Where a public transport company's controlling authority are a composite authority, the duty imposed by subsection (4) above is a joint duty of both or all of the component councils of that authority."

Mr. Ridley: This is an important amendment. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) in his place, because he pressed very hard for such a scheme.

[Mr. Ridley]

During earlier debates in the House and in another place there was criticism of our proposal that all the capital expenditure incurred by the new public transport companies should count for capital control purposes as though it were incurred by their controlling authorities. The amendments respond to that concern. They remove the companies' own expenditure from the capital control system. There will still be control over the extent of their external finance. The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 ensures that capital spending financed by the controlling authority remains subject to control, and clause 72 still provides that companies can borrow only from the controlling authority except for temporary loans and overdrafts. We are therefore placing control over the amount that the companies can raise by external grants or borrowing while allowing them full freedom to deploy their own resources. That is fully in line with the arguments put forward by Lord Shepherd in the debate in the other place, when he emphasised that capital expenditure should come from internal resources when possible, and that the companies should aim to replace their assets by the amounts that they can generate.

We believe that that is the best way to encourage the new companies to make business-like pricing and investment decisions. I hope that the House will welcome the change. We shall consult the local authority associations and the PTEs on the working of the new system as soon as possible.

Lords amendments Nos. 193 to 205, and amendment No. 205(a) agreed to.

Clause 78

COMPENSATION FOR LOSS OF EMPLOYMENT ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 206, in page 79, line 10, at end insert "or pension rights"

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 209, in page 80, line 14, after "emoluments" insert "or pension rights"

No. 284, in clause 120, page 117, line 5, at end insert—

""pension rights" includes, in relation to any person, all forms of right to or eligibility for the present or future payment of a pension, and any expectation of the accruer of a pension under any customary practice, and includes a right of allocation in respect of the present or future payment of a pension;"

Mr. Ridley: The amendment simply ensures that the power to make compensation regulations in clause 81 is properly comprehensive. We originally thought that the clause would cover pension rights by virtue of the word "emoluments", but subsequent legal advice is that that is not so. The amendment seeks to put that right.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 207 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 208, in page 80, line 2, after "of" insert

"or, in Scotland, sequestration of the estate of, or granting of a trust deed for creditors by,"

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is a minor technical amendment. It clarifies Scottish legal terminology.

Lords amendments Nos. 209 to 218 agreed to.

Clause 85

EXCEPTIONS FROM SECTION 83

Lords amendment: No. 219, in page 86, line 37, leave out "or".

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 220, in page 86, line 39, at end insert

"or

(c) securing the provision of a service to meet any public transport requirement which has arisen unexpectedly and ought in the opinion of the authority to be met without delay;"

Mr. Ridley: The amendments will allow authorities to enter into emergency subsidy agreements to meet any public transport needs that arise unexpectedly. It gives added flexibility for authorities to take prompt action without having to wait for the results of a tendering process. Of course, authorities will, as now, be required to invite tenders as soon as possible afterwards.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 220 to 222 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 223, leave out clause 87 and insert the following new clause—

"Travel concession schemes

.—(1) Any local authority, or any two or more local authorities acting jointly, may establish a travel concession scheme for the provision of travel concessions on journeys on public passenger transport services—

(a) between places in the principal area covered by the scheme;

(b) between such places and places outside but in the vicinity of that area; or by operators of such services participating in the scheme.

(2) For the purposes of this section, the principal area covered by a scheme under this section is—

(a) the area of the local authority concerned or, where two or more such authorities are concerned, the area comprising the areas of both or all those authorities; or

(b) if an area comprised within the area which would be the principal area under paragraph (a) above is specified in the scheme as being the principal area to which the scheme applies, the area so specified.

(4) Any travel concession scheme established under this section shall define—

(c) the dates in any year currently adopted as the dates on which operators may be admitted to participate in the scheme under section (Right of eligible service operators to participate in travel concession schemes) of this Act (referred to below in this section as the standard admission dates); and may include particulars of any other arrangements for the time being adopted by the authority or authorities concerned in establishing the scheme with respect to the operation, scope and application of the scheme.

(5) Any such scheme may define the standard admission dates by specifying particular dates, or by referring to dates of any specified description or separated by intervals of any specified length; but those dates, however determined, must not be separated by intervals of a length exceeding such period as may be prescribed.

(6) Arrangements adopted by the authority or authorities concerned in establishing any such scheme with respect to the operation, scope and application of the scheme (including the matters specifically mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (c) of subsection (4) above) may differ for different descriptions of concessions or services to which the scheme applies.

(7) Subject to section 88 of this Act, where an operator participating in any such scheme in respect of any services operated by him provides travel concessions in accordance with the scheme for persons travelling on those services, the authority responsible for administration of the scheme or (as the case may be) the authorities so responsible in such proportions respectively as they may agree among themselves shall reimburse that operator for providing those concessions.

(b) persons whose age does not exceed sixteen years;

(c) persons whose age exceeds sixteen years but does not exceed eighteen years and who are undergoing full-time education;

(d) blind persons, that is to say, persons so blind as to be unable to perform any work for which sight is essential;

(e) persons suffering from any disability or injury which, in the opinion of the authority or any of the authorities responsible for administration of the scheme, seriously impairs their ability to walk; and

(f) such other classes of persons as the Secretary of State may by order specify.")

(9) In this section "local authority"—

(a) means the council of a county or district in England and Wales or a regional or islands council in Scotland; and

(b) includes also, in relation to England and Wales, a metropolitan county passenger transport authority.

(10) Unless the context otherwise requires, references in this section and in the provisions of this Part of this Act relating to schemes under this section to the authority or authorities responsible for administration of a scheme under this section are references—

(a) except in a case to which paragraph (b) below applies, to the authority concerned in establishing the scheme or, where two or more authorities are so concerned, to both or all those authorities acting jointly; or to the Passenger Transport Executive for that Authority's area or (as the case may require) to that Executive and the other authority or authorities so concerned acting jointly.

(b) where the authority or one of the authorities concerned in establishing the scheme are a Passenger Transport Authority for a passenger transport area in England and Wales,

(11) Where a Passenger Transport Authority have established a scheme under this section, whether alone or jointly with any other authority or authorities, they shall notify the Passenger Transport Executive for their area of any proposal to vary the scheme, giving particulars of the proposed variation.")

Read a Second time.

Amendment (a) proposed to Lords amendment No. 223, in line 39, leave out paragraphs (a) to (f) and insert—

(a) any persons in receipt of any form of pension or who are over the age of sixty in the case of women and sixty-five in the case of men.

(b) all persons under the age of eighteen who are not in full time work.

(c) any persons who in the opinion of the authority suffer from any disability which in the opinion of the authority makes that person unable to rely on private forms of transport.

(d) any other persons whose receipt of travel concessions, would in the opinion of the authority, improve the efficiency of the public transport service provided.'.

Question accordingly negatived.

Lords amendments Nos. 223 to 241 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 242, after clause 95, insert the following new clause—

GRANTS FOR ESTABLISHMENT, ETC., OF RURAL PASSENGER SERVICES IN WALES AND SCOTLAND

.—(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, the Secretary of State may, with the approval of the Treasury make in such cases as he thinks fit a grant to any person for the purpose of securing the establishment, continuance or improvement of any public passenger transport service within the opinion of the Secretary of State is or will be for the benefit of persons residing in any rural area in Wales or Scotland.

(2) In the case of any grant under this section for the purpose of securing the continuance of an existing service—

(a) the service must be one which was established with the assistance of a grant under this section; and

(b) the grant must be for securing its continuance during such period from the time when it was first operated as appears to the Secretary of State to be appropriate in the case of that service.

(3) In the case of any grant under this section for the purpose of securing the improvement of an existing service the improvement in view must be one which appears to the Secretary of State to involve an innovative approach to the use of vehicles, equipment or other facilities in providing the service.

(4) Grants under this section shall be of such amount and subject to such conditions (including conditions requiring their repayment in specified circumstances) as the Secretary of State may, with the approval of the Treasury, determine, either generally or in relation to any particular cases or classes of case."

Mr. Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 243, after clause 95, insert the following new clause—

Transitional rural bus grants

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, the Secretary of State may, with the approval of the Treasury, make in such cases as he thinks fit a grant to any person in respect of qualifying mileage run at any time during the period of four years beginning with the date on which this section comes into force by vehicles used by that person in operating a service which at the time in question is a service eligible for grant under this section.

(2) A service is eligible for grant under this section at any time when—

(a) it is a service qualifying for fuel duty grant;

(b) it is being operated wholly or partly within a rural area in Great Britain (outside London); and

(c) it meets such other requirements as the Secretary of State thinks fit to impose; and in subsection (1) above "qualifying mileage" means, in relation to any vehicle, mileage run by that vehicle within any such rural area.

(3) Grants under this section shall be of such amount and subject to such conditions (including conditions requiring their repayment in specified circumstances) as the Secretary of State may, with the approval of the Treasury, determine, either generally or in relation to any particular cases or classes of case.")

No. 252, in page 99, line 9, leave out from beginning to ("and") in line 10.

No. 253, in page 99, line 13, at end insert—

"(1A) For the purposes of this Part of this Act, a service is a service qualifying for fuel duty grant at any time when fuel used in operating the service falls to be taken into account for the purpose of calculating grant payable to the operator of the service under section 92 of the Finance Act 1965 (grant to operators of bus services towards duty charged on bus fuel)."

No. 287, in clause 121 page 118, line 39, leave out "95" and insert

"(Grants for establishment, etc., of rural passenger services in Wales and Scotland), (Transitional rural bus grants)"

Mr. Mitchell: the new provisions do not mean any fundamental change. They describe in more detail the powers to make the rural grants.

Clause 95, as it stands, apparently gives the Secretary of State very wide powers to make grants, so wide that I am advised that its interpretation could have given rise to serious difficulties in its practical application. The new clauses are designed to replace clause 95 and define with greater precision the two grants that we propose to pay towards rural services.

Mr. Speaker: I remind the House that this amendment involves privilege.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Lords amendment No. 243 also involves privilege.

Lords amendment No. 243 agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I will ensure that the appropriate entry in made in the Journal.

Clause 96

GRANTS TOWARDS DUTY CHARGED ON BUS FUEL

Lords amendment: No. 244, in page 97, line 16, leave out "In section 92" and insert "(1) In section 92(1)"

Mr. David Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No 245, in page 97, line 17, leave out from "fuel" to "In" in line 35 and insert—

(a) the words "any bus service" shall be ommitted; and

No. 247, in page 98, line 7, leave out "the regulations" and insert—

No. 387, in schedule 7, page 150, line 20, at end insert—

"1965 c. 25.	The Finance Act 1965.	In section 92(1), the words "any bus service"

Lords amendments Nos. 245 and 246 involve privilege.

Mr. Mitchell: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

These amendments delete the requirement that a bus service should be "wholly or mainly available to the general public"

in order to qualify for fuel duty rebate. They also make clear that, in specifying descriptions of bus services which qualify for rebate, the Secretary of State may specify conditions in relation to the description.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 245 to 247 agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I will ensure that the appropriate entry is made in the Journal.

Clause 97

UNREGISTERED AND UNRELIABLE LOCAL SERVICES: REDUCTION OF FUEL DUTY GRANT

Lords amendment: No. 248, in page 98, line 10, leave out paragraphs (a) and (b) and insert

"that the operator of a local service has, without reasonable excuse—

(a) failed to operate a local service registered under section 6 of this Act; or

(b) to a significant extent operated a local service in contravention of that section;"

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments:

No. 249, in page 98, line 19, leave out subsection (3).

No. 250, in page 98, line 27, leave out "the" and insert "any"

Mr. Ancram: These amendments are designed to improve clause 97 so that it operates more fairly, and to bring it into line with clause 25.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 249 to 253 agreed to.

Lords Amendment: No. 245, in page 97, line 17, leave out from ("fuel") to ("In") in line 35 and insert—

"(a) the words "any bus service" shall be omitted; and

(b) there shall be inserted at the end the words—

"a bus service which is of a description specified for the purposes of this section and which meets any conditions which may be specified in relation to that description of service.".

(2) For subsection (8) of that section there shall be substituted the following subsections—

"(8)").

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: Nos. 267, in page 108, line 34, leave out subsection (10).

No. 279, insert the following new clause—Functions of Passenger Transport Authorities and Executives supplementary.

" .—(1) In Part II of the 1968 Act, the references to that Part of that Act or (as the case may be) to that Act mentioned in subsection (2) below shall include references to this Act.

(2) Those references are—

(a) the references to that Part of that Act in section 12(2), (3)(d) and (g) (borrowing powers of Executive) and in section 15(5) (expenditure by Authority in performing their functions to be defrayed by Executive); and

(b) the reference to that Act in section 12(5)(b) (which refers to rights of priority in respect of any liability assumed by or transferred to an Executive in pursuance of that Act)."

Mr. Ancram: The amendment inserts a new clause which I hope will be welcome to the House. It refers specifically to certain borrowing powers available to the PTEs under the Transport Act 1968, to ensure that they are available to executives in pursuance of their functions under this Act. The other two amendments remove the provisions that extended particular provision of the 1968 Act selectively to only some of the PTAs' and PTEs' functions under the Bill. These are unnecessary if Lords amendment No. 254 is agreed to.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I am now required to put the Questions on the remaining Lords amendments.

Lords amendments Nos. 255 to 421 agreed to.—[Some with Special Entry.]

Clause 4

OTHER DESCRIPTIONS OF AUTHORITY

10.2 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, leave out lines 27 to 30 and insert—

'(e) "local authority" means a county, district or London borough council, the Common Council of the City of London or the Council of the Isles of Scilly, and in sections 45(2)(b), 50(2), 51(6), 80(1), 157(1), 171(2), 438, 441, 442, 443, 444(4), 452(2), 453(2), 573(1), paragraph 2(1) of Schedule 2, grounds 7 and 12 in Schedule 3, ground 5 in Schedule 4, paragraph 7(1) of Schedule 5, paragraph 5(1)(b) of Schedule 6 and Schedule 17 includes the Inner London Education Authority and a joint authority established by Part IV of the Local Government Act 1985.'.

I hope that it will be for the convenience of the Committee if I speak generally on the amendments not only to the Housing Bill but to the Housing Associations Bill, the Housing (Consequential Provisions) Bill and the Landlord and Tenant Bill. The amendments are essentially of two kinds—first to take account of the provisions of the Local Government Act 1985 and, secondly, minor drafting corrections and improvemennts.

The Local Governmet Act has altered the law concerning certain local authorities and, if these Bills are to represent the law as it now is, it is necessary for certain amendments to be made. They can be divided into three groups. First are the amendments to remove references to the Greater London council — references to county councils remain to cover shire counties — and to add references to the new bodies established by the Local Government Act — the new Inner London Education Authority, the joint bodies established by part IV and the residuary bodies.

The same drafting scheme is followed as in the Local Government Act. References to ILEA and to the joint bodies are inserted in the housing provisions, but the position of residuary bodies, whose duration is limited, is dealt with in schedule 13 to the Local Government Act, referring to the relevant housing functions. In consequence of the abolition of the strategic functions of the GLC, a certain amount of re-arrangement of the Housing Bill is required, principally the removal of schedule 1 and the incorporation of the surviving provisions elsewhere.

The number of amendments to the Housing (Consequential Provisions) Bill is accounted for by the fact that the abolition of the GLC makes it possible greatly to simplify the definition of "local housing authority" in outlying enactments.

The second group of amendments arising as a result of the Local Government Act are those that put back the commencement of the consolidation to 1 April 1986, when the Local Government Act comes into force. A paragraph is also to be inserted into schedule 3 to the Housing (Consequential Provisions) Bill to make it clear that what is consolidated is the law as it stands after the Local Government Act has come into force, although the Acts all come into force on the same day. It also makes it clear that references in the consolidation to things done by or in relation to the local authorities before 1 April 1986 continue to include things done by, or in relation to, councils abolished on that date.

The third group is of consequential amendments of housing provisions in various GLC Acts, which also apply to London borough councils. These amendments were not included earlier because of the pending Local Government Bill, but in the event they are purely consequential on the consolidation and are not affected by the Local Government Act.

The minor drafting corrections and improvements are largely to secure consistency of style and expression, to correct minor mistakes which have come to light and to deal with other small points, such as removing references to the Development Land Tax Act 1976 which has been repealed by the Finance Act.

On Second Reading on 21 October 1985 the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) drew attention to the work of the Joint Committee on Consolidation Bills, the value of which is recognised by the House. This Committee considers consolidation Bills after they have received their Second Reading in the other place. It then reports to both Houses. Any amendments suggested by the joint Committee are incorporated into the Bill in the other place before it comes to this House.

However, sometimes it is the case that while a Bill is in progress, other Acts change the law, or small drafting or technical matters come to light. In these cases the usual procedure is for the draftsman to submit amendments to the chairman of the Joint Committee as a matter of courtesy and to enable him to comment, should he wish to do so. While there may be no formal requirement, the practice is well established and enables both Houses to deal with such amendments with greater confidence.

In this case the draftsman followed the established practice and submitted all, bar one, of the amendments made to take account of the provisions of the Local Government Act and some of the drafting corrections and improvements. The chairman raised some small points, which the draftsman incorporated. However, due to the absence of the chairman, Lord Brightman, following illness, it was not possible to submit to him before the Committee stage, originally fixed for 24 October 1985, the rest of the amendments, nor those already submitted and commented upon.

The concern expressed about the House considering the amendments in these circumstances led to the agreement through the usual channels for the Committee stage to be put off until today. I entirely understand and accept the grounds for the concern of the hon. Member for Newcastle on Tyne, East. At a late hour I inadvertently expressed myself in a slightly unfortunate way about the problem of getting information to him about amendments. I entirely understand the view that he took about that, and I regret what I said on that occasion.

This has enabled the amendments, as tabled, to be submitted to the chairman over the weekend. I understand that he has seen them and that he is content. In those circumstances and, since they do not change the existing law and represent pure consolidation, I hope that the Committee can move on to consider them in the spirit of co-operation usual for consolidation measures. Before doing so, once again may I pay tribute to the work of the joint committee and to its chairman. It is apparent from what I have said that the committee plays a crucial part in these matters. I am sure that the House of Commons will wish to join me in expressing our gratitude. I commend the amendments to this Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I fully accept the Solicitor-General's apology for the misunderstanding which occurred last week over the timing of the Opposition's receipt of the amendments. The House has rights. It is only proper that the Opposition and the Committee as a whole should be assured that we are agreeing to consolidation. I am now satisfied that we are agreeing to consolidation—indeed, very good consolidation. I endorse the thanks of the Solicitor-General to the Committee and its staff.

Clause 40

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Amendment made: No. 4, in page 22, line 48, leave out '1st January' and insert '1st April'. — [The Solicitor-General.]

Clause 40, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, with amendments.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order. Before we conclude what may seem to some a bizarre ritual, I wish, as a lawyer and housing spokesman, to say that what we have just done will make life much easier for many people. As the Law Commission said in its report, we have effectively consolidated the whole of housing law, the whole of landlord and tenant law and the whole of housing associations law into one measure. Only two other bits—the rent and leasehold legislation—remain elsewhere on the statute book.

In view of the difficulties faced by anybody who slogs from one piece of legislation to another trying to match them together—remembering that, in housing matters, non-lawyers as well as people trained to give legal advice must perform that task—the Solicitor-General was right to pay tribute to the Law Commission for endeavouring to ensure that we not only bring our law up to date and dispose of what should not be on the statute book, but make the law intelligible for those who must apply it.

If ever a subject was part of the day-to-day application of legislation, it is housing. Thanks to the work of the Law Commission, and with little thanks to ourselves, we have done a good deed in a bizarre and ritualistic way. I hope that people will be thankful for the last legislative act of this Session of this Parliament.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Further to the point of order. I respond to the words so gracefully spoken by the hon. Gentleman by saying that I should be sad if it were an accurate reflection that there was an inverse proportion between the words spoken in this Chamber and the good that we do. I am grateful for what he said and I am sure that his words will be gratefully received by those to whom they were addressed.

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 56 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Social Security

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The next item on the Order Paper is the draft Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous and Temporary Provisions Regulations 1985.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As these regulations are not being moved by the Government, is it in order for me to debate the Question that they be not moved?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the instrument is not moved, it is not before the House.

Mr. Brown: Why, then, does the Question need to be put? I understood that you called the Minister to move the regulations, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Why, then, is there no Question before the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The regulations were not moved, so they are not before the House. It is not a matter for me to decide. I can give the Minister the opportunity to move the instrument, but if he decides not to move it, then it is not before the House and, therefore, it cannot be debated.

Mr. Brown: I do not want to be difficult, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I have been long enough in the House to know that there is never an easy answer to some of the questions that hon. Members put to the Chair. However, I find it surprising that the Government should have given no explanation about why they are not moving the regulations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the Government, not for me. If they decide not to move an instrument, there is nothing that I can do about it.

Health Authorities (Resources)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—Mr. Neubert.]

10.23 pm

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): I am glad to give the Minister this opportunity to answer some of the questions that my hon. Friends and I have been raising about the resources allocation in the south-west Thames region to one of its districts.

In the west Surrey and north-east Hampshire district health area there have been proposals to close and reduce three facilities, action which would have a major impact on the lives of people living there. I refer to the closure of the Fleet hospital, the cessation of surgery at Farnham hospital and the closure of a ward at Frimley Park general hospital.

Had such a proposal been tough but fair and in line with Government policy, I should have been inclined to accept it and explain to my constituents the rationale behind it, because in general terms I believe that the Government's policy is right. However, the effects of the proposal, if it were implemented, would be neither fair nor reasonable, a fact that has been accepted by the regional health authority and the Department of Health.

Historically, the district has been under-funded and this lack of resources has been exacerbated by the fact that we live in an area where growth in house building, and therefore new population, has been particularly rapid. The cumulative effect of this is that those within the area, my constituents among them, are being unfairly and ever increasingly discriminated against in the amount of health resources they receive.

Under the RAWP formula, which is the main plank of the Government's policy, the district is receiving about £78 per patient against a national average of £100 and a regional average of £109—in other words, considerably less than the resources to which it should be entitled. In our region, this imbalance is as great as in any region in the country. For example, the Wandsworth district receives £156, per patient, more than double the amount that is received by west Surrey or north-east Hampshire.

In addition, the district's performance indicators, which are the Government's measures of efficiency and productivity, are the best in the region. The cumulative effect of this is that the district with the least resources but the best record of efficiency is continually under-funded while others which operate less efficiently continue to be over-funded.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I thank my hon. Friend for raising this subject. I am also involved, as my constituency contains Farnham hospital. I ask my hon. Friend to reaffirm that in our district the efficiency of patient turnover and cost effectiveness are amongst the best in the country. Nobody is seeking an unfair allocation of resources. We all want a fair allocation of resources and the avoidance of waste in the interests of patient care. However, am I not right in thinking that our figures are among the best in the country?

Mr. Mates: My hon. Friend is quite right and no doubt the Minister will agree. These facts are not in dispute. I am sure that the Minister will agree that the sum total of these facts is an intolerable situation. However, despite the representations made to the Ministry, it is not prepared to intervene in the region's management decisions. Despite representations to the region, it is not prepared to intervene in the district's management. The current jargon which has been used by the Minister himself is that management must not be second-guessed. I applaud the Government's efforts to sharpen up management, but they cannot simply back away from highly political decisions by saying that they are not prepared to intervene.

The Minister's job is to see that his policy is having the effect he intends. If not, he has the right and the duty, to give directions that the Government policy is carried out.

I recognise that the region has a difficult task in allocating its shrinking resources. I fully support the Government's decision to reallocate the resources from where they have been historically spent to areas where a new need has arisen. My point is that this admirable policy is being implemented only in a few health districts and that the Minister should ensure that his policy reaches down to the sharp end of the Health Service. We boast, and rightly so, that our record in health service provision in the past six years is second to none. The present policy should result in that excellent record being enhanced. If the Government are unable or unwilling to carry out fine tuning, when for a number of understandable reasons the policy is not working, we shall lose the argument.

My constituents are in an area where an unwanted growth in housing has been foisted upon them and it is no use telling them that the Government's policy is fair and sensible if the reality they see is the closure of and reduction in health services which are already under strain. Nor would I wish to try to do so.

Many Members try to plead special reasons why their constituents should be more favourably treated than others. This is not one of those occasions and forms no part of my argument. I am asking the Government for nothing to which our people are not entitled, nor am I asking the Government to change their policy. I ask only that, having frankly admitted that my constituents are being disadvantaged because of Government policies, the Minister should take steps to correct the situation. Thus I will be able to report that the Government's programme for distribution of health resources is sound and sensible, which I believe it to be, and it is seen to be fairly operated.

10.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful for the opportunity which my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) has given me and the House to discuss the important problems to which he has drawn our attention. I congratulate him on the way in which he has demonstrated his concern. I know that that concern is shared by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) and others of my hon. Friends whose constituents serve within the relevant district health authority area.

Before turning to the details of the district and the problems to which my hon. Friend has referred, I hope that he will allow me to make one or two general points to set the issue in context. The title of the debate, which my hon. Friend requested, was "The Allocation of Resources within Regional Health Authorities". It is important to recognise that the resources that we are allocating nationally are increasing and have increased during the period of this Government at a significant rate. I know that my hon. Friend recognises that, but it is important that the message is communicated again and again to all our constituents. We have doubled spending in cash terms, and in real terms the increase has been over 20 per cent.

The issue is not limited to the transfer of resources because services have improved for patients. That is a measure by which we can stand to be judged, and we are happy to do so. There is often talk about waiting lists, but I regard that as a poor proxy measure. Our achievements in terms of the number of patients treated are much more significant. Only last year, the number of day cases treated nationally rose by 11 per cent. to 903,000 and the number of in-patient cases rose by 2·6 per cent. to 6·18 million. At the same time, we have seen capital expenditure increase significantly. In the five years between 1980 and 1984, there were 36 major new hospital schemes. Progress continues with over 75 major schemes to a total value in excess of £850 million.

My hon. Friend would rightly ask, "What about distribution?" I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends recognise that the significant transfer of resources to health care is commendable, especially at a time when public spending is rightly under pressure. But is distribution unfair, not least in the district health authority in my hon. Friend's constituency?

Reference has been made to the formidable animal called the Resource Allocation Working Party. The policy of RAWP has been in operation since 1976 and its objective has been accepted by virtually all those concerned, at least in outline. When it pinches on their own interests, however, different views often obtain. There is a broad acceptance of the ideas of RAWP, which are based on the principle of providing equal opportunity of access for health care needs for people at equal risk. The fundamental emphasis is on equality of access. Successive Governments have accepted and implemented the RAWP approach.

As my hon. Friend knows, the RAWP approach involves a complex calculation both of the revenue and capital implications of the target and the fair share of resources. Revenue targets are based fundamentally on relative populations. Population figures are weighted, first, to reflect the make-up of the population by age and sex and to reflect the use that the population makes of health services as analysed over six main blocks of services. Secondly, standardised mortality ratios are used, which the RAWP recommended could be used as a proxy for relative need for health care. This is a complex matter, but it has been accepted that it produces answers which will help to achieve equality of access to health care.

Other factors in the RAWP calculations reflect cross-boundary flows of patients, the existence of teaching facilities, the funding of a small number of supra-regional services and, in the case of the Thames regions, for London weighting. The capital formula is similiar to the complex revenue formula, but is based on population figures projected for the five years ahead of the year of allocation and they deliberately ignore cross-boundary flows.

The application of the RAWP formula to the south-west Thames regional health authority undoubtedly poses a difficult task for that authority over the next 10 years. As a Thames region, it will be expected to release an element of its historically high level of funding for redeployment elsewhere. At the same time, within the region, it has to plan for revenue to be redistributed from some of its districts, including some in London, to others which its own internal RAWP formula shows are in need of extra money. My hon. Friend has referred to the needs of his district.

Without going further into the minutiae of these calculations, I should like to stress that it is for the regional health authority to determine in the first instance the basis of the principles that we have set nationally. I recognise my hon. Friend's point about the final responsibility of central Government. The district and regional levels are crucial factors in the balance of the operations of the Health Service. The DHSS has received and is examining regional strategic plans which set out the regions' intentions over the next decade. Those plans require ministerial approval. Obviously, my ministerial colleagues and I will be reviewing them carefully.

The south-west Thames regional health authority plan is being considered by the Department. It is expected that it will be with Ministers at the end of the year. Ministers will also have the opportunity to discuss the services and resources with the regional chairman and officers at the annual ministerial review meetings. There is a balance between the responsibilities and duties at the district and regional level and the DHSS.

Mr. Mates: I take that point. However, my hon. Friend is talking in terms of the strategic plan—we are talking about the immediate threat of closure. That is why there is a time element which is not on our side. Ministers should look at this aspect where policies are not working.

Mr. Whitney: My hon. Friend talks about the "immediate threat of closure". The proposal—it was no more than that — with respect to the three hospital facilities to which he referred has now been withdrawn. As I understand it, there is no immediate threat of closure. There is a need to ensure that within the RAWP formulae —nationally down to district health authority level—the proposals are implemented at a measured and sensible pace. There is a strict limit to the pace at which they can be pursued. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that the proposals which were floated and which caused such concern have been withdrawn.

Mr. Mates: Unilaterally, but we have not solved the problem. The problem will not go away—it might get worse. That is the real reason why I raised this matter. My hon. Friend should not wait and make the decision next April, because, by that time, the problem will be twice as bad.

Mr. Whitney: If my hon. Friend will allow me, because we are running fast out of time, I wish to draw his attention to two resources that are being moved into the district and must be taken into account in all the calculations. The west Surrey and north east Hampshire district will be receiving more than £5 million extra a year in revenue over the next 10 years. It is important to recognise that already this year that district has had significant financial help from the region. It has received an additional £400,000 a year in recurrent revenue; it has had non-recurrent bridging finance to help the mental illness sector to the tune of £644,000. The region has agreed to underwrite overspending in the mental illness sector this year of £200,000. That adds up to £1 million.

Planning has also started on an extension to the main district general hospital at Frimley Park to provide 110 extra beds. This will cost in excess of £7 million, and the region hopes to start work on it in 1987. Recognising that the district has a low base of capital stock, it bought the Brompton hospital site in the district last year at a cost of about £3·5 million. We should compare that with the position of a district in the same region which has to find ways of coping with a reduction of £1 million this year and nearly £14 million a year by 1994.

The regional chairman wrote to all district chairmen within his region, asking them to examine their spending patterns for the year and, if an overspend was projected, to put forward a package of measures to bring them back to target. The west Surrey and north east Hampshire district made public possible ward and hospital closures to curtail spending before having discussions with the authority and before going through the normal consultation process. As I have said, those plans are not going ahead.

The regional health authority has had to work out a policy for moving resources which it believes to be fair to every district—those that are under-provided as well as the better off ones. When decisions are made, much importance is attached to timing and to the minimum disruption both to the gainers and to the losers. It will be a matter of judgment how fast a pace can be sensibly maintained. In the timing we have to take account of the redistribution of resources to gainers and of the anticipated opening of major capital projects.

In the case of the west Surrey and north east Hampshire district, the bulk of its additional revenue will become available in 1990 and 1991 when the new extension to Frimley Park hospital should be ready to open. By then the district will be getting an extra £4·5 million a year out of a total of ·5·1 million planned for 1994.

It has long been our view that every health authority in the country should make every penny that it receives count in the service to patients. It is important that those districts which can show they are not so well off as they might be do not just sit back and wait for more money. They must review every aspect of their services to make sure that they are fully effective and efficient. We have asked authorities to provide cost improvement programmes which show a saving of at least 1 per cent. of their revenue base. Districts can then retain these savings to be used for service development as they think necessary. We have also encouraged authorities to put some of their housekeeping services — cleaning, laundry and catering — out to competitive tender as a means of making savings. The House should know that the south west Thames region has already made enormous progress in this area and is to be congratulated on the excellent results achieved.

I am aware that this district, as well as the Basingstoke and north Hampshire health authority will be affected by plans to build more dwellings in the area up to 1991. Naturally that causes concern to the health authorities which have to provide extra services for the additional population. I know that both districts have made representations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment about alterations to the structure plan which will propose that the number of new dwellings should be increased to 20,000. I assure my hon. Friend that I will write to the chairman of the two regional health authorities concerned and ask them whether these developments were taken into account when their 10-year resource plans were drawn up. If not, I hope they will consider looking again at the level of provision set aside for these districts in the context of their resource distribution policy.

I hope that what I have said will go at least some way —I must not be too optimistic—to reassure my hon. Friends that we recognise the pressures. I hope that they understand that the movement towards meeting their RAWP targets is happening, although it will not be at the pace that we should all like for reasons which I hope that we all understand. Nevertheless, the movement is in the right direction. The problems of the area are understood at district and regional levels and also in the Department, but we must continue to look for the good housekeeping which experience has shown can be achieved throughout the country.

I now appreciate that the alarm and dismay that was caused when the proposals were floated had a singularly unfortunate impact in the constituencies of my hon. Friends. I hope that they now recognise that the very significant transfer of resources that we are making to our health effort is producing results throughout the country and that their district is not being neglected but will be able to look forward to an increasing share of the resources available in years to come. We must, however, be governed by the realities of the problem and the need to balance, in this case, the demands of inner London against the growing demands creating by the rising population of my hon. Friend's district.

Mr. Mates: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said. All that he has just said is correct, but——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make another speech unless the Minister has not yet concluded his remarks.

Mr. Whitney: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mates: All that my hon. Friend the Minister has said reinforces the points that I have made. We are indeed short of resources, and resources are being reallocated slowly—I understand all the arguments about that—but proposals, for example, to close a ward at Frimley Park hospital when we are getting ready to build a whole new extension make the whole problem, which is really just an accounting problem, even more ludicrous in the eyes of the people in the district.

My hon. Friend the Minister talks of the proposals having being been withdrawn as though that meant that the problem had gone away. In fact, by refusing to carry out the region's instructions the district health authority has now put itself in the red, so the problem has not gone away. Indeed, there is a risk that it will get worse in the next six months and that even more severe cuts will be required next April when the overspend will have grown because the savings will not have been made because the proposals have been withdrawn. The Department's complacent view that it will all come out in the wash may be true in four or five years' time, but it is not true for those actually being deprived of patient care at this moment.

Mr. Whitney: I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that people are not being deprived of patient care at this moment. The proposals have been withdrawn, but the Department is certainly not complacent. There is an overall framework—we seem to agree on that—and the movement towards it is steady. Indeed, on the figures that I have given, I would say that the movement is impressive. Nevertheless, we must look to the district to play its part in meeting the imperatives which none of us can escape. Much has been achieved in many other districts by way of cost improvements and, indeed, rationalisation. From time to time that must include hospital closures because there are many small, inefficient and inaccessible hospitals. I make no comment on these particular instances, but in some circumstances that may well make sense because it is a major part of our policy—and one which I certainly stand by—that having appointed regional and district health authorities we must, within very broad parameters, allow them to make their management judgments within the resource implications that we impose. I was about to say "resource constraints", but it is important to recognise that the district health authority will have an expanding budget at its disposal. We look to the authority to use that expanding budget sensibly.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Prorogation

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

Mr. Speaker: I have further to acquaint the House that the Lord High Chancellor, one of the High Commissioners, delivered Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command. For greater accuracy, I have obtained a copy and directed that the terms of the Speech be printed in the Votes and Proceedings. Copies are being made available in the Vote Office.

The Gracious Speech was as follows:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

The Duke of Edinburgh and I were pleased to receive the State Visits of the Life President of Malawi in April and the President of Mexico and Senora de la Madrid in June. We were saddened by the devastation caused by the earthquake in Mexico in September, for which my Government provided prompt assistance.

We recall with much satisfaction the State Visit to Portugal in March. I have also visited Belize, and was in the Bahamas for the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting. Our tour of Commonwealth countries in the Eastern Caribbean is still in progress.

My Government welcomed the decision of the Maldives and of St. Vincent and the Grenadines to become full members of the Commonwealth.

My Government have maintained Britain's contribution to Western defence, and enhanced the United Kingdom's own defences through improvements in equipment and in the regular and reserve forces. They have played a full part in the Atlantic Alliance, and promoted British and Western defence interests outside the NATO area.

My Government have continued to work vigorously for agreements on verifiable arms control and disarmament, and to seek improved relations with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. They warmly welcomed the opening of talks in Geneva between the United States and the Soviet Union and fully support the United States' efforts to reach concrete agreements.

My Government have signed the Treaty on the Accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Communities, and have signed and ratified the third Convention of Lomé. An Act has been passed implementing the Fontainebleau Agreement on the future financing of the European Communities, including the correction of the British budgetary contribution.

My Government share the widespread public concern for the victims of the famine in Africa. They have continued to provide substantial emergency assistance both directly and through the European Community.

My Government have continued fully to honour their undertakings to the people of the Falkland Islands, while taking positive steps to seek more normal relations with Argentina. The Sino-British Joint Declaration on Hong Kong was signed last December and an Act consequent upon its terms was passed. My Government have reached agreement with Spain on the implementation of the Lisbon statement concerning Gibraltar.

[Mr. Speaker]

My Government have supported efforts to restore the independence and non-aligned status of Afghanistan. They have urged peaceful change in South Africa and the early independence of Namibia.

My Government welcomed to the United Kingdom in June the Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China. The great importance my Government attach to their relations with the Countries of South East and South Asia was marked by the Prime Minister's visit there in April and by the visit here this month of the Indian Prime Minister.

Members of the House of Commons

I thank you for the provision which you have made for the honour and dignity of the Crown and for the public service.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

My Government have maintained the policies necessary to bring down inflation and sustain economic growth. Inflation remains low, the output of the nation is at its highest level ever and continues to increase, as does the number of people in work.

Further steps have been taken to help the unemployed into jobs by extending the Youth Training Scheme and enlarging the Community Programme, and in other ways, including a reform of the structure of national insurance contributions.

To promote economic efficiency and encourage the spread of share ownership, not least among employees, my Government have continued their programme of returning state-owned businesses to the private sector, including the successful public flotation of British Telecommunications.

An Act has been passed to complete the transition of the Trustee Savings Banks to full private sector status and to permit wide public participation in their ownership.

An Act has been passed to increase competition in the provision of local bus services in Great Britain and to enable the operations of the National Bus Company to be transferred to the private sector.

Legislation has been enacted to make further provision for the payment of grants to the National Coal Board and to abolish the British National Oil Corporation.

Legislation has been enacted to remove the statutory levy on cinema admissions, to provide for alternative financial assistance for film production and to reduce the regulatory burden on the film and cinema industries.

An Act has been passed for the better protection of food and the environment.

An Act has been passed to establish in England and Wales a Crown Prosecution Service independent of the police, and to enable time limits to be imposed on criminal proceedings.

An Act has been passed giving the right to vote at Parliamentary and European Parliament elections to many British citizens resident abroad, and extending postal and proxy voting to electors who cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person.

Legislation has been passed to establish a comprehensive statutory framework governing the interception of communications.

An Act has been passed to deal with the problem of drunkenness at designated sporting events.

Considerable advance has been made in the consolidation of our statute law; provision has been made to apply international Conventions on child abduction and for the administration of justice.

An Act has been passed to abolish the Greater London Council and the Metropolitan County Councils on 1st April 1986 and to transfer most of their functions to the borough and district councils.

In Northern Ireland, my Government have attached high importance to the maintenance of law and order. They have continued the search for ways in which responsibility can be returned to a local administration on a widely acceptable basis. They have sought to develop a solid working relationship with the Government of the Republic of Ireland.

For Scotland, measures have been passed to introduce a rebate scheme following rating revaluation, to establish trustee bodies to manage certain Scottish institutions, and to make a number of reforms in Scots law.

Legislation has been passed to reform insolvency law in England and Wales, and in Scotland.

My Government have published proposals to improve the quality of school education, the effectiveness of teachers and the development of higher education into the next decade.

My Government have conducted a fundamental review of the social security system and published proposals for radical reform.

In addition, my Government have protected the real value of the retirement pension and other related benefits, and passed an act to improve employees' rights under occupational pension schemes, and to extend statutory sick pay.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend you.

Thereafter a Commission for proroguing Parliament was read, after which the Lord Chancellor said:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission which has been now read we do, in Her Majesty's name, and in obedience to Her Majesty's Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Wednesday the sixth day of November, to be then here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Wednesday the sixth day of November next.

End of the Second Session (opened on 6 November 1984) of the Forty-Ninth Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the Thirty-Fourth Year of the Reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 21 October 1985

THE ARTS

Public Funding

29. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he has any proposals to increase the level of public funding for the arts.

Sir George Young: The Government are committed to keeping up the level of support for the arts. My hon. Friend will be announcing next year's arts budget in the normal way in due course.

London (Arts Provision)

30. Mr. Jessel asked the Minister for the Arts what recent representations have been received by the Government concerning provision for the arts in London following the abolition of the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend has received a few representations.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

European Community (Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the amount of food and wine sent from the EEC to the Soviet Union, and eastern Europe, respectively, in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in each of the previous five years.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested for the period 1976-1983 and 1984 is contained in replies given by my predecessor on 25 March 1985 at column 1-2 and 13 June 1985 at column 526-27 respectively. Figures are now available for the exports of wine in 1984; these record 72 thousand tonnes exported to the Soviet Union and 14 thousand tonnes to the rest of eastern Europe. Provisional information for the first half of 1985 is contained in the table.

European Community (Export Rebates)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount paid to British exporters by way of export rebates financed by or through the EEC for the export of food in the most recent annual period for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: Refunds totalling £395 million were paid on exports of agricultural products (including some non-food items such as live animals and feed grains) from the United Kingdom to non-European community countries in 1984-85. The expenditure, which takes account of monetary compensatory amounts, was fully funded by the EC so that British agricultural exports can compete on world markets.

Salmon

Mr. Onslow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the action he now proposes to take to promote the conservation of salmon stocks.

Mr. Gummer: We hope to make an announcement in the near future.

Wine

Sir David Price asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what have been the results so far of his Department's investigations into the sale of contaminated wine in the United Kingdom; from which countries such wines have come; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: A surveillance exercise on the incidence of contamination of wine in the United Kingdom with diethylene glycol has been carried out by my Department. We tested samples drawn by us from retail outlets, sent to us by the trade and submitted for confirmatory analysis by public analysts. Seven hundred and seventeen samples of wine from 16 countries were tested. Seventy-six samples were found to contain diethylene glycol, some of which were Austrian wines, some German wines, some Italian wines and one a Hungarian wine which had been bottled in Germany and may well have been contaminated at that stage.

In addition local enforcement authorities carried out testing in the normal course of their duties and retailers and wine traders also carried out their own testing. The results of these tests are not available centrally.

The conclusion that we have drawn from the exercise was that this was a problem confined to some producers in Austria and certain bottlers in Europe; no contamination of other wines was detected.

Animals (Ritual Slaughter)

Mr. Heddle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to seek to amend the legislation governing the ritual slaughter of poultry, sheep, pigs and cattle.

Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in the light of the Farm Animal Welfare Council's report on ritual slaughter, he will make a statement on his intentions with regard to legislation to implement its recommendations.

Mrs. Fenner: The Farm Animal Welfare Council published its report in July and we immediately sought comments from interested organisations. This consultation period is not yet concluded. We will wish to consider the report's recommendations carefully in the light of all representations made before taking decisions.

Food and Environment Protection Act 1985

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government by the European Community Commission or other European agencies concerning the operation of the Food and EnvironmentProtection Act 1985, and the extent to which fungicides meet criteria for the protection of the environment with particular regard to insecticidal action against beneficial insects and in the context of progress towards common European standards.

Mrs. Fenner: None.

Badgers

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the review of the policy of destroying badgers in areas where they are thought to pose a threat to cattle has now been completed.

Mrs. Fenner: The review of policy is still in progress. I now expect that the review team will be in a position to report to us early in 1986.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if any of the cattle near Eastbourne that were monitored following the discovery of bovine tuberculosis in some badgers have also manifested the disease; how many cattle were studied; for how long; when the monitoring will cease; and what have been the conclusions.

Mrs. Fenner: Three cattle in the Eastbourne area of east Sussex reacted to the tuberculin test in 1984 and 28 during the period January to September 1985. These animals were from an area occupied by some 1,600 cattle which, from the beginning of this year, have been subject to six-monthly tuberculin tests because of the known presence of high levels of infection in badgers in the area. Other cattle in east Sussex are tuberculin tested at frequencies varying from one to three years. No date has been fixed for the ending of more frequent testing of the animals in the area near Eastbourne but the situation is being kept under review. The disclosure of reactors in the last two years has confirmed the risk posed to cattle by infected badgers. It is too early to draw conclusions from the results of the intensified cattle testing regime now in place.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of badgers killed in 1984 and so far in 1985 in order to deal with bovine tuberculosis; and in each case what was the location, the method of killing, and the method of capture.

Mrs. Fenner: The normal method of killing is by shooting with a pistol after capture. A full analysis, including methods of capture, is set out in the table.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of cases of bovine tuberculosis among cattle in controlled areas in 1984 and so far in 1985.

Mrs. Fenner: Forty-two new herds with visible lesion reactors were disclosed in 1984 in the control areas scheduled in the Badger (Control Areas) Order 1977. The corresponding provisional figure for the period January to June 1985 was 26.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of cases of bovine tuberculosis among cattle in 1983, 1984 and so far in 1985 attributed to the illegal movement of diseased cattle; where they occurred; and what was the number of cattle involved.

Mrs. Fenner: In 1983, 1984 and so far in 1985 no outbreaks of bovine tuberculosis in cattle have been attributed to the illegal movement of diseased cattle. However, nine confirmed outbreaks in 1983 were attributed to the legal movement of cattle that subsequently proved to have been diseased. The corresponding provisional figures for 1984 and for the first half of 1985 are 15 and ten outbreaks respectively.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he intends to take following representations he has received from the North Marianas on the dumping of nuclear waste in the Pacific.

Mr. Gummer: I have received no such representations.

Moorland

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what checks or other screening exists to prevent damage to moorland by reseeding or regeneration through grant aided agricultural improvements (a) within sites of special scientific interest and national parks and (b) in the wider countryside.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 22 July 1985, c. 624]: I wish to make it clear that the statutory instruments introducing the new capital grant arrangements on 1 October specifically exclude heathland and moorland from the definition of grassland for which improvement grants are available.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Murphy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement of Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the 18th EEC directive relating to value added tax.

Mr. Gow: Customs and Excise has consulted a wide range of representative trade and professional bodies about the draft 18th EC Directive on VAT and the associated draft 19th Directive. I have received their report, and I am considering our policy towards those proposals which will affect the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the early payment of non-value added tax own resources to the European Communities in August and subsequent months.

Mr. Gow: In accordance with article 10(2) of Council regulation 2891/77, the Commission invited member states to pay on 20 August instead of 20 September non-VAT own resources collected in July. It also invited payment on 20 September instead of 21 October, and on 21 October instead of 20 November, of such own resources collected in August and September respectively. These own resources consist of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties. The Government have complied with these requests.

A sum of £120 million was paid on 20 August and sums of £120 million and £118 million were paid on 20 September and 21 October respectively. The payments of levies and duties on the usual dates made under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972, were or will be reduced by appropriate amounts; there will therefore be no net addition to public expenditure.

Trustee Savings Bank (Scotland)

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Treasury counsel who gave advice prior to the introduction of the Trustee Savings Banks Bill on the ownership of the Trustee Savings Bank Scotland was qualified in Scottish law.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Those who advise the Government on Scots law are naturally qualified to do so.

Premium Bonds

Mr. Onslow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will amend the regulations governing the purchase of premium bonds in such a way as to enable godparents to buy bonds for their godchildren.

Mr. Ian Stewart: There are no plans for this, but the Department of National Savings is about to put on sale a new range of gift tokens, including three designs for premium bonds, which will help godparents to give presents to their godchildren which can be exchanged for premium bonds at post offices.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what annual changes have taken place in gross domestic product in real terms since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: This information is available in the 1985 edition of United Kingdom National Accounts (published in September) which shows both the level of, and year to year changes in, the average measure of gross domestic product at constant factor cost.

Treaty Shopping

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to seek to amend tax treaties to prevent treaty shopping; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The Inland Revenue keeps the United Kingdom network of tax treaties under continual review and look for evidence of abuse. If the hon. Lady writes to me about any particular cases she has in mind I shall look into them.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department has spent on office furniture, carpets and curtains and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Gow: Prior to 1 April 1983 when the Property Repayment Service was introduced, this expenditure was borne centrally by the Property Services Agency. Expenditure since 1 April 1983 is as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86*
Office furniture and curtains	41	208	60
Carpets	14	68	9

* Up to 30 September 1985.

Office decorating is carried out by the Property Services Agency as part of the maintenance service; separate figures are not available and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rating under the business expansion scheme for £1 invested for a person paying tax at a marginal rate of (a) 60 per cent. and (b) 30 per cent.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government have any plans to offer individuals paying tax at a marginal rate of 30 per cent. the equivalent relief under the business expansion scheme for each £1 invested to that now available to an individual taxed at a marginal rate of 60 per cent.

Mr. Moore: No.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether business expansion schemes relief is made available to companies which purchase other businesses as going concerns where no new investment is promised.

Mr. Moore: BES relief is given to the investor, not the company he invests in, and is available only if there is new investment in a qualifying company. Subject to certain conditions, the BES company may then use the proceeds of that investment, or any other resources available to it, to acquire the trade of another business which it intends to carry on.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide a breakdown between business expansion scheme relief allocated to individuals and to qualifying business expansion scheme funds, respectively;

(2) what is the average amount of relief claimed by individuals making qualifying business expansion scheme investments; and what is the average rate of taxation so relieved.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Venture Capital

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what information he has as to whether the Treasury's definition of the term venture capital is comparable with definition adopted by other European Economic Community countries;

(2) what is the Treasury's definition of the term venture capital; and whether this includes (a) capital made available to any persons by banks or licensed deposit takers, (b) loan capital, preference share capital or ordinary equity share capital and (c) capital available to persons carrying on trades which are excluded from the scope of the business expansion scheme;

(3) what information he has about any published or unpublished records of the provision and sources of venture capital in the United Kingdom since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Cable and Wireless

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Government's residual shareholding in Cable and Wireless.

Mr. Moore: The Government announced on 5 September that, subject to market conditions, they intended to sell their remaining ordinary shares in Cable and Wireless during the current financial year. The sale of part of the Government's continuing programme of privatisation and is in line with the policy announced to the House by my right hon. Friend the former Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 14 March 1984 (Hansard col. 420) of selling Government minority holdings in privatised companies as and when circumstances permit.

Pending parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, urgent payments in connection with Government sale expenses are being met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Prime Ministers (Pensions)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what pensions are currently paid to each former Prime Minister; and how annual changes in such pensions are calculated.

Mr. Gow: Under section 26 of the Parliamentary and other Pensions Act 1972, former Prime Ministers on leaving office are awarded pensions of 15/40ths of their full salary, irrespective of length of service. Increases are paid each year from the same date and by the same amount as the increase in the additional component of the state pension, which is linked to the retail prices index. This is subject to the pension in payment not exceeding the amount of pension that would be paid to the current Prime Minister on leaving office.

It is not normal practice to publish details of individual pensions. The basic pension entitlements of former Prime Ministers are set out in the supplementary statements on the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund Accounts (section 1, annuities and pensions). With the addition of pension increases the majority of pensions in payment to former Prime Ministers are at the maximum current entitlement of £15,709 per annum.

Budget Council

Mr. Couchman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement about the Budget Council on 17-18 September.

Mr. Gow: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council in Luxembourg.

After meeting a delegation from the European Parliament the Council considered the proposals contained in the Commission's 1986 preliminary draft budget. The Council then established a draft budget for 1986 by qualified majority.

The draft budget respects the 1986 reference framework set by the ECOFIN Council in July, with limited additions for enlargement, and is consistent with the budget discipline conclusions agreed by the Council in December 1984.

Provision is made on the revenue side for the United Kingdom to receive a VAT abatement of 1·4 billion ecu, in accordance with the conclusions of the Fontainebleau European Council.

The expenditure agreed by the council totals 32,056 million ecu of payment appropriations and 34,218 million ecu of commitment appropriations. These figures include a 1,652 million ecu rebate of own resources to Spain and Portugal under the agreed transitional arrangements. The Council agreed 21,012 million ecu of payment and commitment appropriations for agricultural guarantee expenditure; this is consistent with the 1986 agricultural guideline. It also provided 6,537 million ecu of payment appropriations and 8,782 million ecu of commitment appropriations for non-obligatory expenditure. These increases are within the 1986 maximum rate of 7·1 per cent.

The Council set the same levels of food aid provision, 508 million ecu of payment appropriations and 636 million ecu of commitment appropriations, as in the 1985 adopted budget whose levels were higher than those generally agreed in previous years. The Council stated that it would continue to monitor developments in the countries concerned and declared itself ready to review the arrangements made in the light of requirements.

The draft budget has now been forwarded to the European Parliament.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Appeals

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give a breakdown as between successful and unsuccessful appeals in each of the last three years in cases where parents were dissatisfied with the initial choice of secondary school to which their child was allocated in (a) England, (b) Essex and (c) Basildon; and if he will indicate the total number of appeals in each category.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not available.

Microelectronics Education Programme

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the future level of spending on the microelectronics education programme planned for each of the next three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on 23 July 1985 at column 515.

PRIME MINISTER

Middle East Visit

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister which Foreign and Commonwealth Office Ministers accompanied her on her recent visit to the middle east.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

None. My right hon. Friend was, however, accompanied by a senior Foreign Office official, in addition to members of her own staff.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent visit to the middle east.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend visited Egypt from 16-18 September and Jordan from 18-20 September. This was the first visit by a British Prime Minister in office to Cairo since Mr. Churchill in 1943, and the first ever to Jordan. My right hon. Friend reviewed our excellent bilateral relations with both countries and had valuable talks on international issues, particularly the middle east. My right hon. Friend reaffirmed our full support for King Hussein and President Mubarak in the search for a peaceful solution of the Arab-Israel dispute. My right hon. Friend also visited projects in both countries in which British industry is closely involved.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will now make a statement on the talks which have taken place between the British and Irish Governments regarding Northern Ireland.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

No. It would be premature to make a statement at this stage. A full statement will be made at the appropriate moment, and Parliament will have the opportunity to debate any proposals that may emerge.

Broadcasting (Programme Content)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister on how many occasions since May 1979 Her Majesty's Government have tendered advice to the British Broadcasting Corporation or the Independent Broadcasting Authority about its programme content (a) in advance of transmission of a particular item or programme and (b) after the transmission of a particular item or programme, and if she will make a statement.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

No central record is kept of contacts between Governmental Departments and the broadcasting authorities on programmes planned by or transmitted by them. The Home Secretary of the day and the Prime Minister have made representations on various occasions since 1979 about the coverage of Irish terrorism, the reporting of the Falklands conflict and the reporting of the views of Sikh extremists in this country. In 1980, the then Foreign Secretary made public his views about the programme "Death of a Princess". When expressing their view, the Government have consistently made it clear that final decisions on the content of programmes are entirely a matter for the broadcasting authorities.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister (1) what has been the total cost of Chequers in each of the past six years;

(2) how much has been spent by her office on foreign travel in each of the past six years;

(3) how much has been spent on No. 10 Downing street in each of the past six years in respect of (a) total running costs, (b) staffing, (c) repairs and maintenance, (d) decoration, (e) furniture and (f) rates.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend will reply to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

Commonwealth Conference

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent visit to the Bahamas.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend will reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Parliamentary Pensions Acts

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Attorney-General if he will institute preparatory steps necessary to facilitate consolidation of the Parliamentary Pensions Acts during the next Session of Parliament.

The Attorney-General: The programme for the consolidation of statutes is the responsibility of the Law Commission. It does not include this legislation at present but it is always open to hon. Members to suggest topics for consolidation to the commission.

Pahoomal Family

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General what representations the Director of Public Prosecutions has received for the extradition of members of the Pahoomal family; and, of these, which were received in 1982 and 1983.

The Solicitor-General: The City of London police submitted a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions in June 1983. He has received no other representations.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General if he will ask the Director of Public Prosecutions to reopen his consideration of the case of the Pahoomal family.

The Solicitor-General: Police inquiries are continuing and the case remains under active consideration by the director.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Best asked the Attorney-General if the investigation of possible offences in respect of the disappearance of the control room log of HMS Conqueror has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: I refer to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave to the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) on 30 November 1984. The Metropolitan police have now submitted their report on this matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who has concluded that the evidence available fails to show that any person committed a criminal offence in connection with the disappearance of the logs. He has also concluded that there is no reasonable prospect of further investigations producing any evidence of the commission of a criminal offence. I agree with both of these conclusions, and the police investigation has therefore been discontinued.

CIVIL SERVICE

Politicisation

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what recent representations he has received from Sir Douglas Wass on the desirability of having an independent body to investigate complaints by serving civil servants about alleged politicisation of the Civil Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I have received no representations from Sir Douglas Wass, but I have read his article in The Political Quarterly for July-September 1985.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

BBC and IBA (Competition)

Mr. Gorst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to seek to ensure that the arrangements made by the British Broadcasting Corporation and the Independent Broadcasting Authority or its contractors for the acquisition of film or other programme material are consistent with the Government's policy on competition; if he will refer these arrangements, with particular reference to the circumstances surrounding the purchase by Thames Television of the Dallas programme, to the Director General of Fair Trading for examination; and whether he will ask the Director General of Fair Trading to satisfy himself that there are no arrangements made by the British Broadcasting Corporation or Independent Television for the purchase of programme material that are in contravention of the provisions of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act.

Mr. Howard: The Director General of Fair Trading has statutory powers to initiate appropriate action under the competition legislation in respect of any arrangements that may exist between the British Broadcasting Corporation and the Independent Broadcasting Authority or independent television companies concerning the acquisition of film or other programme material.

The Director General has written to the British Broadcasting Corporation, the Independent Broadcasting Authority and the Independent Television Companies Association making inquiries in connection with the purchase of overseas television programmes. In reply, all three bodies have denied the existence of arrangements concerning the purchase of film or other programme material which might require registration under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976.

The Office of Fair Trading is now considering whether, in the light of these replies and other information available to it, further action is justified under the competition legislation.

Shipbuilding (Intervention Fund)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will indicate the level of intervention fund allowable on each vessel built in the United Kingdom following the European Economic Community 5th directive on shipbuilding.

Mr. Butcher: Shipbuilding Intervention Fund is a form of selective financial assistance and is paid at the minimum level necessary to secure individual contracts. As regards the general levels allowable,,I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) on 5 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone).

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money will be made available from the shipbuilding intervention fund to United Kingdom shipbuilders in the coming financial year.

Mr. Butcher: On present estimates £43 million will be made available in 1985-86 for grants under the Shipbuilding Intervention Fund in Great Britain, but the actual amount paid will depend on contracts secured.

Shipbuilding (Restructuring)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what extent the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry has complied with previous European Economic Community directives in respect of restructuring proposals; and what information he has regarding the extent to which other European Economic Community member states have also complied.

Mr. Butcher: The European Commission has been and continues to be satisfied that United Kingdom support for shipbuilding complies with the relevant EC directives. We have no access to the confidential information provided to the Commission by other member states in order to satisfy the Commission of their own compliance with these directives.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what commitments Her Majesty's Government have given to other European Community states with shipbuilding interests in relation to the further restructuring of the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry, with reference to the European Economic Community shipbuilding 5th directive.

Mr. Butcher: None. Discussions on restructuring are conducted with the Commission and not with other member states. We have explained to the Commission British Shipbuilders' current plans for privatisation of the warship yards and for regional reorganisation.

Soft Loans

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made by Her Majesty's Government in considering and introducing soft loans as an incentive to British exports since his statement in the House on 18 July.

Mr. Channon: We are considering ways in which the aid and trade provision might be used to support long-term low-interest loans, similar to those which many of our competitors offer to developing countries. We hope to reach our decisions soon.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those companies in the United Kingdom manufacturing flue gas desulphurisation equipment and the value of any export orders achieved over the last five years.

Mr. Channon: Manufacturers of flue gas desulphurisation equipment are not specifically identified in statistical inquiries and statistics on export orders for such equipment are not available. Among the firms who are known to have the capability of manufacturing such equipment are Babcock Power Ltd, Davy McKee, Foster Wheeler Power Products Ltd, Lodge Cottrell Ltd and NEI International Combustion Ltd. It is believed that a small number of overseas orders have been secured, the details of which would be confidential.

Safety of Goods

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to be in a position to implement the proposals contained in the White Paper on the safety of goods, concerning the free importation, distribution, and sale of goods that do not meet statutory safety regulations.

Mr. Howard: The Government are firmly committed to the proposals in the 'Safety of Goods' White Paper. We shall implement the proposals as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Consumer Protection

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received advocating a change in consumer protection legislation to safeguard retailers in regard to the quality of the products supplied to them by manufacturers as well as wholesalers, particularly for the licensed trade; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: A retailer's rights in dealing with manufacturers or wholesalers will be governed by the terms of his contract with them. In the absence of any specific terms in the contract to the contrary (and these terms would be subject to the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977) the provisions of the sale of goods legislation apply to these contracts as well as to contracts between a retailer and his customers.

Draught Beer

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received advocating an end to the practice of draught beer being supplied in containers as opposed to barrels with a minimum content mark on each; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Licensees' representatives have, from time to time, asked for legislation to require a statement of the measure of beer to accompany deliveries from breweries.

I believe that this is very much a practical problem to be resolved within the trade and I understand that brewers are continuing their efforts to reach an acceptable solution.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to satisfy himself of the adequacy of the current level of staffing in his Department for technical experts dealing with applications under COCOM regulations.

Mr. Channon: I am concerned that applications under the COCOM arrangements should be dealt with as quickly as possible, and I am keeping this matter under close review. The staff devoted to this work have recently been increased, and a further increase is in prospect.

Telecommunications Industry

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the maintenance of the competitive position of the United Kingdom domestic telecommunications industry through the use of import restraints and exports promotion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The United Kingdom industry is fully competitive in terms of price, performance and delivery. Protective measures will not improve the long-term position. However, some overseas markets are not open and we are giving full support to international efforts to reduce the barriers to free trade in telecommunications. Support for exports may also be given, according to the circumstances of each individual case.

Telephone Sales

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from members of the public regarding telephone selling techniques towards potential customers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: During the last three months my predecessor and I have received 10 complaints from the public about telephone selling, mainly from people who object in principle to being approached in this way.

The Director General of Fair Trading published a report on this subject in October 1984 and has been encouraging the trade to adopt a set of new guidelines for its promotional activities. British Telecom is including these guidelines in telephone directories. The trade associations with whom this has been discussed so far have agreed to follow these guidelines. I agree with the Director General that self regulation by the trade remains the appropriate course.

Companies (Research and Development)

Sir Peter Emery asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require companies to state in their balance sheets the amount of money that is spent by them on research and development.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans to do so at this stage. I will consider the position again following the review, by the Accounting Standards Committee of SSAP13, the accounting standard on research and development.

Overseas Contracts

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when, and in what manner, he published the revised arrangements for Government assistance to firms bidding for overseas contracts with a development content; what are the changes in procedure described as streamlining and in what manner they differ from the current practice; what financial estimates are, or will be, made from his Department in respect of the revised scheme; and what part officials from his Department will play in the determination of the distribution of the public expenditure concerned.

Mr. Channon: The guidance for applicants for support under the aid and trade provision will be revised to take into account modifications already agreed, such as the eligibility of China, and those under discussion, including the possibility of a soft loan facility. Procedures have been streamlined through changes in arrangements for interdepartmental scrutiny.

Funds for the aid and trade provision, which forms part of the aid programme, will be settled in the current public expenditure round. My Department will continue to handle applications from companies, preparing them for discussion with the Overseas Development Administration.

Tape Imports

Mr. Oakes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the implications of the introduction of a tape levy for the level of counterfeit tape imports, both of stamped or unstamped tapes.

Mr. Butcher: The decision whether or not to introduce a copyright levy on blank recording tape will take account of all relevant factors, including the question of counterfeit blank tape imports. We hope soon to publish our conclusions on the levy, and other matters of copyright reform, in a White Paper.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set up an inquiry into applications for export credit guarantees from customers of Johnson Matthey Bankers from 1981 to the present day.

Mr. Channon: No. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the House on 17 July, Johnson Matthey Bankers has requested the Commissioner of the City of London police to conduct a preliminary inquiry into certain accounts with the bank which are the subject of large losses. The Export Credits Guarantee Department will co-operate fully with the police in their inquiries.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the average error when monthly balance of trade figures are compared with the final outturn; and if there has been any statistical improvement in the accuracy of monthly balance of trade figures in the past decade.

Mr. Channon: The information is given in the table. The revisions result from changes in definition as well as the incorporation of later information. There has been no statistical improvement in the accuracy of the monthly figures over the last decade.

Polychlorinated Biphenyls

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by model, make and other identifying marks all the products currently manufactured in the United Kingdom which contain polychlorinated biphenyls and similar compounds; and if he will place a copy of this list in the Library.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Polychlorinated biphenyls have not been manufactured in the United Kingdom since 1977, and I have no knowledge of any current manufacture in this country of any products containing either polychlorinated biphenyls or polychlorinated terphenyls.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by model, make and other identifying marks all the products currently being imported into the United Kingdom which contain polychlorinated biphenyls and similar compounds; and if he will place a copy of this list in the Library.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Available statistical information does not identify products which contain polychlorinated terphenyls or polychlorinated biphenyls. Like the United Kingdom, many other countries have ceased production of polychlorinated biphenyls and polychlorinated terphenyls, or are in the process of doing so. Imports of products containing these substances are thought to be neglible.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the Alvey programme software engineering work has gone to the Ministry of Defence or defence-related projects.

Mr. Pattie: The Alvey Programme is expected to provide £40 million Government funds for about 85 projects in software engineering. In these Ministry of Defence participation is currently limited to the unfunded supervision of RSRE Malvern of one academic study costing £10,000. Discussions are also in progress on a possible small RSRE participation in one major project, the £5·5 million-ICL-STC-BGC-PRAXIS-University of Manchester IPSE 2·5 project to develop advanced software tools. No Alvey software project is specifically defence related: projects set out to tackle generic issues critically important to all software producers and users, defence or civil.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what agreements exist with the United States of America concerning military use of European Space Agency facilities and equipment;

(2) what uses have been made of European Space Agency facilities by military agencies in the United States of America;

(3) what uses are likely to be made of European Space Agency facilities by military agencies in the United States of America in the next two years.

Mr. Pattie: No such agreements exist. In any event ESA's convention limits the use of its facilities to peaceful purposes.

Private Sector Employers

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the top 50 United Kingdom private sector employers, showing in each case the number of employees employed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: Information on employment by individual United Kingdom private sector companies is collected by the Department under the Statistics for Trade Act 1947. The provisions of this Act prevent the Department from disclosing information on individual undertakings. Figures for employment in United Kingdom companies are published in The Times 1000 and in Key British Enterprises by Dunn and Bradstreet, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Capital Investment

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the annual rate of capital investment in (i) manufacturing and (ii) distribution and services for each year since 1970 at constant 1975 prices.

Mr. Butcher: Available information is given in the following table:

Industry's Capital Expenditure

	*£ million at 1980 prices
	Manufacturing Industry†	Distribution and Services Industries‡
1970	7,990	10,399
1971	7,292	11,012
1972	6,345	11,336

1974	7,431	12,045
1975	7,135	10,170
1976	6,838	10,208
1977	7,253	10,993
1978	7,904	11,744

1984	6,373	15,359

* As constant price series are currently expressed in terms of 1980 prices, information at 1975 prices is not readily available for recent years.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid and Trade

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the changes in the administrative arrangements to be made in the aid and trade provision in respect of expenditure in current Estimates; what changes he expects to be made in respect of the disbursement of these funds; what are the criteria for accepting any application on the basis of its developmental desirability; and in what form these criteria are publicly available.

Mr. Raison: Steps have been taken to streamline inter-departmental scrutiny of aid and trade provision proposals.

Consideration of a proposed new soft loan mechanism, including discussions with the financial community, is almost complete. Criteria for the use of aid and trade provision in support of particular projects are the same as those applicable to other aid-funded activities. This is set out in the "Guidance rules for British exporters applying for support from the Aid and Trade Provision", which will shortly be revised, and placed in the Library of the House.

Grenada

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement about the amount of aid given to the Government of Grenada since October 1983 and about pledges of future aid and conditions attached.

Mr. Raison: Figures for part-years are not available but disbursements of British bilateral aid to Grenada for 1983 and 1984 were £85,000 and £693,000 respectively. An interest-free loan of £5 million agreed in August 1985 has a 5-year grace period and is repayable over 15 years. It is tied 50 per cent. to British procurement. Grenada will also receive part of a regional grant of £4·5 million towards the cost of a coastguard shore facility at St Georges.

ENERGY

Wave Power

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will summarise the evidence on which he based his decision to cease to fund research into power production using ocean waves; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: It is unlikely that wave energy for large scale use in the United Kingdom will be cost effective since a detailed cost analysis by our consultants has concluded that there is only a low probability of any design achieving an energy cost below 9p/kwhr (1984 money values). It is therefore appropriate to round off our research in this field, although we will be receptive to any realistic new ideas which could lead to major cost reductions. The evidence is summarised in "Wave Energy" ETSU R26, which is in the Library of the House.

Experimental Boreholes

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy why Her Majesty's Government are ending funding for experimental boreholes for drilling for hot water at Southampton, Cleethorpes, Marchwood and Larne; and what conveniently available figures he has for the cost of capping and making safe the boreholes.

Mr. David Hunt: The research programme to which my Department has committed some £10 million over the past 9 years has shown that the United Kingdom geothermal aquifer resource is very limited in size and the prospects for its commercialisation are poor. I have therefore decided to discontinue work in this field. No decisions have yet been made on the existing boreholes at Southampton, Cleethorpes, Marchwood and Larne. Current estimates are that the cost of permanent capping and permanently making safe these boreholes would be £100,000 each.

Uranium

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the intended uses of depleted uranium exported by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. in each of the last three years.

Mr. Goodlad: I am informed by BNFL that, in the last three years, it has exported depleted uranium for the following uses:

(a) development work on nuclear fuel production;
(b) as samples to demonstrate the capabilities of BNFL technologies to potential customers;
(c) as radiation shielding;
(d) as colouring for ceramics and glazes;
(e) as an additive in the production of special steels;
(f) for use in research and development work;
(g) as isotopic reference standards.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what information he has as to the organisation and outcome of the monitoring and control by international organisations of which the United Kingdom is a member of the subsequent movements of consignments of depleted uranium exported by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. in each of the last three years;

(2) what representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government by the International Atomic Energy Agency about the subsequent destination of depleted uranium exported by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. to International Metals SA of Luxembourg and the implications of this incident for the operation of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom supplies information about depleted uranium movements to the safeguards authorities of Euratom and the IAEA. No representations have been made by either body to Her Majesty's Government about diverted material. In 1984 the safeguards system detected a shipment of depleted uranium from Luxembourg to Israel which was made without due notification. BNFL had previously exported depleted uranium to International Metals SA of Luxembourg under safeguards. The annual safeguards statements contained in the IAEA's Annual Reports up to 1984 show that with the one exception noted above, there were no anomalies in the shipments of depleted uranium monitored by the agency.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will issue a general direction to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority to prohibit the sale by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. of depleted uranium for export; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to permit the export of depleted uranium only if conditions are imposed requiring any subsequent disposal to be in accordance with the provisions of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding the purposes for which they authorise the export of depleted uranium; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Exports of nuclear materials are only authorised in accordance with the policy laid down by the then Foreign Secretary in 1976 [Vol. 980, c. 514-516]. All applications for licences to export depleted uranium are examined on a case by case basis in the light of this policy.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what have been the levels of exports of depleted uranium in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Export licences were approved in respect of applications to export depleted uranium from the United Kingdom in the years 1980 to 1984 as follows:

Year	Tonnes
1980	50
1981	60
1982	70
1983	30
1984	130

Energy Managers

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to the answer of 1 July, Official Report, column 35, what success he has had with his proposals to encourage the appointment of energy managers in both public and private sectors.

Mr. David Hunt: Membership of energy management groups has increased by 70 per cent. over the last 2 years, and is still growing.

Many private companies have appointed energy managers after attending ministerial briefings; we are at present conducting a survey to establish the facts. Most local authorities have now designated energy officers. In central Government, the Prime Minister has instructed every Department to appoint an energy manager.

Coal (Cost)

Mr. Ron Davis asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will outline by area the sulphur content, thermal content and cost per tonne of coal delivered to power stations operated by the South of Scotland Electricity Board and the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB advises that, on the basis of its latest evaluation, the sulphur content and thermal content per tonne of coal delivered to CEGB power stations from the various NCB sales areas and other suppliers is as follows:-

	CV (net giga joules per tonne)	Sulphur (percentage by weight)
Scotland	23·0	1·0
North Eastern	24·7	1·6
Yorkshire	23·2	1·7
North Midlands	22·9	1·5
South Midlands	22·0	1·7
Western	23·9	1·6
South Wales	25·2	1·2
CEGB Average	23·4	1·6

Information concerning power stations operated by the SSEB is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. However, I understand that the SSEB's advice to him is that the position in relation to their power stations is as follows:-

	CV (net giga joules per tonne)	Sulphur (percentage by weight)
SSEB	21·6	0·76

Delivered costs of coal are the subject of confidential agreements with CEGB and SSEB suppliers.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

Mr. Ron Davis asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement regarding the existing operation or introduction of flue gas desulphurisation techniques at each of Britain's oil refineries.

Mr. Goodlad: This is a matter for the Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate. I understand that flue gas desulphurisation is not appropriate to oil refineries because of the wide variability of fuels refined, including those from low sulphur crudes and gases. Desulphurisation does, however, take place as part of the refining process in the form of suphur recovery from refinery gas streams.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much his Department has spent on office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Goodlad: The figures are not available in the form requested. I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Hercules Aircraft

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the total cost and the amount of (a) fuel allocation in the current year for Hercules aircraft training and (b) fuel used and projected to be used by Hercules aircraft in Ethiopia until their withdrawal.

Mr. Lee: During the current financial year the fuel allocation for Hercules training is 35,400,000 litres. By the end of 1985 our aircraft in Ethiopia will have used some 13,000,000 litres of fuel. As to costs, it is not the practice to release such information, which is commercially confidential.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effects on Hercules aircraft training for military purposes of the use of Hercules aircraft in Ethiopia.

Mr. Lee: The deployment of the Hercules aircraft to Ethiopia has had some effect on the number if airframes and the total number of air transport flying hours available for other tasks. The effect on training in the circumstances has been considered acceptable.

Military Service

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give an estimate of the proportion of the population that has done any form of military service or training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is not available. Details of current strengths of regular, reserve and cadet forces are given in volume 2 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985, tables 4.2 to 4.6.

Salisbury Plain

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has any plans to extend its use of land on Salisbury plain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: There is a shortage of training land and our policy is to extend existing training areas when suitable land is offered for sale. We have recently acquired some 339 acres of land on Salisbury plain and are considering the acquisition of a further 114 acres.

Land Acquisition (Stainmore)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has any plans to acquire land in the Stainmore area of north Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The Ministry of Defence wishes to acquire 802 acres for dry training, ie without live firing. Eden district council has objected formally to the notice of proposed change of use, and we therefore expect to refer the matter to the Department of the Environment under the provisions of DOE circular 18/84, which covers development by Government Departments.

Royal Dockyards

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will state the specific criteria he intends to apply in deciding whether applicants, companies or consortia seeking to manage a dockyard are British companies;

(2) if he will make it his policy when seeking competitive tenders to manage the royal dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth to consider only companies where 90 per cent. or more of the shares are held by United Kingdom based individuals and institutions, or consortia where the constituent parties' shareholdings are so held; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: In his statement on 17 April at col. 261 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said that the dockyards would remain under British control after the introduction of commercial management. The land and fixed assets will remain in the ownership of the Crown. Any particular safeguards in connection with the dockyard undertaking, which might be included in the contract, are the subject of continuing study within my Department.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the numbers who will be made redundant at (a) Rosyth and (b) Plymouth in advance of a transfer of responsibility to a private operation, beyond those already announced in April.

Mr. Lee: There has been no change to the plans announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 17 April at col. 261 for a range of efficiency measures involving job reductions of about 2,000 at Devonport dockyard and 400 at Rosyth dockyard.

It remains the Government's hope that the reductions will be achieved to the greatest extent possible through natural wastage and voluntary methods. At Rosyth dockyard it is anticipated that all the job reductions will be achieved through natural wastage.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average redundancy payment to dockyard workers paid in 1984-85 and 1985-86 to date.

Mr. Lee: These figures are not held centrally and could only be calculated at disproportionate cost. As an example, however, a dockyard craftsman aged 50 with 32 years service would be entitled to between £12,600 and £16,700 in redundancy payments. A non-craft worker (Pay Band 8) of similar age and with similar service would be entitled to between £10,500 and £14,000. These sums would obviously be less for younger employees or for those with fewer years of service.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy for voluntary redundancies at Rosyth dockyard and in the light of the dismissal notices recently sent to 36 engineering apprentices.

Mr. Lee: It remains the Government's hope that the job reductions at Rosyth dockyard will be achieved through natural wastage and voluntary redundancy. Following an agreement between management and trades unions on a flexible approach to the deployment of the apprentices in skilled jobs throughout Rosyth dockyard, the 36 mechanical fitters referred to in the question who completed their training this summer were offered permanent employment in the Dockyard.

Defence Industries

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to maintain employment in the defence industries.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Employment levels in the defence industries depend on the success of individual firms in winning orders for the MOD and overseas customers.

Multi-launch Rocket System

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Defence what is the latest position regarding production of the multi-launch rocket system project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The situation remains broadly as described in the reply of my predecessor, the right hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Butler) on 22 May at columns 424-5. We expect that the intergovernmental memorandum of understanding for European production of MLRS phase I will be signed in November. Meanwhile, negotiations are continuing, with the aim of Germany, the pilot nation, awarding a production contract on behalf of the European partners by the end of the year.

Land-Air Operations

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the relationship between recent changes in British and Allied operational style initiated by the Commander in Chief, Northern Army Group, General Bagnell, and the United States Army airland battle doctrine;

(2) what is the relationship between the changes in style of operations of British and Allied forces recently initiated by the Commander in Chief, Northern Army Group, General Bagnell and the follow on force attack strategy.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Lady to the replies I gave her on 30 November 1984 at columns 595-6.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the extent to which the changes in style of operations of British and Allied forces initiated by the Commander in Chief, Northern Army Group, General Bagnell, have been implemented along the lines indicated in General Bagnell's article in the September 1984 edition of the Royal United Services Institute Journal, relating to concepts of land-air operations in the central region.

Mr. Stanley: British Forces Germany are deployed in support of the agreed NATO strategy of flexible response and forward defence. Within that overall strategy, a revised concept of operations for NATO's nothern army group has now been agreed, which places increased emphasis on the selection and defence of vital areas, tactical flexibibity, the employment of reserve formations and co-operation between ground and air forces.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the use of nuclear weapons in space as a component of the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The United Kingdom is a party to the partial test ban treaty, which prohibits nuclear explosions in space, and the outer space treaty of 1967, which prohibits the stationing in space of nuclear weapons; so is the United States. The United States has stated that the strategic defence initiative research programme is being conducted in a manner fully consistent with existing United States treaty commitments.

HMS Antrim

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the price and terms of the deal for which the Admiralante Cochrane, formerly HMS Antrim, was sold to Chile.

Mr. Lee: It has not been the practice of this Government or previous Administrations to reveal details of individual sales.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department has spent on office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Until the introduction of the property repayment services arrangements on 1 April 1983 all Civil Estate expenditure of this kind was funded by the Property Services Agency. In the case of Ministry of Defence headquarters buildings expenditure on furniture and furnishings which has been met from Defence Votes in the last two financial years is as follows:

1984-85	3,411,000

The Property Services Agency does not differentiate in its charges between internal decoration and other forms of maintenance.

TRANSPORT

Road Safety

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will summarise his response to the Transport Committee's road safety report and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government believe that the Committee's report provides a valuable analysis and range of suggestions for improving road safety. They agree that, despite a significant drop in the number and severity of casualties in recent years, there is still scope for further reductions. They share the Committee's view that the wider application of low cost engineering measures; an effective programme of education, training and publicity; and the further development of vehicle safety measures can all make a major contribution to the prevention of accidents or reduction in their severity. Continued research, particularly into road user bahaviour, is also needed to highlight the behavioural aspects of accident causation.

The Government's response considers each of the 43 detailed recommendations in turn. It is in general agreement with a large number of them, while others will be carefully studied in the context of the Government's own current review of road safety policy. The Government have, however, rejected the Committee's recommendations that the length of the driving test should be increased, that the motorway speed limit should be increased to 80 mph for a trial period, and that the scope of the MOT test should be extended.

The Government's full response is available in the Library.

Manchester-Blackpool Rail Link

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has met representatives from Lancashire county council and Greater Manchester council to consider their proposals for electrification of the Manchester to Blackpool line; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: On 28 June I agreed to a meeting with representatives of Lancashire and Greater Manchester councils but suggested that my Department should first receive a written statement about the wider benefits of the scheme. A meeting with officials took place on 18 July, at which the county councils agreed to supply further information. This information was received by my Department on 14 October, and I now expect to meet representatives of the two councils shortly.

Wellan Green Railway Station

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the proposal to build a new railway station at Wellan green; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am not aware of any reason to raise this issue with the chairman at the moment; I understand that British Rail (Eastern Region) has applied to Hertfordshire county council for planning permission to build a new station at Wellan Green.

Transport Spending

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of total transport spending by local authorities was allocated to (a) public transport and (b) roads in 1964, 1970 and each of the last 12 years.

Mr. Ridley: This information is only available for 1973-74 onwards. The proportions of gross expenditure are:

	Public transport	Roads
1973-74	29	71
1974-75	44	56
1975-76	46	54
1976-77	48	52
1977-78	51	49
1978-79	49	51
1979-80	48	52
1980-81	48	52
1981-82	49	51
1982-83	49	51
1983-84	49	51
1984-85	48	52

These include all expenditure by local authority owned public transport undertakings and car-parks, a large proportion of which is financed by revenue from fares and charges. The proportions of expenditure net of fare-box revenue and parking charges are:

	Public transport	Roads
1973-74	20	80
1974-75	31	69
1975-76	35	65
1976-77	36	64
1977-78	36	64
1978-79	36	64
1979-80	36	64
1980-81	36	64
1981-82	38	62
1982-83	40	60
1983-84	40	60
1984-85	39	61

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of transport spending was used on (a) public transport and (b) roads in each local authority area for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Ridley: Figures for total spending on transport, which include that by the central Government and British Rail (and consumer spending), are not available for each local authority area.

British Rail (Wales)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people are currently employed by British Rail in Wales and what has been the figure for each of the past five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that British Rail does not maintain a separate record of the number of staff employed in Wales.

Road Planning

Sir Peter Emery asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has for extending the dual cariageway for the M3-A303 from Thruxton to Exeter and on what dates these plans are to be finalised.

Mrs. Chalker: Our report "National Roads England 1985", published last June, gives details of the proposed improvements on the A303-A30 between Thruxton and Exeter, together with their approximate start dates. The details are as follows:

	Approximate Start Date
A303 Thruxton-Amesbury	Spring 1986
A303 Furze hedge improvement	Spring 1986
A303 Mere-Wincanton	April 1987-March 1989
A303 Sparkford bypass	April 1987-March 1989
A303 Ilchester-South Petherton	April 1987-March 1989
A303 South Petherton-Broadway (Ilminster bypass)	Summer 1986

	Approximate Start Date
A303-A30 Marsh-Honiton improvement	April 1989 onwards
A30 Honiton-Exeter improvement	April 1989 onwards

Dual carriageways will be provided wherever this is justified by present and predicted traffic usage.

Studies are in hand to determine what needs to be done to the remaining sections of the route between these planned improvements.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department has spent on office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Ridley: Prior to 1983-84 Departments were not charged separately for office furniture, curtains and carpets, nor for maintenance work undertaken by PSA on their estates.

For 1983-84 and 1984-85 the information for my Department is as follows:

	Supplies items	Office decoration
1983-84	*718,529	†
1984-85	*1,499,675	†

Notes:

*Expenditure on supplies, which includes office furniture, curtains and carpets, is not separately itemised.

†It is not possible to separate the cost of office decoration from other maintenance work.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what implications does the development proposal for the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone have for the docklands light railway.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that the consortium which has expressed interest in the development of the Canary wharf site has proposed an extension of the Docklands light railway to the Bank which would be financed by private capital. It is too early to know whether this proposition will proceed or to make an assessment of its implications for the Docklands light railway.

Isle of Dogs

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations his Department has held in relation to the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Telephones

Mr. Skinner asked the Lord Privy Seal what is the number of new telephones installed throughout the Houses of Parliament and adjoining parliamentary office buildings.

Mr. Biffen: 3,141.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General if he has now determined the role of community programme work on football league grounds following the publication of the interim report from Mr. Justice Popplewell, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Discussions are currently taking place between officials of my Department and those of the Department of the Environment and the Manpower Services Commission to identify areas where the community programme might usefully have a role. Any proposal would need to be discussed with the appropriate football bodies.

Gas Safety

Mr. Skinner asked the Paymaster General how many prosecutions for contraventions of the gas safety regulations have been undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark Five prosecutions for contraventions of the gas safety regulations had been taken by the Health and Safety Executive up to 10 October 1985.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Pendry asked the Paymaster General what was the number of men and women aged under 25 years registered as unemployed in Stalybridge and Hyde at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 11 July 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available, there were 1,389 male and 774 female unemployed claimants under 25 years of age in the parliamentary constituency of Stalybridge and Hyde.

Mr. Deakins asked the Paymaster General if the definition of productivity in use in his Department makes any distinction between a firm achieving higher output with an unchanged labour force and a firm maintaining output with a reduced labour force and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The national estimates of productivity are made using the most suitable information available on output and employment. The data for each component is to a large extent collected separately and estimates are prepared independently. It is therefore not possible to provide national estimates of productivity which distinguish between those improvements for firms which arise entirely from increases in output and those which have come about solely because of reductions in labour.

The employed labour force is estimated to have increased by nearly 3 per cent. between the first quarter of 1983 and the second quarter of 1985; at the same time output rose by 8 per cent. and hence productivity for the whole economy increased by 5 per cent.

Mr. Deakins asked the Paymaster General which industrial sectors have lost (a) more than 30 per cent. and (b) more than 20 per cent., respectively, of total numbers employed in May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following tables list those industries in Great Britain which have shown the specified net decreases in numbers of employees in employment between June 1979 (figures are not available for May) and June 1985, the latest date for which figures are available.

Table 1

Industries in which there has been a net decrease in employees in employment of more than 30 per cent. between June 1979 and June 1985 (1980 Standard Industrial Classification)

Metal manufacturing (class 22)
Production of man-made fibres (class 26)
Manufacture of motor vehicles and parts thereof (class 35)
Textile industry (class 43)
Manufacture of leather and leather goods (class 44)
Footwear and clothing industries (class 45)
Other manufacturing industries (class 49)
Sea transport (class 74)

Table 2

Industries in which there has been a net decrease in employees in employment of more than 20 per cent. between June 1979 and June 1985 (1980 Standard Industrial Classification)*

Coal extraction and manufacture of solid fuels (class 11)
Mineral oil processing (class 14)
Manufacture of non-metallic mineral products (class 24)

* Additional to those in table 1.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Paymaster General how many persons were registered as unemployed, or in receipt of unemployment benefit, in each of his Department's offices in Greater London in May 1979 and the most recent convenient date for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: This information is available in the library. I am sending a copy of a computer print showing the requested information for registered unemployed at jobcentres at May 1979, for unemployed claimants in each jobcentre area at August 1985, and for October 1982 on both bases. Comparisons are affected by the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982, and by the 1983 Budget provisions which meant that some men, mainly aged 60 years and over, no longer needed to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits.

Unemployment statistics are no longer produced for jobcentre areas, and from September 1985 are only available for areas defined in terms of local authority electoral wards.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Ashby asked the Paymaster General (1) how many claimants of unemployment benefit who were offered work which they declined and were then refused benefits for six weeks thereafter recommenced receiving benefit during 1984; and what was the average length of time for which they remained in receipt of unemployment benefit;

(2) what information he has as to how many claimants of unemployment and/or supplementary benefit who were offered work which they refused continued to receive benefit for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

In 1983, the last year for which figures are available, the independent adjudicating authorities considered 5,021 cases of unemployment benefit claimants refusing offers of apparently suitable employment (Social Security Act 1975, section 20(1)). 1,450 were disqualified and 3,571 not disqualified from receiving benefit.

Mr. Ashby asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to the number of people currently claiming unemployment or supplementary benefit, or both, within the following occupational categories: farm labourers, forestry workers, artists and sculptors, performing visual and audio arts, literary occupations, construction labourers, painting and decorating and merchant seamen as deckworkers and as engineers.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information about the occupations of unemployed benefit claimants is not readily available and can only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ashby asked the Paymaster General how many current claimants of unemployment or supplementary benefit, or both, are not registered at a jobcentre.

Mr. Alan Clarke: This information is not available. While statistics of those registered at jobcentres are available, it is not known how many are claimants of unemployment or supplementary benefit. Those registered at jobcentres also include people seeking a change of employment, and unemployed people not claiming benefit. Also many jobseekers make use of the self service facilities at jobcentres but do not register.

New Businesses

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Paymaster General (1) what has been the net increase in the numbers of self-employed in both Amber Valley and Derbyshire since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981;

(2) what has been the total change in the number of self-employed in both Amber Valley and Derbyshire since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981.

Mr. Allan Clark: Information at the level of detail requested is only available from the census of population. Between census years, information on the number of self employed comes from sample surveys which do not provide estimates for geographical areas smaller than regions or metropolitan counties.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Paymaster General (1) what has been the total increase in the number of new businesses in Amber Valley and Derbyshire since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981;

(2) what has been the net change in the number of new businesses in both Amber Valley and Derbyshire since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981.

Mr. Trippier: The number of new businesses registered in Derbyshire between the end of 1979 and the end of 1983 was 8,764. The net increase in businesses was 1,819.

Information for other dates is not readily available and nor is information in respect of Amber Valley. Information relating to business starts and stops by county was published in British Business on 18 January 1985 and a copy has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Paymaster General what has been the change in the number of self-employed since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is estimated that there was an increase of 717,000 in the number of self-employed between June 1979 and June 1985, the latest date for which figures are available. The estimate for June 1985 is provisional.

Sex Discrimination

Ms. Richardson asked the Paymaster General what policy he is adopting in response to the sex discrimination tribunal ruling against the eligibility requirements for entrants to community programme schemes.

Mr. Alan Clark: An appeal against the industrial tribunal decision in this case has been lodged with the employment appeal tribunal.

The Government will continue to direct provision at those most in need of the opportunities that the community programme provides.

Ms. Richardson asked the Paymaster General what policy he is adopting in response to the European Economic Community sex discrimination ruling against United Kingdom retirement ages for women and men.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The European Court of Justice has not yet ruled out the question of different retirement ages for men and women. The Advocate General's opinion delivered on 18 September in the case of Marshall v S W Hampshire Area Health Authority is not the final judgment of the court. We will study the implications of the judgment when we receive it.

Ms. Richardson asked the Paymaster General how many workers have ceased to fall within the scope of the wages councils and the Wages Inspectorate as a result of the exclusion of those between the ages of 16 and 21 years, how many of these are women, and what proportion women represent of the total number.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None. It is estimated that half a million people under 21 now subject to wages council regulation will cease to be so under the Government's proposed reforms. Approximately 350,000 of these are female, representing about two-thirds of the total workforce under 21 within scope of wages councils.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Paymaster General how much the Department of Employment has spent on (a) office furniture, (b) carpets and curtains and (c) office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No information is available to the Department prior to April 1983. For 1983-84 and 1984-85 expenditure with the Crown Suppliers in respect of all furniture and office supplies was £5·1 million and £4·6 million respectively. The bulk of the expenditure on office decorating is met by the Property Services Agency and details of the amount spent on Department of Employment accommodation is not available excpet at disproportionate cost.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General when, and to what level, he intends to raise the allowance paid to trainees on the youth training scheme.

Mr. Trippier: The allowance for trainees on the youth training scheme was increased on 1 September this year to £27.30 per week, and this will be the rate for first year trainees after the introduction of our new two-year scheme in April next year; the allowance for trainees in their second year will be £35 per week.

Wages Councils

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General how many prosecutions there have been over the last six years against employers in the west midlands who have broken wages councils' agreements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: One employer in the west midlands division of the wages inspectorate has been successfully prosecuted for an offence under wages council legislation since 1979.

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General how many inspectors are employed to enforce wages councils' agreements in the west midlands.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Eleven wages inspectors are employed in the west midlands division of the wages inspectorate.

Employment (Discrimination)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Paymaster General what steps the Government is taking to combat discrimination against lesbians and homosexual men in employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Violent Crime

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest figures available for the incidence of violent crime, giving the percentage increase in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Information relating to crime and criminal proceedings is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". Table 2.1 in the latest volume, Cmnd. 9621, gives the percentage annual increase in the number of violent and other offences recorded in the period 1974 to 1984. The figures show that in the last five years violent crime has continued to increase, though the increase has been less marked than in the preceding five years.

Rape Victims

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of the Metropolitan police with regard to the practice of ensuring that alleged rape victims obtain priority appointments with venereal disease clinics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Metropolitan police have made arrangements with the agreement of the appropriate health authorities, with a number of hospitals with specialist clinics to enable victims of rape and other serious sexual assaults to receive priority appointments if they so wish. It is the police's policy to offer such appointments to all victims of serious sexual assaults.

Prevention of Terrorism

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information is given to individuals held at ports of entry for examination under article 4(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Supplemental Temporary Provisions) Order 1984, about their rights to (a) see a lawyer, (b) have a reasonable named person informed of their whereabouts and (c) silence.

Mr. Waddington: Article 4(1) relates to those examined, as they pass through ports. In the vast majority of such cases, the examination takes no more than a minute or two and no special notice on the matters referred to is given. Those few for whom the initial process of examination takes longer than one hour are given a notice of rights under section 62 of the Criminal Law Act 1977. Persons formally detained under article 9 for further examination under article 4(2) are given the same notice of rights as a person held in police custody under any other legislation. The form of information given in either case will be reviewed to comply with the provision of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training and instructions have been given to immigration and customs personnel concerning the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1984 in relation to international terrorism.

Mr. Waddington: The enforcement of the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 is principally for the police. As part of their training Immigration Officers (and customs officers employed as immigration officers under the Immigration Act 1971) are made aware of their powers of examination under the 1984 Act have have instructions to bring to the attention of the police any matter which might involve international terrorism.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have been successfully contacted since 1974 in connection with the three yearly reviews of exclusion orders under the Prevention of Terrorism Act; in how many cases personal interviews have been carried out; what is the criteria for deciding whether a personal interview should be offered; and whether the information taken into account by the Secretary of State in connection with a review is always related to the three years immediately before the review.

Mr. Hurd: Ninety-five persons against whom exclusion orders were made before the passing of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1984 have responded to invitations to have their cases reviewed under the 3-year procedure, which has been in operation since 1979. It is for the police, who provide me with up-to-date reports on each case, to decide whether or not they wish to interview a review applicant. Fifty-five persons have been invited to attend such an interview and 45 have in fact attended. My decision in any case is based on all the relevant information available to me, although particular attention is paid to information, or lack of it, about involvement in terrorism within the last three years. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has his own procedures for reviewing exclusion orders that he or his predecessors have made.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of the recommended text of the notice of prisoners' rights given to individuals in police custody and a copy of the recommended text given to individuals held under the Prevention of Terrorism Act.

Mr. Hurd: A copy of the notice to prisoners has been placed in the Library. Persons detained under the prevention of terrorism legislation are given the same notice as persons detained under other legislation.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place a copy of the report of the Home Office working group on port units, issued in February 1985 by the Inspectorate of Constabularies, in the Library; and what measures are being considered in the light of the report with regard to passenger control and examination or detention of travellers under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act.

Mr. Hurd: The report by Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary on the work of the police in operating port controls under the prevention of terrorism legislation deals with security arrangements and is not suitable for publication. In the light of its conclusions on the use made of landing and embarkation cards my right hon. and learned Friend the then Home Secretary has decided that a selective use of the cards is to be preferred. Other recommendations are still being considered.

Alcoholic Liquor Licences

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received advocating a relaxation in the standards required of persons applying for a licence to retail alcoholic liquor, particularly with regard to off-licence holders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations. The licensing justices must be satisfied that an applicant for a liquor licence is a fit and proper person to hold a licence, and we have no plans to relax that requirement.

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department issues guidelines to licensing magistrates regarding the criteria for the granting of on and off licences for the sale of alcoholic beverages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No such guidelines are issued, nor would they be appropriate; subject to the matters on which the law requires the justices to be satisfied, the grant of an on or off licence is wholly within their discretion.

Alcohol (Retail Sales)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received advocating legislation to impose stricter controls over the supply of alcohol by large chain stores and supermarkets and the methods and means by which alcoholic beverages are displayed and marketed by such outlets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations in recent months and has no present plans to amend the licensing law on the lines described.

Council of Europe Convention on Pet Animals

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the Council of Europe convention on pet animals.

Mr. Mellor: The Government welcome the continuing work in the Council of Europe on issues of animal welfare in general; they are maintaining a close interest in the current preparation of a draft convention for the protection of pet animals.

Litter

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions were brought in each of the last five years for the offence of dropping litter in (a) England and Wales, and *(b)*Basildon.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me on proceedings in magistrates' courts in England and Wales for offences under the Litter Acts, which may be incomplete, is published annually in Table S.1.1(a)(iii) of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Vol. 1." Data are not collected centrally for Basildon alone, but for the whole of the Billericay petty sessional division where 5 prosecutions were recorded in 1981, 3 in 1982, 2 in 1983 and 5 in 1984.

Animals (Illegal Imports)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people smuggling animals into the United Kingdom were stopped at ports of entry and charged in each of the past five years and in the current year to date;

(2) in respect of people stopped whilst illegally bringing animals into the United Kingdom, how many animals in each of the past five years were found to be suffering from diseases.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, relates to the results of court proceedings in England and Wales for offences against the Animal Health Act 1981 (which replaced the Diseases of Animals Act 1950 in July 1981) and against the Rabies (Importation of Dogs, Cats and Other Mammals) Order 1974. The former is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Volume 1" (Table A1.1(A) under offence classification 110); the latter is shown in the table below.

However, I understand from my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who has responsibility for the health aspect of the importation of animals (including birds) into the United Kingdom under the Animal Health Act 1981, that the number of prosecutions taken under this Act for offences of illegal landings at ports of entry during each of the years 1980 to 1984 were, respectively, 96, 90, 96, 132 and 82 and that none of the animals landed illegally under the Animal Health Act 1981 (which may be directed to quarantine, re-exported or destroyed) and directed to quarantine were found to be infected with diseases for which his Department would invoke powers of destruction.

Following is the information:

Murder Statistics

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the number of convictions for murder of persons under the age of 15 years in each year since 1979.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of offences of homicide of those aged under 16 years is published for the last 11 years in table 4.6 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1984" (Cmnd. 9621). For victims aged under 15, the number of such offences is related to the number of convictions for murder in the table below which gives figures from 1982; provision of corresponding details for earlier years would involve disproportionate cost.

Offences Against Young Persons

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the number of convictions for sexual and other violent offences by adults against persons under the age of 15 years in each year since 1979.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is brought together in the following table. For other types of offences of violence and sexual offences the information collected centrally does not distinguish the age of the victim. Information on those offences marked with an asterisk is published annually in "Criminal Statistics England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Volume 4" (Tables S 4.1(A) and S 4.1(B) for 1984) which also includes information on cautions for these offences. (Tables S 4.1(C) and S 4.1(D)).

Fighting Dogs

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to ban the importation of fighting dogs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. We do not consider that such a ban would be effective in preventing illegal fighting, given the number of dogs already in the United Kingdom which are susceptible to such abuse, and the difficulty of distinguishing between dogs bred for fighting and those intended as pets.

Police Officers (Code of Conduct)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has advised chief constables to adopt the code of conduct for police officers as advocated and published by Sir Kenneth Newman, Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis sent copies of the handbook of "The Principles of Policing and Guidance for Professional Behaviour" to all other forces when it was published on 2 April. It is for chief constables to decide whether or not to use it in their own forces. The then Home Secretary made clear his high regard for the handbook, during the debate on the policing of the metropolis on 28 June; that view is shared by his successor.

Metropolitan Police (Ethnic Membership)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the Metropolitan police stationed in J district are from the ethnic minorities; and what are their ranks.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 11 October there were nine officers from ethnic minorities serving in 'J' District: two sergeants and seven constables.

Dog Fights

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute an inquiry into the incidence of dog fights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The organised fighting of animals is illegal under the Protection of Animals Act 1911. The investigation of these offences is not the direct responsibility of the Department, but my right hon. Friend is aware of a number recent cases in which successful prosecutions have been brought. We have no present plans for an inquiry, but we are keeping the matter under review.

Racial Attacks

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations were made to him on 26 September by the high commissioner of Bangladesh and the ambassador of Pakistan regarding racial attacks; what reply he gave; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The ambassador and the high commissioner expressed concern at recent incidents which had raised questions about the safety in this country of people of Asian origin. The persistence of apparently racially motivated attacks on Asians, and the loss of Asian life and property during the disturbances of Handsworth, were issues of particular anxiety. The deputation handed to my right hon. Friend a dossier on 70 racial attacks which had occurred since the beginning of 1984 about which he has sought advice from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the chief constables in whose areas the attacks took place.

My right hon. Friend made it clear that he shared their concern; he expressed his abhorrence at the injury and distress which these incidents cause; and he explained that the problem of racial attacks was high on the agenda of the Association of Chief Police Officers and that the issue would be discussed at the meeting of the Advisory Council on Race Relations on 1 October. My right hon. Friend also emphasised the Government's determination to ensure that everyone for whom the United Kingdom was now their home should have the fundamental right to live peacefully free from attack or harassment.

Scarman Report

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state which of the recommendations of the Scarman report which he did not accept or implement he is now re-considering in the light of recent events in inner-city areas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The police have re-examined almost every area of their activities in the light of Lord Scarman's report. All of his recommendations on policing have been implemented, half of them in full, and the rest in different degrees depending on resources, further consultation and action still being taken. The Government also continue to attach high priority to relieving the social needs of the inner cities.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the addresses and telephone numbers of all the offices of the Commission for Racial Equality in Wales.

Mr. Waddington: The Commission for Racial Equality has no offices in Wales.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the members of the Commission for Racial Equality, together with the date of their appointments and the duration of their period of office, indicating which were appointed as having a particular knowledge of circumstances in Wales.

Mr. Waddington: The present membership of the Commission for Racial Equality is as follows:

	Date of original appointment	Date of expiry of appointment
Mr. Peter Newsam (Chairman)	1 September 1982	31 August 1987
Mr. Clifton Robinson, CBE JP (Deputy Chairman)	28 April 1977	31 October 1985
Mr. Lincoln Crawford	1 May 1984	30 April 1986
Mrs. Shreela Flather JP	29 April 1980	30 April 86
Mr. Alan Gayton JP	1 May 1982	30 April 1986
Mr. Kenneth Gill	16 February 1981	30 April 1987
Dr. Farrukh Hashmi, OBE, MP BS, DPM, FRC, Psych	29 April 1980	30 April 1986
Miss Ethel Houston, OBE, LLB, MA	1 May 1984	30 April 1986
Mr. E. Gilmour Jones	1 May 1984	30 April 1986
Mrs. Lily Khan	1 May 1984	30 April 1986
Mr. William Morris	28 April 1984	30 April 1987
Professor Bhiku Parekh	1 May 1984	30 April 1986
Mr. Gurcharan Singh Sarang	1 May 1984	30 April 1986
Mr. Gerald Tyler	1 May 1982	30 April 1986
Mr. Keith Whitesides, JP, M Phil, LLB	1 June 1984	31 May 1986

Commissioners are chosen for their personal qualities and for their general knowledge and experience of the areas covered by race relations legislation. Mrs. Flather is the commissioner with special responsibility for the commission's affairs in Wales.

Metropolitan Police (Equipment)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what policy he is adopting towards requests to equip women and men serving in the Metropolitan police force with martial arts batons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that a number of new truncheons have been evaluated by the force but that none as yet has been selected as suitable for operational use. The Home Secretary's agreement to the issue of a new truncheon has therefore not been sought.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the special equipment for riot control currently available to the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The special equipment currently available to the Metropolitan police consists of long shields, round shields, NATO helmets, flame-proof overalls, protective grilles for vehicles, and CS smoke and baton rounds.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new equipment for riot control is currently being evaluated by the Metropolitan police force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Metropolitan police are considering a radio communications link for helmets, tape-recorders in helmets (for evidence-gathering), personal kit bags for riot equipment, breastplates for women officers, shin protectors, protective boots, first aid packs and long batons.

Women (Prosecutions)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women have been prosecuted for (a) social security fraud, (b) non-payment of debt and (c) non-payment of fines imposed on sentencing for these offences; of these how many in each category have received custodial sentences; what proportion women represent of the total number of prosecutions in each category; and what proportion custodial sentences on women represent in each of the above categories, in each case for each of the latest available three years.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Volume 1", (in Table S1.1(A) under offence classification 151). To obtain information on persons received into prison for defaulting on a payment of a fine imposed for a social security offence would involve disproportionate cost.

Drug Offences

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, of those persons in Wales convicted of (a) all drug-related offences and (b) offences related to the use of heroin or its derivatives, how many were unemployed for each year from 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Metropolitan Police (CS Gas and Plastic Bullets)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training procedures are currently undertaken by the Metropolitan police in the use of CS gas and plastic bullets.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The training is designed to ensure that officers are familiar with the guidelines on the use of CS and baton rounds and with the technical characteristics of the approved equipment. They regularly undertake refresher training.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many and which occasions in the last 12 months CS gas and plastic bullets have been drawn for use by the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis gave authority for the operational use of plastic baton rounds in Tottenham on 6 October, but they were not used. This is the only occasion to date on which such authority has been given in Great Britain. Authority for the operational use of CS gas for public order purposes has never yet been given in the Metropolitan police district.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he was consulted before the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis placed Londoners on notice that he would not hesitate to use CS gas and plastic bullets.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend was informed that the commissioner had given authority for CS and baton rounds to be used in Tottenham on 6 October, in accordance with the guidelines issued in September 1981. He was consulted and gave his support to the Commissioner in making it clear the following day that CS or baton rounds may have to be used as a last resort, when conventional methods of policing have been tried and failed, or are unlikely to succeed if tried, and when such action is necessary because of the risk of loss of life or serious injury or widespread destruction of property.

Metropolitan Police (Troop Support)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any plans exist for the deployment of troops in support of the Metropolitan police during civilian disorders.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Water Cannon (Crowd Control)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any discussions have taken place with the London fire brigade on the use of water cannon for crowd control.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if consideration is being given to the use of water cannon for riot control.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes, although the disadvantages are well known, and it is not thought that they would have been of any use in the Tottenham riot.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department has spent on (a) office furniture, (b) carpets and curtains and (c) office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hurd: Before 1 April 1983, the Department's office accommodation was provided as an allied service and the costs were borne by the Property Services Agency (PSA) of the Department of the Environment. Almost all decorating continues to be arranged by the PSA as part of its responsibility for maintaining the civil estate. Departments fund the PSA for this and other works services by the payment of an annual accommodation charge for each of its occupations; decorating costs are not separately identified.

The amounts spent by the Department in 1983-84 and 1984-85 on office furniture, carpets and curtains (and other associated services such as porterage) were £699,341 and £1,509,815 respectively. A further breakdown of these figures could not be provided except at disproportionate cost. These figures do not include the offices element of expenditure at prisons and other specialised Home Office outstations, separate information about which is not readily available.

Metropolitan Police (Firearms Injuries)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Office how many Metropolitan police officers have suffered injury from the use of firearms in each of the past six years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is as follows:

	Injured	Killed
1980	5	0
1984	6	1

Figures for 1985 are not yet available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civilians have received injuries from firearms used by the Metropolitan police in each of the last six years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information required is as follows:

	Number
1980	2
1981	1
1982	3
1983	1
1984	3
1985—to date	2
Total	12

None of the injuries was fatal.

Metropolitan Police (Firearms Training)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Metropolitan police officers are currently trained in the use of firearms; and what was the figure for each of the past six years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of officers whose training is maintained at a level allowing them to be armed varies during each year. The available information, recording the number of qualified officers at a particular date each year, is as follows:

	Number
December 1980	4,133
December 1981	4,181
October 1982	4,476
March 1983	4,667
October 1984	4,631
April 1985	4,631
September 1985	3,973

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to visit Liverpool to meet ethnic community leaders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Toxteth (Disturbances)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent civil disturbances in Toxteth, Liverpool.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Merseyside that during the afternoon of 1 October four men appeared at Liverpool City magistrates' court charged with offences of affray following incidents at the Toxteth carnival on 10 August. They were remanded in custody at Risley remand centre. The public gallery was packed. After the proceedings had been completed, a hammer was thrown through the window of Hope street police station. The crowd dispersed in the direction of Toxteth and there followed sporadic outbreaks of disorder all confined within a triangle of 300 yards. A small number of vehicles were commandeered and set on fire and the police were stoned. Up to 400 youths were involved in the violence and the police deployed a substantial number of officers in riot gear. The Bishop and Archbishop of Liverpool called a meeting at the neighbourhood law centre in an attempt to ease the tension. Sporadic incidents of disorder continued to take place in the late evening and a small fire was started at premises in Granby street. This was quickly extinguished. By 2 am there remained a hard core of around 50-100 youths throwing stones but they were eventually dispersed. Four police officers sustained injuries (one was detained in hospital) and 10 injuries to members of the public were reported. A total of 17 people have been charged with offences arising out of these incidents.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Board and Lodging

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now publish in the Official Report the result of his analysis of board and lodging in all local offices.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many private hospitals are operating in the United Kingdom at the latest available date.

Mr. Hayhoe: Information is not collected centrally for the United Kingdom. On 31 December 1984 there were 195 private hospitals registered under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 and equipped with operating theatres in England (provisional figure) and 5 in Wales.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any information on the numbers of persons who have died following operations in private hospitals in 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: Records of deaths in 1984 occurring in non-NHS institutions have been examined and, excluding those occurring in military hospitals, there were 31 deaths where therapeutic misadventure had been coded and an operation recorded. In addition there were a further 178 deaths, where operation had been recorded on the certificate as well as other specified causes of death. It is not possible, from the information available, to determine whether the operation was carried out at the institute in which the patient died.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will instruct Coopers and Lybrand to undertake widespread consultation with interested bodies in the course of producing its report on competitive tendering.

Mr. Hayhoe: It has done so.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the specific terms of reference applying to the report his Department has commissioned from Coopers and Lybrand on competitive tendering.

Mr. Hayhoe: The terms of reference for the report commissioned from Coopers and Lybrand were as follows:

(a) To identify different systems of catering which are available for feeding patients and staff in National Health service hospitals;

(b) To give general advice on the circumstances in which the various systems might be applicable (but not to carry out a detailed technical study);

(c) To identify those systems which are likely to require capital expenditure for buildings or equipment;
(d) To set out the options available to be tested by competitive tendering taking into account the various systems;
(e) To advise on how those options should be set out in invitations to tender;
(f) To advise on which options might justify extension of the contract period beyond the normal three years.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated total cost of the report his Department has commissioned from Coopers and Lybrand on competitive tendering.

Mr. Hayhoe: The estimated total cost of its study is £32,000.

Health Authorities (Catering Services)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to issue guidelines to health authorities on the contracting out of catering services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: We are currently considering proposals which will form the basis of additional guidance for health authorities. This will include the report prepared by Coopers and Lybrand on catering services—competitive tendering.

NHS (Catering)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list all research studies available to him on National Health Service catering;

(2) what study his Department has made, or has available to it, on the efficiency of National Health Service catering.

Mr. Hayhoe: There is a large amount of information available on various aspects of National Health Service catering, including efficiency, much of which is distributed to health authorities by the Department in Health Service catering bulletins. In addition the following studies have been separately identified:

Hospital Meal Survey—A joint DHSS/Leeds University study. 1979.

Energy Conservation in Kitchens — A joint DHSS/NHS investigation into energy losses in hospital service departments. July 1982.

Procurement of Breakfast Cereals—Health Service Supply Council Paper. October 1984.

Scrutiny Report into Cost of NHS Catering—Issued February 1985.

Hospital Building Note No. 10—DHSS publication providing guidance for designing and equipping Health Service Catering Departments. May 1985.

Report on Food Procurement — Health Service Supply Council. 1985.

Research Study: Meat and Meat Products in the NHS—Conducted by the Health Service Supply Council and issued in August 1985.

Health Authorities (Private Laundries)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the numbers of health authorities which did not use private laundries in the years 1983 and 1984;

(2) what information he has concerning health authorities which have taken back in-house laundry work previously carried out by private contractors, as referred to in the Sixth Report of the Social Services Committee on public expenditure and social services.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information is not collected centrally in the way requested. However, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Minister for Health to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 21 February at columns 590-98.

Gas Poisoning

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children (a) under the age of 15 years and (b) between the ages of 15 and 21 years died from gas poisoning in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of children under the age of 15 years and aged 15 to 21 years who died from the toxic effect of carbon monoxide and other gases, fumes or vapours in 1982, 1983 and 1984 are shown in the table.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons over 65 years of age died in fires (a) at home and (b) in residential institutions in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The table shows the numbers of deaths from accidents caused by fire and flames (a) at home and (b) in residential institutions, of persons aged 65 and over, which were registered in England and Wales in 1982, 1983 and 1984.

McColl Committee Report

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when he received the McColl committee report on artificial limbs and appliances; when he intends to make the report public; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if it is his intention to implement immediately the recommendations of the McColl committee on artificial limbs and appliances; if he will be having discussions with relevant organisations about the implications of the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the working party under the chairmanship of Professor Ian McColl into the artificial limbs and appliance centres was appointed; when its report is anticipated; and how long thereafter he anticipates responding to its representations.

Mr. Newton: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number and percentage of cases won by appellants appealing against refusal or stoppage of invalidity benefit claims in the past year in England and Wales and the number and percentage of such cases which were supported by (a) the claimant's own general practitioner, (b) an independent medical consultant and (c) other evidence.

Mr. Major: I regret that information relating to appellants in invalidity benefit cases is not available in the form requested. The latest available information for Great Britain which relates to all types of appeal in invalidity benefit cases for the year ending 31 December 1983 is that 3,280 appeals were made to local tribunals of which 947 were successful. A further 164 appeals were made to the commissioner of which 46 were upheld. Of 3,280 appellants 993 (30 per cent) were therefore successful.

I regret that no information is available regarding the number of appeal cases supported by (a) the claimant's own general practitioner, (b) an independent medical consultant and (c) other evidence.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of occasions in the past year on which payments of invalidity benefit to claimants have been stopped in England and Wales, respectively; and if he will give these figures as percentages of total invalidity benefit claimants.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. In the 12 months ending 2 April 1983, the latest period for which figures are available, about 250,000 spells of invalidity benefit ended in Great Britain. Spells can terminate for various reasons but the great majority will be because the claimant submitted a final doctor's statement certifying he was no longer incapable of work. As claimants may have had more than one spell of incapacity in a year it is not possible to express this figure as a percentage of the total number of invalidity benefit claimants. But in the same period some 930,000 beneficiaries received invalidity pension.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of cases where the findings of the regional medical officer conflict with those of a claimant's own general practitioner and where the findings of the adjudication officer subsequently confirm the opinion of the regional medical officer in cases where claims for invalidity benefit have been refused or stopped in England and Wales for the past year; and if he will express both numbers as percentages of the total number of claims for invalidity benefit.

Mr. Major: I regret that the requested information is not available.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for each office of his Department in mid-Glamorgan, the number of occasions in the past year on which payments of invalidity benefit to claimants have been stopped.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information is not available. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of invalidity benefit claimants at each office of his Department in mid-Glamorgan at the latest available date.

Mr. Major: Information about claimants to invalidity benefit is obtained by periodical analysis of a small sample of cases. From this analysis we estimate that on 2 April 1983 (the latest date for which figures are available), there are approximately 28,700 people receiving invalidity benefit at the Department's eight offices in mid-Glamorgan. The sample is too small to permit reliable estimates to be made of the number of claimants at any particular office.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Review Committee on drugs prescribable on the National Health Service will complete its consideration of the inclusion of Lipotriad, Lipoflavanoid, and Mucodyne on the list of prescribed drugs.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs is giving priority to the position of Mucodyne and other oral mucolytics and is considering the many representations received and I hope to receive advice from it soon. I understand it has yet to consider in detail the position of Lipotriad and Lipoflavanoid.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now consider adding mucolytics to the drugs prescribable under the National Health Service.

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs has reached a decision on the inclusion of mucolytic drugs on the selected list; and when such a decision might be announced.

Mr. Hayhoe: We are awaiting advice from the Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs, which has not yet completed its consideration of oral mucolytic drugs.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library tables showing for each supplementary benefit office (a) the numbers of live cases in each of the three categories, pensioners, unemployed and others, for the most recent year for which information is available and (b) the number of single payments made to claimants in each of these categories by each office in the same year.

Mr. Major: Tables showing the latest available figures of claimants, in the categories of pensioners, unemployed and others, receiving supplementary benefit from each of the Department's offices were placed in the Library on 25 March in response to the hon. Member's earlier request of 5 March at column 504. Tables showing the number of single payments made in the year ending April 1985, broken down on the same basis, were placed in the Library on 7 October.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many supplementary benefit claimants there were in the London borough of Southwark in each of the years 1979 to 1985; and what was the number of children dependent on these claimants in each of those years.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to her by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) on 1 May at columns 169-70. This reply gave the number of people claiming supplementary benefit at the nine local social security offices which serve the London borough of Southwark. The areas served by these offices are not coterminous with the borough so that some claimants living in surrounding boroughs were included in the figures given. Comparable figures for the number of dependent children are not available centrally.

The following table shows the estimated number of people claiming supplementary benefit in 1981, 1982 and 1983, and the estimated number of children dependent on them. Comparable figures for 1979, 1980, 1984 and 1985 are not available centrally.

London borough of Southwark

	Estimated number of Supplementary Benefit claimants	Estimated number of children dependent on these claimants
1981	24,000	11,000
1982	29,000	14,000
1983	30,000	14,000

St. Mark's Hospital, Maidenhead

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received, and from whom, with regard to the proposed closure of the accident and emergency unit at St. Mark's hospital, Maidenhead; what response he has made; how many persons are in the area currently served by the unit; what estimates have been made of the net savings arising from the closure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The East Berkshire health authority is currently consulting the local community health council on its proposals for the future of St. Mark's hospital accident and emergency department. Ministers have received representations against the district health authority's proposals from eight members of the public, the Windsor and Maidenhead district association of local councils and the Royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead; and their comments have been passed to the health authority for consideration as part of the consultation exercise. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on the proposal whilst local consultations are still under way.

I have asked the chairman of the East Berkshire health authority to provide my hon. Friend with the detailed information he requested.

Rhodesian Service Pensions

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in the light of the decline in the value of the Zimbabwe dollar against the pound sterling, he will bring forward proposals for increasing the value of pensions awarded to war widows of Rhodesian service men who are British citizens having re-settled in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: The United Kingdom Government may supplement a war widow's pension payable to a British citizen resident in this country by the government of a former colony. The supplement is set at a level sufficient to raise the pension to the amount which would be payable under the United Kingdom war widows' pension scheme and is usually recalculated annually. If my hon. Friend has a particular case in mind which he would like me to look into, I should be happy to do so.

War Pensions (Staff)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that the medical branch of the war pensions department of his Department has an adequate number of doctors on its staff to undertake its work effectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Recent delays in processing war pensions claims and appeals have been caused partly by difficulties in recruiting medical officers. In the last few months a number have been recruited and by mid November we expect that all of the 15 posts at the war pensions branch will be filled. The number of claimants to war pensions awaiting medical decisions has already been reduced to less than half the number six months ago. Provided that successful medical recruitment continues, we are satisfied that the number of doctors will be sufficient to eliminate the delays.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much his Department has spent on office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Major: Information in the form requested is not available. Under the property repayment services arrangements introduced in 1983-84, decorations remain the responsibility of the Property Services Agency, which includes a levy for minor works, including decorations, in the accommodation charge to departments. Before 1983-84, supplies, which include furniture, furnishings, cleaning materials, removal costs and similar expenditure were provided by the Property Services Agency as a common service. Expenditure on supplies by the Department for its HQ, central offices and local offices since then was:

	£ million
1983-84	7·349
1984-85	8·448

It is not possible to estimate separately the cost of office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decorating in these years.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to uprate the Christmas bonus for senior citizens for payment in 1985.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) on 16 April at column 163 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the value of the Christmas bonus for senior citizens, had it been uprated by either the movement in average earnings or the retail price index, since its inception.

Mr. Major: If the Christmas bonus had been revalued in line with the movement in (a) average earnings (1) or (b) the retail price index (2) it would now have been worth £47·72 or £42·33 respectively.

Notes

(1) Based on the Index of Average Earnings (whole economy: seasonally adjusted) for May 1985.

(2) May 1985.

Mr. Paul Escott

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be replying in full to the letter sent on 20 June from the hon. Member for Caerphilly concerning board and lodgings payments to one of his constituents, Mr. Paul Escott of Ystrad Mynach, Mid-Glamorgan.

Mr. Major: I will write to the hon. Member this week.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the costs of meeting mortgage interest payments for claimants of supplementary benefit, other than the unemployed, breaking these down into one-parent families, the sick and disabled and pensioners, and showing how many persons in each category benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to the reply, 13 May 1985, c. 32]: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The best figures available, obtained from the Annual Statistical Enquiry 1983 (a copy of which is in the Library) are given in the table. These show the amounts of mortgage interest included in the assessment of supplementary benefit. No account has been taken of adjustments made in respect of non-dependants or other deductions.

Mortgage Interest Considered in Assessment

	Number	Annual Amount (£ million)
One Parent Families	35,000	21
Sick and Disabled	15,000	9
Pensioners	39,000	10
Others (excluding unemployed)	12,000	5

Feverfew

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that the manufacture of the herb feverfew will not be restricted as part of his Department's review under schedule 4 of Statutory Instrument No. 41 of 1978.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to the reply, 12 July 1985, c. 563]: I regret that part of the information given in the reply was incorrect—a revision follows:

If, under the Medicines Act 1968, we were to receive and grant an application for a new or reviewed product licence, the claims made in promotional literature would have to be consistent with the terms of the product licence. Any restrictions in a licence on advertising would depend on the claims made for the product and the data submitted in support of those claims.

There are three product licences of right for existing medicinal products containing feverfew. These will be subject to review under the Medicines Act in due course.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Salmon

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will seek to ensure that monofilament and nets of similar characteristics are made illegal before the start of the 1986 salmon drift netting season in the Foyle area.

Dr. Boyson: Yes. The use of monofilament nets has been illegal for many years; the provisions of the Foyle

Area (Control of Netting) (Amendment) Regulations 1983 banning two further types of net in common use (multistrand monofilament and single throw monoply, also known as super nylon or Japanese netting), will come into effect on 1 June 1986.

Deaths and Injuries (Statistics)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will publish in the Official Report a table to give for each year since 1 January 1969, the number of deaths of (a) Royal Ulster Constabulary, (b) Ulster Special Constabulary, (c) Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve, (d) Regular Army, (e) Ulster Defence Regiment and (f) civilians, and the number of injuries suffered by the same categories as a result of the civil unrest in Northern Ireland, and, so far as possible, indicate who was responsible for such deaths and the religion of the deceased by category; and if he will update such information at regular intervals.

Mr. Scott: The number of deaths and injuries between 1 January 1969 and 30 September 1985 due to civil unrest in Northern Ireland, and the categories into which they fall are as follows:

*Deaths	1969	1970	1971	1972	1973	1974	1975	1976	1977

Notes:

* The Ulster Special Constabulary was stood down on 30 April 1970. No members were killed in 1969 or in the first quarter of 1970, and records of injuries during this period were not maintained.

† One death occurred in the Republic of Ireland.

‡ From 1 July 1970 only.

‖ Up to 30 September 1985.

It is believed that Republican terrorist organisations have been responsible for 1,466 deaths and Loyalist terrorist organisations for 662 deaths. These figures include terrorists killed by their own actions. 265 deaths occurred as a result of actions by the security forces. Records of religious affiliations are not maintained.

Statistics relating to the security situation in Northern Ireland are updated on a regular basis and are presented to the House at six monthly intervals, normally in the form of a written reply. Relevant information is also given in the Chief Constable's annual reports, copies of which are placed in the Library.

Demonstrations and Processions

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will indicate whether any elected representative other than hon. Members made representations to him or to the Chief Constable that the demonstrations and processions which took place in the months of June and July to date in (a) Limavady, (b) Maghera, (c) Cookstown, (d) Castlewellan and (e) Portadown, should be (i) re-routed and (ii) banned.

Mr. King: I understand my predecessor received several such representations from councillors and members of the Northern Ireland Assembly. They all concerned processions in Portadown. I cannot, of course, speak for the Chief Constable.

As the hon. Member will know, the police are responsible for re-routing processions while power to prohibit a demonstration or procession rests with the Secretary of State.

Royal Prerogative

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the persons who have been released under the Royal Prerogative from prisons in Northern Ireland in each year from 1980 to the latest available date, and indicate the offences for which they were convicted, the periods to which they were sentenced and the normal release date with full remission in each case.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not readily available in the form requested and it is not our practice to give details of releases under the Royal Prerogative of Mercy. However, the numbers of persons released under the Royal Prerogative of Mercy from Northern Ireland prisons each year since 1980 are:

	Number
1980	112
1981	63
1982	53
1983	36
1984	28
*1985	4
Total	296

* To 10 August 1985.

Belfast City Hospital

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provision has been made to ensure prompt evacuation of patients, staff and visitors at the tower block of Belfast city hospital in the event of fire or a terrorist bomb affecting lifts or stairs.

Mr. Needham: Provision has been made for the evacuation of patients, staff and visitors to designated fire-safe zones within the building.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many staff, medical, office and ancillaries, are expected to be employed in the tower block of Belfast city hospital when it is fully operational; and what is the maximum number of patients who can be accommodated in the tower block.

Mr. Needham: The total number of staff will be around 1,950 whole time equivalents. The total bed complement is 583.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he is satisfied with the fire precautions which will be in force when the new tower block at Belfast city hospital is opened; how many lifts exist in the tower block, and whether separate emergency power will be provided to different groups of lifts.

Mr. Needham: Yes. There are 13 lifts in the building and provision has been made for separate emergency power supplies to each lift.

Maze Prison

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what sort of work has been done by persons convicted of scheduled offences and serving sentences in the Maze prison, where the prisoners are or are believed to be members of (a) the Provisional Irish Republican Army, (b) the Official Irish Republican Army, (c) the Irish Republican Socialist Party, (d) the Irish National Liberation Army, (e) the Ulster Defence Association, (f) the Ulster Volunteer Force and (g) other terrorist organisations in (i) 1981, (ii) 1982, (iii) 1983, (iv) 1984 and (v) 1985; and if there are any kinds of work which the prisoners refused to do;

(2) why it was decided to terminate the employment of civilian instructors at the Maze prison; how long it has been since they actually gave instruction to prisoners there where the prisoners concerned were members of terrorist organisations; what savings he expects as a result of their dismissal; and what the cost of employing them has been in each year since they last gave regular instruction to prisoners who were members of terrorist organisations;

(3) what sort of free association is presently enjoyed by prisoners convicted of scheduled offences at the Maze prison; when it was introduced; and what groups enjoy such free association;

(4) whether any groups of terrorist prisoners in the Maze prison are allowed one letter, one visit and one parcel per week and can arrange their own recreational activities;

(5) whether Her Majesty's Government plan to restore the remaining 50 per cent of remission lost by prisoners in the Maze prison during the hunger strike, or to provide conditions under which it would be restored; and if he will make a statement;

(6) which aspects of the five demands made by terrorist prisoners in the Maze prison during the hunger strike have not as yet been incorporated in changes in prison régime and policies;

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether persons convicted of scheduled offences and imprisoned in Northern Ireland have the right to wear their own clothes and exercise that right.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) whether he will list each form of regional support payable from public funds to business, industry, and the professions in Ulster, and the names of agencies responsible for such payments;

(2) if he will list the total cost of regional assistance payable in Ulster for each year since 1970 under each heading of support payable to business, industry and the professions, and for each county;

(3) if he will list the total cost of assistance for employment and training measures payable in Ulster for each year since 1970 under each heading of support payable to business, industry and the professions, and for each county.

Dr. Boyson: A full listing of the various schemes of assistance to businesses in Northern Ireland is provided in "Support for Industry", published by the Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. The elements which equate to regional support in Great Britain are the standard capital grants scheme, administered by the Department of Economic Development, and the selective financial assistance provided by the Industrial Development Board or — in the case of smaller companies — by the local enterprise development unit. Gross expenditure on these elements, and on employment and training measures, since 1970, are as follows. Records are not kept of expenditure by county.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total volume of expenditure allocated to local authorities, the health authorities, the Housing Executive and all other recipients of public expenditure in Ulster in 1984-85.

Dr. Boyson: The allocation of public funds in 1984-85 to bodies whose expenditure is not classified as central Government expenditure are shown below. Information about allocations to a wide range of other bodies funded directly by Northern Ireland Departments, whose expenditure is classified as central Government expenditure, can be found in the 1984-85 Estimates for Services under the Government of Northern Ireland.

Education and library boards	206,433

Fire Authority for Northern Ireland	16,805

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the level of central Government expenditure in Ulster for each of the years 1970 to 1984.

Dr. Boyson: The following figures show the total outturn of public expenditure for the years 1976-77 to 1983-84 for those services which are the direct responsibility either of the Northern Ireland Office or of Northern Ireland Departments. These figures are as far as possible on a consistent basis in terms of the services covered, and reflect the definitions of public expenditure contained in the 1984 Public Expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9143). Figures for earlier years could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will list the average rate per hereditament payable in each district authority in Ulster.

Mr. Needham: The figures for 1985-86 are as follows:

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement as to the total cost to ratepayers in Ulster of funding education and housing provision separately.

Dr. Boyson: In Northern Ireland in 1985-86, £81·1 million and £13·2 million respectively.

Recreational Facilities

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the total cost to the Exchequer of all community recreational facilities in Ulster for each year since 1970.

Mr. Scott: Government expenditure directly related to community recreational facilities in Northern Ireland was as follows:

1970-71	683,482
1971-72	1,048,469
1972-73	1,324,908
1973-74	2,530,435

1981-82	7,662,269
1982-83	10,416,527
1983-84	9,725,078
1984-85	8,485,382

In addition some £9·6 million has been provided towards the provision of tourist amenities, many of which have also made a useful contribution to community recreational facilities. Projects undertaken through the action for community employment scheme and by Enterprise Ulster have included community recreational schemes but details of such expenditure could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Education (Funding)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement as to the means by which educational services are funded in Ulster.

Mr. Scott: Grants are paid to the education and library boards by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland (DENI) for the day to day operation of the services in their areas, including the running of controlled schools and the maintenance of most voluntary schools, provision of school meals and school transport services, awards to students in higher and further education, and library, further education and youth services. For this purpose, boards receive 100 per cent. grants from DENI on all approved recurrent and capital expenditure.

The salaries of the majority of teachers are paid directly by DENI with the exception of part-time teachers in controlled schools and colleges of further education, who are paid by the boards, and teachers in voluntary grammar schools who are paid directly by their employing schools.

Other grants paid by DENI include capital grants (normally at the rate of 85%) to all voluntary schools, grants to voluntary grammar schools in respect of their recurrent expenditure, recurrent and capital grants to the teacher training colleges, museums and the Arts Council for Northern Ireland, grants to the Northern Ireland Sports Council and capital grants (at 75%) to district councils for the provision of recreational facilities. The Department also pays grants to the two Northern Ireland universities on the advice of the University Grants Committee, and to numerous other bodies concerned with various aspects of educational, recreational, youth service and community provision.

Housing (Funding)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement as to the means by which housing services are funded in Ulster.

Mr. Needham: The sole public housing authority in Northern Ireland is the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; the capital expenditure of which is financed by borrowing, mainly, from Government, and by capital receipts from the sale of dwellings and land and from mortgage redemptions. The Housing Executive's revenue expenditure on loan charges, management, maintenance and general administration is financed partly by rental income and partly by a "Housing Grant" from the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland to meet the difference between rental income and approved revenue expenditure. House renovation grants paid by the Housing Executive are also financed directly by the Department. The housing grant, financing of renovation grants, assistance to registered housing associations and the private sector and expenditure on other miscellaneous housing services are met from monies voted by Parliament.

Teachers

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of providing cover for absent teachers in Northern Ireland schools in the period April to June in each of the last three years.

Mr. Scott:

	£ million
April-June 1983	3·00
April-June 1984	3·44
April-June 1985	4·00

Mr. John De Lorean

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the investigation being carried out by the Royal Ulster Constabulary into the business affairs of Mr. John De Lorean.

Mr. King: The Royal Ulster Constabulary is investigating the alleged misappropriation of funds from De Lorean Motor Cars Ltd. which has been in receivership and in liquidation since 1982.

Youth Training

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when, and to what level, he intends to raise the allowance paid to trainees on the youth training programme.

Dr. Boyson: From 1 April 1986 the present single rate of allowance (£27·30 per week) will be replaced by a two-tier system in which trainees will receive either £27·30 per week or £35·00 per week, depending upon when they left school and the training subsequently undertaken. Northern Ireland will thus continue to maintain parity with the rest of the United Kingdom in relation to the level of allowance and the date of introduction of any increase.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Treaty of Rome

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EEC intergovernmental conference on amendments to the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Rifkind: The first session of the conference was held on 9 September. A further ministerial meeting is taking place today. There have been regular meetings of senior officials in a preparatory group to discuss possible amendments to the treaty, covering in particular those measures necessary to complete the common market; the role of the European Parliament; and whether to update the treaty to include specific reference to the activities of the Research and Environment Councils.

Constitution

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning the proceedings and outcome of the meetings of the European Economic Community held in September relating to constitutional changes in the Community on the basis agreed at the Milan meeting.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) earlier today.

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the non-proliferation treaty review conference.

Mr. Renton: The Third Review Conference ended successfully on 21 September with the adoption by consensus of a final document. This included a solemn declaration by the parties of their conviction that the treaty is essential to international peace and security, their continued support for its objectives and their determination to enhance the implementation of the treaty and further to strengthen its authority.

We warmly welcome this outcome which demonstrates renewed recognition of the importance of the treaty in preventing the further spread of nuclear weapons. It gives us confidence that the treaty will continue to play an essential role in international security and in facilitating the worldwide use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

Royal Highland Show

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost to public funds of the Peace Through NATO stall at the recent 1985 Royal Highland Show at Ingliston.

Mr. Renton: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the Ministry of Defence NATO British Defence Policy Exhibition mounted at various locations throughout the United Kingdom during 1985. At each venue, including the Royal Highland Show at Ingliston, a Peace Through NATO (PTN) representative was available to answer PTN questions and distribute PTN literature.

PTN received a grant-in-aid of £74,500 from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for 1985-86. Its representative at Ingliston was a volunteer. The proportion of the grant used on the show was therefore minimal and merely covered the cost of literature distributed.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department has spent on office furniture, carpets and curtains and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Eggar: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office including the Overseas Development Administration has office accommodation at home and overseas.

The Department of the Environment was responsible for the supply of all these items and services overseas until 1 April 1983 when the Foreign and Commonwealth Office assumed responsibility. Expenditure on office furniture, carpets and curtains for use overseas was as follows:

Financial year	Total £
1980-81	286,870
1981-82	240,951
1982-83	277,786
1983-84	516,093
1984-85	496,874

It is not possible to identify decoration costs separately from maintenance costs, of which they form a part.

The Department of the Environment similarly supplied all these items and services without charge in respect of office accommodation in the United Kingdom until 1 April 1983. Thereafter major decorations remained the responsibility of the Department of the Environment whilst minor decorations became a departmental responsibility. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office spent £34,348 (1983-84) and £49,185 (1984-85) on minor decorations. Expenditure on office furniture, carpets and curtains in the United Kingdom was £513,167 (1983-84) and £529,281 (1984-85).

India

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with the Prime Minister of India.

Mr. Eggar: Mr. Rajiv Gandhi visited the United Kingdom on 14-15 October at the invitation of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. During his visit there were discussions with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, my right hon. and learned Friend and a number of other Ministers. A wide range of international, regional and bilateral issues were covered, in an extremely cordial atmosphere.

WALES

Capital Grants Scheme

7. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning the reductions recently announced in the new capital grants scheme; and what estimate he has made of the effects of these reductions in lowland and upland farming areas of Wales, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have received five representations against the reductions in grant rates announced on 8 July. The changes made to the farm capital grant schemes have also been raised at my meetings with the farming unions in Wales.

It is estimated that in a full year savings of up to £5·7 million could result from these changes. This would be approximately £4·6 million in the upland farming areas of Wales and £1·1 million in the lowland.

The agriculture improvement scheme, introduced on 1 October, will continue to provide financial support for a wide range of farm improvements and will help farmers who wish to diversify into tourism or craft works.

Labour Statistics

12. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the current unemployment in Ogmore, Mid-Glamorgan and Wales; and what were the percentage increases since May 1979 and since October 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 12 September 1985 the number of unemployed claimants were 4,951, 36,975 and 187,563 respectively. Comparable figures for May 1979 in respect of the Ogmore constituency and Mid-Glamorgan are not available because of the move to claimant based figures. The estimated increase in percentage terms for Wales is 143 per cent. Since October 1984 there have been increases of 8 per cent., 5·2 per cent. and 4·8 per cent. respectively.

Rural Development, Powys

13. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the level of assistance available for rural development projects in the county of Powys.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The county benefits from a wide range of Government and European measures to assist rural development including the work of agencies such as the Development Board for Rural Wales. My aim is to see this support continue and where possible expand.

Common Agricultural Policy

14. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from the farming unions and others in Wales during the past three months concerning the effects of the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community on Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I closely monitor development in the industry and have frequent meetings with the farming unions and other industry representatives — in the course of which I receive many representations on the operation of the CAP. These are mainly concerned with the dairying and livestock sectors, particularly the problems of fodder supply caused by recent bad weather.

Roadworks

15. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the current progress of work on the A55 dual carriageway and on the provision of bypasses around the five villages on Anglesey on the A5.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We are continuing to make good progress with the upgrading of the A55. Eleven sections have been completed to date, including the Colwyn Bay bypass which was fully opened to traffic in June. Construction is presently underway on the Holywell and Bodelwyddan bypasses. Tenders for the Penmaenbach-Dwygyfylchi improvement have been invited and construction is expected to start early in the new year. Preparation of the remaining stages of the improvement programme is well in hand.

On bypasses on the A5 in Anglesey the report of the consulting engineers is still expected by the end of the year.

House Building

17. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the percentage change in net public expenditure on house building in Wales between 1979-80 and 1984-85 in real and cash terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Local authority and housing association receipts can be used to finance both new house-building and other capital expenditure such as major repairs. It is therefore not possible to give the figures requested.

Bankruptcies and Company Liquidations

18. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many personal bankruptcies and company liquidations, respectively, there were in Wales between 1975 and 1985.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the period from the beginning of 1975 to the second quarter of 1985 there were 3,549 bankruptcies dealt with by county courts in Wales. This figure includes both individuals and partnerships. Separate statistics relating to company liquidations in Wales are not available.

Sunday Trading

19. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received about a possible change in legislation relating to Sunday trading in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Eleven representations have been received at the Welsh Office since, and eight before, the report of the committee of inquiry into proposals to amend the Shops Act was published.

Home-School Liaison

20. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many courses during 1984 and 1985 in home-school liaison being run for parents at weekends and evenings were (a) initiated by Her Majesty's Inspectors; (b) attended by Her Majesty's Inspectors.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None. The prime responsibility for facilitating home-school links rests with local education authorities and individual schools. Her Majesty's Inspectorate has different responsibilities, one of which is to seek to ensure the wide dissemination of examples of good practice. In the exercise of this responsibility Her Majesty's Inspectorate has published two occasional papers in recent years on home-school links; Home-School Links (Secondary Phase) in November 1983 and Links between Parents, Community and Primary Schools in June 1985. The good practice discussed in these papers was based on HMI visits to schools when home-school links are discussed and specific reference made to them in inspection reports. In addition HMI attends the meetings of school governing bodies, which include parent representative members when the inspection reports are considered and I understand some of Her Majesty's inspectors have addressed parents meetings at schools.

Parrot Corporation

21. Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales why, as agent for the European Coal and Steel Community, he permitted £2½ million advanced by the European Coal and Steel Community and intended for working capital for the Parrot Corporation, Cwmbran, to be used as a guarantee against a loan; why he permitted this sum to be frozen in the American bank Northern Investments; why the guarantee was not disclosed by the Welsh Development Authority to the National Coal Board pension fund and other City institutions; and what steps he is now taking to protect the employees of and the public funds invested in the Parrot Corporation.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department is not an agent for the ECSC. Its involvement in the original financing of the Parrot Corporation project was confined to making an offer of regional selective assistance and exchange risk cover on the ECSC loan. My consent for the Welsh Development Agency's original investment was not required. On 8 October the chairman of the Parrot Corporation announced that a refinancing package, including further investment both by the WDA, to which I had given my approval, and by the other original investors, had been agreed to secure the future of the company.

The circumstances of the original investment are under investigation by the police.

Public Housing (Sales)

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state up to the latest convenient date how many tenants have purchased their dwellings from local authorities and other public bodies in Wales during the previous 12 months and during the period since 1979 respectively, and how many such purchases await completion.

Mr. Mark Robinson: During the 12 month period ending 30 June 1985, it is provisionally estimated that 5,889 public sector dwellings were sold to sitting tenants. Between 1 January 1979 and 30 June 1985, the corresponding figure was 47,689.

The provisional estimate of the number of local authority purchases awaiting completion at 30 June 1985, is 4,562. Figures for outstanding housing association sales and new town sales are not held centrally.

Defective Housing

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his Department's estimate of the amount of cash required to correct and repair defective housing in Wales, what action his Department has taken to assess the state of disrepair in Welsh housing, what extra cash he proposes to allocate to local authorities, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is impossible to estimate with any accuracy the cost of bringing each house in Wales up to a satisfactory standard of repair. The Welsh house condition survey which our Department is undertaking next year will be by far the largest house condition survey ever carried out in Wales. The survey will provide the first detailed analysis of the state of repair of the stock and will provide data valid at district council level. The results will be taken into account in determining future allocations to local authorities for housing expenditure.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the cost of correcting housing defects in Wales which fall within the scope of the Housing Defects Act 1984, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There are about 1,500 privately owned PRC dwellings in Wales which could benefit from either grant or repurchase under the Act. We estimate the cost at about £21 million.

Mineral Resources

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the estimated reserves of sand and gravel within the area of each Welsh county, what estimates he has of the requirements for sand and gravel in the Principality up to the end of the century, what mineral reserves in Wales he expects to be worked out before the end of the century, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The most recent estimates of permitted reserves of land-won sand and gravel were made by the aggregates working parties for North Wales and South Wales following a survey of the position on 1 January 1982. The figures are:

	Permitted sand and gravel reserves at 1.1.82 Million Tonnes
NORTH WALES
Clwyd	15·3
Gwynedd	4·6
SOUTH WALES
Dyfed	1·2
Powys
Mid Glamorgan	0·5
West Glamorgan
Gwent	Nil
South Glamorgan	Nil

Note: Figures for South Wales are bracketed for reasons of commercial confidentiality.

Reserves of marine deposits and gravel were not quantifiable.

Requirements for the production of sand and gravel for the period 1981-1991 as identified by the aggregates working parties are set out in Welsh Office circular 30/82, "Guidelines for Aggregates Provision in England and Wales". The requirements for both land-won and marine-dredged production for 1981-1991 are:

Region	Requirement for sand and gravel Million Tonnes
North Wales	17-26
South Wales	14-25

Further surveys of both permitted reserves and forecast demand will be carried out in 1986.

Reserves of sand and gravel or other minerals likely to be worked out over a future period cannot be readily or accurately assessed.

Welsh Voluntary Trust

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to establish a Welsh voluntary trust, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: We are aware that the establishment of a Welsh voluntary trust is currently the subject of debate within the voluntary sector. We are following developments with interest.

Children (Eczema and Diabetes)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department proposes any action in Wales in the light of the Medical Research Council's national survey of health and development for children with special regard to eczema and diabetes, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My hon. Friend the Minister for Health and I are awaiting the Medical Research Council's considerations of the latest results of this continuous survey and it would be inappropriate for me to comment in the meantime.

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many ancillary jobs there were in the local education authorities in Wales in 1980 and in 1984-85, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In June 1980, 22,983 whole-time equivalent non-teaching staff were employed in the local authority education sector in Wales; in June 1984, the corresponding figure was 22,347.

Road Maintenance

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the expenditure on road maintenance in each Welsh county for each year from 1979-80 to 1985-86, if he will express the changes in real terms, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Using the gross domestic product deflator with the base year of 1984-85 the figures for maintenance expenditure on trunk and county roads are:

	1979-80 Outturn £M	1980-81 Outturn £M	1981-82 Outturn £M	1982-83 Outturn £M	1983-84 Outturn £M	1984-85 Estimated Outturn £M	1985-86 Provision £M
Clwyd	16·7	13·3	18·5	15·1	15·0	12·3	12·8
Dyfed	18·9	16·5	20·2	16·2	16·7	17·7	17·3
Gwent	13·6	14·5	17·5	14·2	14·0	14·8	24·5
Gwynedd	16·5	13·6	16·2	13·1	12·7	13·6	14·9
Mid Glamorgan	17·8	15·7	19·7	16·9	17·5	17·0	18·0
Powys	14·6	12·8	10·8	8·7	11·0	11·1	11·2
South Glamorgan	12·4	10·9	12·4	12·1	12·8	9·9	10·2
West Glamorgan	12·6	11·1	12·5	12·2	11·7	13·7	13·0
Wales	122·9	108·4	127·8	108·5	114·4	110·1	121·7

(Note: Figures include certain expenditure by local authorities on road safety and lighting installation: together this amounted to only about 1% of the local authority total in 1981-82 (the last year for which separate figures are available).)

The 1984 national road maintenance condition survey indicates that the overall condition of roads in England and Wales in 1984 was broadly comparable to that in 1977 though there have been variations in condition from year to year, and in respect of particular classes of road. Expenditure on trunk road maintenance has increased in recent years and I intend to maintain provision at about the present level in future years. The level of expenditure by local highway authorities is for them to determine in the light of their own priorities.

Hotel and Catering Trade

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of those Welsh people engaged full time in the hotel and catering trade currently earn less than (a) £160 per week, (b) £120 per week, (c) £100 per week, (d) £80 per week and (e) £60 per week; what assessment he has made of the impact upon wages for under-21s in Wales consequent upon the abolition of wages councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information in respect of earnings in the hotel and catering trade in Wales is not available in the form requested.

As announced on 17 July wages councils are to be reformed not abolished and appropriate legislation will be brought before the House in due course.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are currently employed in the hotel and catering trade in Wales, and if he will specify how many are engaged in part-time or temporary work.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At the time of the 1981 census of employment there were 43,570 persons employed in the hote: and catering industry of whom 25,911 were working part-time. These figures include any temporary workers who were in employment at the time of the census, but it is not possible to identify such workers separately. These figures will remain the most up to date estimates of the position until the results of the 1984 census of employment are available early in 1986.

Dangerous Drugs (Advice and Counselling)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the amount of money given by the Government to drugs advisory and counselling organisations in Wales for each of the years 1979-80 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Government funding for the provision of advisory, counselling and health education activities by district health authorities, local education authorities and voluntary groups to combat drug misuse in Wales has been allocated in each year as follows:

1979-80	6,075
1980-81	7,050
1981-82	7,590
1982-83	7,993
1983-84	8,472
1984-85	14,393
1985-86	270,654

In addition, the Welsh Office has allocated £200,000in 1985-86 as a contribution to the Government's national publicity campaign on drug misuse.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take further steps to protect leasehold tenants in Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) at column 389 on 18 March 1985 by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many homes have been provided by Welsh housing associations in each year from 1980 to 1984 and what is the estimate for the number of homes to be provided in the current year.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The numbers of units provided by housing associations in Wales for each of the last five financial years are:

	Number
1980-81	1,169
1981-82	2,422
1982-83	2,318
1983-84	1,672
1984-85	1,719

The best estimate available for 1985-86 is 1,700.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total Government funding to Welsh housing associations for each year 1979-80 to 1985-86, exclusive of capital receipts, and if he will express the change in the local funding in real terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Government funding to Welsh housing associations takes the form of housing association grant, hostel deficit grant, revenue deficit grant and grants under Section 93 of the Finance Act 1975 which have been paid, in total, as follows:

	£ million cash	£ million at 1985-86 prices
1979-80	22·2	35·6
1980-81	20·5	27·7
1981-82	15·0	18·4
1982-83	30·5	35·0
1983-84	32·9	36·1
1984-85	47·9	50·3
1985-86*	40·5	40·5

* Estimated.

Education (Parental Contributions)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total and proportional amount of money provided towards Welsh state sector secondary school capitation funding through parental voluntary contributions in each of the last five yars, to the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information on money provided for schools through voluntary parental contributions is not collected by the Department.

Council House Rents

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the average rise in Welsh council house rents in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: On the basis of returns made by local authorities to the Department, the information is estimated to be as follows:

*Average rise in council house rents in Wales

	£ per week
1981-82	+3·34
1982-83	+2·54
1983-84	+0·66
1984-85	+1·01
1985-86†	+0·82

* The rent figures used are average unrebated rents (exclusive of rates) for each financial year.

† The increase shown for 1985-86 is provisional because only 27 local authority returns (out of a total of 37) have been submitted to date.

Over the five-year period from 1981-82 to 1985-86, following the introduction of a separate RSG system for Wales, domestic and non-domestic rate poundages increased by 40·6 per cent. and 21·0 per cent. respectively; average increases of 7·1 per cent. and 3·9 per cent. per annum respectively. This compares with aggregate increases over the last four years of the previous administration (1974-75, following the reorganisation of local government, to 1978-79) of 118·8 per cent. in domestic rates and 58·1 per cent. in non-domestic rates; annual average increases of 21·6 per cent. and 12·1 per cent. respectively. The reduction in the rate of increase under this Government clearly demonstrates the success in Wales of our policies for local government finance and has benefited the taxpayer, industry and commerce and the domestic ratepayer.

Rates

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the average rise in (a) domestic and (b) industrial rates in Wales for each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The average increase in domestic and non-domestic (including industrial) rate poundages in each of the last five years, together with percentage increases, is as follows:

	Domestic poundage (p)	Percentage	Non-domestic poundage (p)	Percentage
1981-82	21·4	20·4	20·1	14·2
1982-83	*22·3	17·6	5·1	3·1
1983-84	1·3	0·9	1·2	0·7
1984-85	13·9	9·3	13·6	8·1
1985-86	13·8	8·4	14·2	7·8

*Domestic rate relief was reduced from 36p in the pound in 1981-82 to 18·5p in 1982-83.

Hospital Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many children aged under 16 years are currently on Welsh hospital outpatient waiting lists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information about the age of persons on hospital outpatient waiting lists is not available.

O and A-level Examinations

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh students in state-funded secondary schools and sixth form colleges this year sat O or A-level examinations in (a) one modern language, (b) two modern languages, (c) computer-related subjects, (d) Latin, (e) economics and (f) sociology; what have been the relevant figures for each of the five previous years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information, as supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee, is as follows:

*Candidates in maintained secondary schools and tertiary colleges

		1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh students in the current year took A or O-level examinations in specialist mathematics subjects.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information, as supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee, is as follows:

	*Candidates in maintained schools and further education establishments Number
'O' Level:
CS Mathematics†	32,724

Play Groups

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many places were available to children in Welsh district council-run play groups this summer, what has been the figure for each previous summer since 1978, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Playgroup facilities are provided by county council social services departments, and information collected relates to 31 March each year. Information for 1985 is not yet available, but details for 1978-84 are given in the following table:

	Places in playgroups provided by local authorities in Wales Number
1978	312
1979	292
1980	292
1981	272
1982	292
1983	318
1984	308

Alpha Steel

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the amount of grants and other financial assistance given to Alpha Steel since its location in Gwent; how much in EEC grants and other financial assistance Alpha Steel has received since its location in Gwent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: We have no record of financial assistance to Alpha Steel either from central Government or European Community funds.

Community Programme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many community programme places there are in Wales, how many extra community jobs will be provided in Wales as a result of the Government's economic measures, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At the end of August 1985 over 10,000 people were on community programme projects in Wales, and the June 1986 filled places target currently totals 20,540.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales why he approved of Mr. Neil Taylor leaving his employment in the Welsh Development Agency to become a financial consultant to the Parrot Corporation, and what steps he has taken to renegotiate contracts of service of executives of the Welsh Development Agency to ensure that a suitable interval of time elapses before an executive can be employed by companies who have obtained loans or grants from the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The terms of employment of WDA employees are a matter for the board of the agency and my approval for any arrangements between former agency employees and other bodies is not required. I understand that since October 1983 the agency has included a clause in the contracts of certain senior staff on their appointment requiring the permission of the board to be obtained before accepting appointments within two years of leaving the agency.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last visited the offices in Gwent of the Parrot Corporation and when he last met Parrot executives, when he proposes to have discussions with Parrot concerning the corporation's recent financial difficulties and its proposed board changes, how many employees of Parrot are at work in South Wales, how much in EEC loans and cash Parrot has received; how much cash and loans Parrot has received from Her Majesty's Government; and if he will make a statement concerning the financial affairs of the Parrot Corporation.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have not visited the offices of the Parrot Corporation. I met a senior executive of the corporation on one occasion, in September 1983 and I met the chairman last month. The company employs 86 people at Cwmbran. It has received an ECSC loan of £2·5 million on which my Department has provided exchange risk cover. Apart from WDA funds and guarantee, the company has accepted an offer of regional selective assistance of £1 million of which £500,000 has been paid to date together with £274,000 in regional development grant.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh Development Agency advance factories were untenanted at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Development Agency had 510 untenanted advance factories at 30 September 1985. Of these, 125 units were already allocated to prospective tenants and the future use of six units was being decided. There were 379 advance factories vacant and available for letting.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will make a statement concerning the qualifications by the Comptroller and Auditor General of the accounts of the Welsh Development Agency, what discussions he has had with the Comptroller and Auditor General on this matter; and what talks he plans with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency;

(2) if, in the light of the qualification of the accounts of the Welsh Development Agency by the Comptroller and Auditor General, he proposes to discuss the valuation of the property portfolio of the Welsh Development Agency with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency and the Comptroller and Auditor General, what action he proposes, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There is nothing I can usefully add to the two letters which have already been sent to the hon. Gentleman explaining the background to the Comptroller and Auditor General's comments. I have not discussed the matter with the Comptroller and Auditor General and I have no plans to do so with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency. My officials are currently in discussion with the WDA concerning a review of the useful life of its factories and consequential changes in depreciation policy in preparation for the publication of the WDA's 1985-86 annual accounts.

Job Creation

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to take further steps to seek to reduce unemployment in Wales during the next two years, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My aim is to see the best use made of the Government's comprehensive range of policies for tackling the causes and effects of unemployment and generating new jobs in the economy as a whole.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any further plans to create new jobs in mid-Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Mid Wales remains eligible for a wide range of Government schemes and initiatives designed to regenerate the economy and improve employment prospects. I am keeping the position under review and am always ready to consider ways of sustaining and expanding the rural economy in Wales.

Derelict Land Reclamation

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what effect he expects the revised National Coal Board policy on pit closures to have on the level of derelict land reclamation in Wales over the next three years in terms of overall funding and priorities.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I understand that the Welsh Development Agency is currently inviting bids from local authorities for inclusion in a new land reclamation programme. Priorities will be assessed in the light of local authorities' views as shown in these bids. The agency's budget for land reclamation in the next financial year will be published in the Supply Estimates next Spring.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total spending on derelict land reclamation in Wales in each of the last five years to date and what are the estimates for 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) what was the total funding for derelict land reclamation and environmental improvement by the Welsh Development Agency in each of the last five years to date, and what are the estimates for 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The bulk of public sector assistance for land reclamation over the last five years has been in the form of grant from the Welsh Development Agency. The agency's spending on derelict land reclamation and environmental improvement in each of the last five years was as follows:

	£ millions
	Land Reclamation	Environmental Improvement	Total
1980-81	9·62	0·57	10·19
1981-82	9·90	0·51	10·41
1982-83	9·51	0·31	9·82
1983-84	11·23	0·94	12·17
1984-85	9·83	0·67	10·50

The WDA's estimated budget for land reclamation and environmental improvement in 1985-86 is £9 million and £0·5 million respectively. In addition it is anticipated that a total of some £1·5 million of urban development grant will be paid in support of land reclamation in south Cardiff in 1985-86 and 1986-87.

I am not in a position to announce funding for land reclamation in 1986-87 in advance of the publication of the WDA's budget in the Supply Estimates next spring.

Agriculture

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the agricultural industry in Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The poor summer has posed many problems for the agriculture industry in Wales, but my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture has confirmed that help will be made available to those producers most seriously affected. The economic conditions and prospects for the industry will be examined in detail in the forthcoming review of hill livestock compensatory allowances and the annual review of agriculture.

National Health Service (Pest Control)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department has studied the report of the British Pest Control Association concerning National Health Service buildings, a copy of which has been sent to him, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I have not yet received the report but a paper based on it and prepared by the association is being studied by the Department's environmental health adviser.

Voluntary Work

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy towards the review of voluntary work in Wales by the Wales Council for Voluntary Action, a copy of which has been sent to him, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The recommendations arising from the review are still the subject of discussion within the voluntary sector in Wales and we will monitor the outcome closely.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for January, July and September of each of the past 10 years the unemployment level for each employment office area in Gwynedd.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is as follows:

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table indicating for September the average unemployment rate for all development areas and assisted areas, respectively, in Wales, and if he will list those travel-to-work areas within ordinary assisted areas whose unemployment rate is higher than those of development areas.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 12 September 1985 the number of claimants unemployed in development areas and intermediate areas in Wales totalled 74,479 and 97,956 respectively, giving rates of 19·8 per cent. and 17·0 per cent.; there were two travel-to-work areas with intermediate area status whose rates were higher than the average rate for the development areas, Fishguard (21·9 per cent.) and Bangor and Caernarfon (19·9 per cent.).

Generic Medicines

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with the quality controls on imported generic medicines; if he will make a statement on the recent discussions between his Chief Pharmacist, Mr Graham Calder and representatives of the medical profession on quality controls for imported generic medicines; and whether, in his further consideration of the Greenfield report, he has examined proposals to extend the patent life of existing or future drugs, as a means to protecting research.

Mr. John MacKay : Yes. Generic medicines, including imported ones, are required to meet the same standards of safety, quality and efficacy as branded products. There have been no discussions this year between the Chief Pharmacist and the medical profession on this topic. The Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry have submitted a paper to the Government proposing an extension of the patent life for pharmaceutical products and this is being considered.

Forestry Commission (Regional Advisory Committees)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the reply of 15 May 1985, Official Report, column 144, which organisations nominated the regional advisory committee members appointed primarily to cover the environmental interest; and on what date their nominations were received.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Name	Nominating Organisation(s)	Nomination Received
Dr. H. M. T. Frankland	Nature Conservancy Council	26 August 1983
Mr. H. W. Mackworth-Praed	Nature Conservancy Council	26 August 1983
Mr. I. Mercer	Countryside Commission	29 July 1983
Mr. J. M. Harrop	Nature Conservancy Council	26 August 1983

Mr. J. Grant	Countryside Commission for Scotland	27 July 1983
Mr. B. S. Brookes	Countryside Commission for Scotland	27 July 1983
Dr. R. Aitken	Countryside Commission for Scotland	27 July 1983

Re-Chem Plants

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if in view of the destruction of the incinerator stack at the Re-Chem plant in Bonnybridge and the concern about possible emissions from the chimney stack on the health of residents in the Denny and Bonnybridge areas, he will publish information about measurements made for metal and chlorinated organic compound in the combustion products and gases of that chimney; and if he will provide the results of any investigation.

Mr. Ancram: I understand there is no immediate intention to dismantle the stack. Samples of the deposits in the stack have been taken by my inspectors for analyses; the results are not yet available but I shall publish them in due course.

West of Scotland Agricultural College

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the proposed closure of veterinary investigation facilities by the West of Scotland agricultural college.

Mr. Younger: The veterinary investigation facilities provided by the West of Scotland Agricultural College are part of the college's advisory services to the agricultural industry in their area.

My Department will shortly be issuing a consultation paper on the agricultural advisory services in Scotland. Careful consideration will be given to the responses to that document, including those relating to the veterinary investigation service. Meantime no proposals have been made for closure of facilities currently provided.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Expenditure

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the percentage reduction on net public expenditure on housing planned for 1985-86 compared to 1978-79 and 1979-80, respectively.

Sir George Young: Planned net expenditure on housing for 1985-86 is £2,290 million, a reduction of 36 per cent. since 1978-79 and 49 per cent. since 1979-80. This comparison does not, however, take into account the very large expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on housing benefit or the substantial volume of capital receipts on which local authorities have been able to draw since 1981 in order to increase their spending power.

Housing Investment Programme (Walsall)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State ior the Environment if he will allocate additional resources to Walsall district council under the housing investment programme for house building and modernisation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No decisions have yet been taken about the level of housing resources to be allocated to individual councils for 1986-87. However, once the allocations have been made, it will be for each council to determine its own investment priorities within the resources available.

Birtenshaw Farm, Bolton

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what account was taken by him of objections on traffic grounds by local residents to the proposed development at Birtenshaw farm, Bolton, during the appeal procedure.

Mr. Tracey: Full account was taken of all the evidence reported by the inspector who held the local inquiry into this appeal, including that relating to objections on traffic grounds by local residents.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the local authority associations on the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has been consulting the local authority associations on the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87 throughout 1985, both in the consultative council on local government finance and its official-level grants working group. The last meeting of the consultative council was on 21 October.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the plans for privatisation of each of the water authorities; and when privatisation is likely to proceed.

Mr. John Patten: We have received 42 responses to the discussion paper issued in April. Apart from the responses of the ten water authorities and the Water Authorities Association, these include five others from the water industry, 13 from outside associations, and responses from one London borough council, five district councils, the Countryside Commission and four individuals.

The Government are considering the possibilities and a statement will be made in due course.

Lifts (Emergency Telephones)

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 2 July, Official Report, column 98, if he will give the reasons for his decision not to make it a general requirement that lifts in buildings should contain emergency telephones which can be used by people wearing hearing aids; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to make such a requirement because adequate arrangements already exist through licences granted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for the running of branch communications systems, to which I referred in my reply to the hon. Member on 2 July at column 98.

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities which have applied for an additional allocation from the homes insulation scheme reserve; and what proportion of the total funds has now been allocated.

Sir George Young: To date the following local authorities have applied for additional allocations from the homes insulation scheme.

Sand and Gravel

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage the extraction of sand and gravel from the sea bed and estuaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: It remains the Government's policy to encourage the use of marine dredged aggregates wherever this is possible without unacceptable damage to sea fisheries or risk of coastal erosion.

Radioactivity

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those contracts undertaken or being undertaken by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, involving monitoring of radioactivity in the environment; in what areas such investigations are taking place; and when he intends to publish those results.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following contracts have been placed with the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology in recent years:

By the Department of the Environment
Radionuclides in Terrestrial Ecosystems.
Concentration and Spatial Distribution of Radionuclides in Grazed and Ungrazed Saltmarshes.
Inland Transfer of Radionuclides by Birds feeding in the Estuaries and Saltmarshes at Ravenglass.
Radionuclides in contrasting types of Coastal Pastures and taken up by individual plant species in West Cumbria.
Incorporation of Radionuclides by Sheep grazing on an Estuarine Saltmarsh.
Procedure developed and used for the measurement of Alpha and Gamma Emmers in Environmental Materials.
The Distribution and Dynamics of Radionuclides in the Terrestrial Environment.
Radionuclides in Bird Tissues, their Foods and Feeding Areas near Ravenglass.
Sheep Grazing Studies.
Radiochemical Technical Development Studies.

The results of the first six projects listed above have already been published. The results of the remaining projects will be published in the course of the next two years as soon as the work has been completed.

By the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
Radionuclides distribution within a grazed meadow.
Analysis of environmental data (1979-1981.
Statistical Analysis of West Cumbria milk data.
Cumbria sheep feeding studies.

The results of the first three projects listed above have already been published. The results of the remaining project will be published as soon as the work is completed in 1986.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which radioactive isotopes or elements have been detected in or around the Irish Sea coast of Cumbria in each year since 1979.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am informed that radionuclides of the following elements have been detected as a result of routine monitoring undertaken between 1980 and 1983 (complete information is not yet available for 1984):

Americium, Antimony, Argon, Caesium, Carbon, Cerium, Cobalt, Curium, Europium, Hydrogen (as Tritium), Iodine, Krypton, Manganese, Niobium, Plutonium, Ruthenium, Silver, Strontium, Technetium, Zinc and Zirconium.

St. Barnabas Community Centre

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what reply he has sent to St. Paul's community association in relation to a letter about the St. Barnabas community centre sent to him on 23 August.

Sir George Young: I wrote to the St. Paul's community association on 25 September. In view of the difficulties that have arisen over the St. Barnabas community centre, which was built by Avon county council with financial assistance from the Government's urban programme, I have offered a further attempt to mediate in this matter.

Water Authorities (Official Communications)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 26 July, Official Report, column 889, what decision he has reached about publishing official communications with regional water authorities.

Mr. John Patten: Water information letters are not public documents and are therefore not usually published. They are private correspondence between the Department and chief executives of the regional water authorities.

Water

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those water authorities which do not fulfil the requirements of the European Economic Community directive on drinking water in respect of (a) aluminium, (b) iron, (c) manganese, (d) lead, (e) nitrates and (f) fertilisers.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following water authorities have one or more water supply areas in which the relevant limit in the EC Drinking Water Directive is exceeded at present:

Aluminium
- Northumbrian
- North West
- Severn-Trent
- South West
- Yorkshire

Manganese
- Anglian
- Northumbrian
- North West
- Severn-Trent
- South West
- Yorkshire

Nitrate
- Anglian
- Severn-Trent
- Yorkshire

Iron
- Anglian
- North West
- Severn-Trent
- South West
- Yorkshire

Lead
- Anglian
- Northumbrian
- North West
- Severn-Trent
- Yorkshire

Fertilisers
- There is no reference to fertilisers in the Directive.

This answer does not cover the position in statutory water companies.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the date when each water authority is expected to comply fully with the European Economic Community directive on drinking water.

Mrs. Rumbold: The dates by which the last improvements are due to be completed to comply with the directive are as follows:

	Date
Anglian	1989
Northumbrian	1988
North West	1990
Severn-Trent	1990 (except for two supply areas 1995)
Southern	Already complying
South West	1991
Thames	1987
Wessex	Already complying
Yorkshire	Applications still being considered

This answer does not cover the position in statutory water companies.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the time limits he has imposed, and on which water authorities, in respect of the nitrate content of drinking water.

Mrs. Rumbold: Derogations granted to Anglian and Severn-Trent water authorities allowing them to exceed in some of their supplies the nitrate limit set in the EC drinking water directive will be reviewed in three years.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in what respect he has asked the European Economic Community to review the pesticide parameters for drinking water.

Mrs. Rumbold: The pesticide parameter specifies the same limit for every pesticide, herbicide and fungicide, and a total figure for all such substances. This is scientifically unsound as these substances vary enormously in toxicity. The Government will therefore be requesting a review which takes account of these variations and the recent changes in pesticide composition. In addition, methods of analysis are not available to identify many pesticides at 0·1 parts per million, and in these cases the directive limit is not practical.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which water authorities supply drinking water with pesticides in them; what are the pesticides; what is their source; and what is the quantity involved.

Mrs. Rumbold: If sophisticated analytical methods now becoming available are used it is possible to detect traces of pesticides in most water supplies down to one tenth of a part per million or even less. There are several hundred pesticides authorised for use in agriculture and general weed control as well as more specialised activities such as wood treatment. Medical advisers have confirmed that traces of pesticides detected in routine sampling are well below any known acceptable daily intake.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all those private water suppliers which do not fulfil the requirements of the European Economic Community directive on drinking water in respect of (a) aluminium, (b) iron, (c) managanese, (d) lead, (e) nitrates and (f) fertilisers.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why private water suppliers are to be allowed to supply drinking water of an inferior quality to that provided by public water authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: This is not so. Local authorities have a statutory responsibility for deciding whether a private water supply is satisfactory.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which private water suppliers serve fewer than 500 people.

Mrs. Rumbold: About 1 per cent. of the population regularly drink water from private supplies. There are known to be about 80,000 such supplies in the United Kingdom mostly in rural areas serving single properties. About 200 private supplies regularly serve more than 500 people.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will detail the programme of remedial work that is to be undertaken by each water authority in order to improve the quality of drinking water; and if he will state the cost;

(2) what are the further programmes of action that he has identified as being needed to improve the quality of drinking water.

Mrs. Rumbold: Programmes of action relate principally to the lead, aluminium, microbiological and iron parameters of EC drinking water directive. For lead the pH level is being raised or orthophosphate added to the water to reduce plumbosolvency (Anglian, Northumbrian North West, Severn-Trent, Yorkshire). When inefficient treatment causes the aluminium limit to be exceeded, treatment works are being improved or rebuilt (Northumbrian, North West, Severn-Trent, South West, Yorkshire). Marginal failures to meet microbiological standards are being met by more sophisticated disinfection, supplementary chlorination, or replacement or repair of service reservoirs (South West, Yorkshire). Where high iron concentrations are due to corroded cast iron mains, the pipes are being scraped, flushed and relined, or replaced (Severn-Trent).

Many of these programmes of action are already under way. Further details and costs may be obtained from the water authorities.

This answer does not cover programmes of remedial work being undertaken by statutory water companies.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which water supplies fall short of the European Economic Community directive in respect of microbiological standards; by how much each supply falls short of the European Economic Community standard; how many people are supplied by each supplier; and what action is being taken in each case to improve standards.

Mrs. Rumbold: Ninety water supply areas fall marginally short of the EC drinking water directive's microbiological standards at present.

	Number of supply areas	People supplied
South West water authority	22	200,000
Yorkshire water authority	68	*750,000

* Approximately.

In the South West, supplementary chlorination is being provided and this will be complete in 1987. In Yorkshire more sophisticated chlorination equipment is being installed at some small spring sources and some service reservoirs are being replaced or repaired over the next few years.

Private House Building (London)

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take to stimulate private sector house building in London.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Housebuilding starts in Greater London rose by more than 52 per cent. between 1979 and 1984 as compared with less than 11 per cent. for England. In two areas, docklands and Thamesmead, there has been substantial growth.

Evidence from the London and South East regional planning conference is that there is a significant amount of housing land available in London. We have taken steps to maximise the release of this land for building. Land registers highlight the under-use of land held by public bodies, and we have urged public bodies to sell land on a profit-sharing basis to encourage development.

Urban development grant is available for private house building schemes which address the problems of deprived urban areas and which would not go ahead without grant.

Pollution

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those areas of Britain having the ten highest and the ten lowest background soil levels of polychlorinated biphenyls and 2,3,7,8 tetrachlorodibenzodioxin.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am not aware of any comprehensive survey of soil levels of PCBs or of 2,3,7,8 tetrachlorodibenzodioxin in Britain. Hence there is no satisfactory basis on which to single out the ten highest and the ten lowest concentrations of these chemicals in soil.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which agencies are responsible for setting permitted levels for human exposure to polychlorinated biphenyls, polychlorinated dibenzodioxins and polychlorinated dibenzofurans in milk, fat, soil and drinking water and with what frequency these levels are reviewed.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Agriculture and Health Departments are responsible for coordinating the monitoring of levels of contaminants in food, including milk and animal fat. There are no specified maximum permitted levels for polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs), polychlorinated dibenzodioxins (PCDDs) or polychlorinated dibenzofurans (PCDFs) in foodstuffs.

Permitted levels of these substances in soil are not set in the United Kingdom. The interdepartmental committee on the redevelopment of contaminated land advises on the problems of redeveloping contaminated sites generally.

A maximum allowable concentration for PCBs in drinking water (0·1 microgram per litre) is set by the EEC Directive 80/778/EEC which came into force in July this year. The Department of the Environment is responsible for implementing this directive in the United Kingdom but any review of the levels set by the Directive is a matter for the European Commission. There are no specified maximum allowable levels for PCDDs or PCDFs in drinking water.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those districts in which domestic refuse incinerators have been tested for the polychlorinated biphenyls, dioxin and furan content of flue gases; what was the temperature of combustion in each case; on which dates or with what frequency the tests have been made; and what were the concentrations and isomers of any polychlorinated dibenzodioxins or polychlorinated dibenzofurans detected.

Mrs. Rumbold: A programme of investigation is currently under way, based on analysis of stack emissions, initially from municipal waste incinerators located in Gateshead, Bristol, Coventry, Wolverhampton and Sheffield. When the investigation has been completed and the results assessed, a report will be published. It is expected that this will be in the latter half of 1986. In addition, tests have been carried out on the Edmonton incinerator on behalf of the Greater London council.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recommendations he issues as to the technical detail of incinerators for the incineration of polychlorinated biphenyls and other toxic waste.

Mrs. Rumbold: General advice on the appropriate conditions for incineration of "PCB" wastes has been given in DOE Waste Management Paper No. 6. Technical advice is also available from Her Majesty's Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if flue gases from combustion plants and industrial premises other than municipal refuse incinerators have been tested for polychlorinated dibenzodioxins, polychlorinated biphenyls and polychlorinated dibenzofurans content.

Mrs. Rumbold: Her Majesty's Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate has carried out a number of such tests at registered chemical incineration works. Tests have also been carried out at various other installations.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what procedures exist for the regular or continuous monitoring of the polychlorinated biphenyl, polychlorinated dibenzodioxin and polychlorinated dibenzofuran content of flue gas emissions from combustion plants, industrial premises and municipal refuse incinerators; and if he plans any changes in these arrangements.

Mrs. Rumbold: Spot sampling is carried out by Her Majesty's Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate in addition to monitoring checks by the operators themselves. Research to establish continuous monitoring techniques for emissions from chemical incineration works has been commissioned from the Harwell laboratory. Research to develop sampling techniques for application to municipal waste incinerators has been commissioned from the Warren Spring laboratory.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for all those United Kingdom incinerators licensed to burn polychlorinated biphenyls, the maximum sustainable temperature for each incinerator.

Mrs. Rumbold: There are three commercially available high-temperature incinerators licensed to burn polychlorinated biphenyls in the United Kingdom. Only two are currently being operated for the combustion of PCBs. The temperature of each incinerator varies according to its construction materials and operating practices. The maximum refractory temperature is about 1200°C with flame temperature several hundred degrees higher. Information of the kind sought is not centrally available for the various "in-house" facilities licensed to burn waste of this type.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the maximum daily throughput of each United Kingdom incinerator licensed to burn polychlorinated biphenyls.

Mrs. Rumbold: None. It would be for waste disposal authorities in the first instance to consider whether there should be any such limit in the terms of the licence issued by them. However, control over gaseous emissions from such premises is a matter for Her Majesty's Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total tonnage of polychlorinated biphenyl materials imported into the United Kingdom for destruction during each of the past 10 years; and what proportion of the total was incinerated at each licensed site.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what he estimates will be the total tonnage and likely sources of polychlorinated biphenyls likely to require destruction in the United Kingdom during each of the next 10 years.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is impossible to estimate reliably on an annual basis over the next 10 years the total tonnage of polychlorinated biphenyls likely to require destruction in the United Kingdom. However the sources of PCBs are likely in the main to be redundant electrical transformers and capacitors.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current position regarding the import into the United Kingdom of polychlorinated biphenyl materials for incineration; and if he will list the countries of origin and the quantities of such material.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department are not aware of any imports of polychlorinated biphenyl materials for incineration in the United Kingdom within the last six months.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, by tonnes of material per six month period, the quantity of hazardous wastes incinerated at registered plants in the United Kingdom between January 1980 and June 1985.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information in the form requested is not available.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the existing code of practice for polychlorinated biphenyl disposal, as outlined in section 8 of Waste Management Paper No. 6, provides for adequate furnace residence times and temperatures to guarantee the complete destruction of polychlorinated biphenyls.

Mrs. Rumbold: Trials supervised by Her Majesty's industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate have been carried out since the publication of Waste Management Paper No. 6 on all commercially available high-temperature incineration plants in the United Kingdom. These plants have demonstrated a destruction efficiency of more than 99·999 per cent., and polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins (PCDDs) and polychlorinated dibenzon-furans (PCDFs) in the emissions have been consistently below the analytical limit of detection.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the progress of current research to assess background levels of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls in soil and groundwater; and what plans he has to extend the existing database.

Mrs. Rumbold: The accurate analysis of polychlorinated dibenzodioxin (PCDDs) and polychlorinated dibenzofuran (PCDF) levels in soil is a difficult and costly procedure. My Department is currently supporting research work to refine the analytical procedure for the extraction, separation and subsequent quantitative determination of these chemicals in soil. Once this has been achieved, soil samples will be analysed from various sites selected to establish the range of background levels in the United Kingdom. There are no plans to measure background levels of PCDDs or PCDFs in groundwater. In view of the extremely low solubility of these chemicals in water, significant contamination is unlikely and this is not considered an appropriate medium to monitor.

Land Disposal (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which land currently owned by the Greater London council will be disposed of in order to establish a trust fund for making grants to eligible charities.

Mr. Tracey: We expect that some of the property which passes to the London Residuary Body at abolition will be surplus and can be disposed of. It is from the proceeds of these disposals that the trust fund is intended to be established.

Isle of Dogs

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) in relation to the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, what will be the effect of the proposed development scheme on the silhouette of the Tower of London as seen from London bridge;

(2) in relation to the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, what studies have been carried out on its visual impact (a) when seen from the Royal Observatory and Green park and (b) upon the Royal Naval college and the Queen's house; and how will this vista be affected;

(3) in relation to the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, what studies have been undertaken of the impact of the proposals on views along the River Thames; and what are the effects;

(4) in relation to the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, what studies have been done to determine if the proposed structures will be visible from hill tops in north or south London;

(5) if the proposed structures at the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone will be visible from Richmond park.

Sir George Young: London Docklands Development Corporation, which is the local planning and Enterprise Zone authority for the area, has commissioned further studies to supplement the work that the developers have already undertaken on these issues, as part of a wider assessment of the scheme. Final agreement to the development will not be given until the corporation is satisfied on these and other points.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone falls within a preferred office location in the Greater London development plan as approved by the Secretary of State in 1976.

Sir George Young: No. When the Greater London development plan was approved in 1976, the West India docks, of which Canary wharf forms a part, were still open for cargo handling.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how the proposals for the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone will affect the outstanding office permissions or commitments in central London.

Sir George Young: At this stage, it is not possible to tell.

Greater London Council

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to arrange for all the surplus accruing from the disposal of Greater London council properties to be distributed to the London boroughs.

Mr. Tracey: In general proceeds from the sale of surplus property will pass to London boroughs or other successor authorities. Some will, however, pass to a charitable trust to be established under section 49 of the Local Government Act 1985.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which functions of the London Residuary Body will be funded during its first year of operation by means of levies on successor bodies and which by means of direct charging.

Mr. Tracey: The main costs to be met by charges will be debt charges, except those in respect of certain mortgages, directly attributable superannuation costs and, subject to decisions by the body in consultation with successor authorities, the costs of any professional and technical services provided by the body. The levy on the boroughs will meet any costs not met from charges.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what Greater London council computers and fixed equipment have been identified for transfer to the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Tracey: The Government's proposals for the transfer of all tangible property at abolition were set out in property memorandum No. 2, issued on 3 September 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment who are currently members of the London Residuary Body; and what remuneration or expenses will be received by each in the current financial year.

Mr. Tracey: Sir Godfrey Taylor, Mr. Alan Blakemore CBE, Mr. Jack Esling, Mr. Wallace Mackenzie OBE and Mr. Jack Wolkind CBE were appointed to the London Residuary Body on 12 August 1985, and Councillor Peter Bowness was appointed on 1 October 1985. Remuneration is being paid at the following rates — Sir Godfrey Taylor, £50,000 per annum, Mr. Esling, £18,927 per annum, Mr. Blakemore, Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Wolkind, £12,000 per annum, and Councillor Bowness £6,000 per annum.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for which categories of contracts the London Residuary Body will assume responsibility on the abolition of the Greater London council.

Mr. Tracey: All outstanding contractual rights and liabilities of the GLC will be assumed by the London Residuary Body unless transferred to successor authorities by order under section 100 of the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what will be the role of the London Residuary Body in respect of the Greater London mobility scheme;

(2) what arrangements will be made for the body running the Greater London mobility scheme to monitor and amend the way in which the scheme's computer records are kept in order to ensure that the equal opportunities provisions are maintained and implemented effectively;

(3) what arrangements are being made to safeguard the control systems of the Greater London mobility scheme whilst its operation is managed by the London Residuary Body.

Sir George Young: Subject to negotiations with the local authority associations, the London Residuary Body may have a temporary role as employers of staff and providers of accommodation and equipment, until permanent arrangements are made. Records and control systems will be the responsibility of the body running the scheme.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the total costs of establishing the London Residuary Body's offices in central London.

Mr. Tracey: The costs incurred before the London Residuary Body's appointed day are expected to amount to some £6,000. Costs incurred after that date are a matter for the residuary body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which body will be responsible for the payment of housing benefit to Thamesmead residents while Thamesmead is in the ownership of the London Residuary Body.

Sir George Young: Bexley and Greenwich councils, the local authorities within whose boundaries Thamesmead falls.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how the London Residuary Body will determine rent levels for the housing stock at Thamesmead currently owned by the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: We expect the London Residuary Body to have only temporary responsibility for Thamesmead during which time it will levy current rent levels.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the total number of permanent staff directly employed by the London Residuary Body as at 30 September;

(2) what information he has as to how many of the jobs in the London Residuary Body are held by residents of Greater London;

(3) when consultations with the London boroughs will take place concerning the London Residuary Body review of the professional and technical services provided by the Greater London council, as required by paragraph 8(2)(b) of schedule 13 to the Local Government Act 1985;

(4) when the London Residuary Body will commence the review of professional and technical services provided by the Greater London council under paragraph 8(2)(a) of schedule 13 to the Local Government Act 1985;

(5) what information he has as to how many people from black or other ethnic minority communities are employed by the London Residuary Body and at what grades;

(6) how many women are employed by the London Residuary Body, and at what grades;

(7) in relation to the London Residuary Body's own employment practices, whether personnel are specifically employed to shortlist and appoint staff;

(8) on what basis rents currently set by the Greater London council will be reviewed and varied by the London Residuary Body;

(9) in relation to the London Residuary Body's employment practices, what arrangements there are for advertising posts in the London Residuary Body; and, in particular, in which black and ethnic minority newspapers advertisements are being placed;

(10) whether the London Residuary Body's own employment practices, make provision for maternity and paternity leave;

(11) in relation to the London Residuary Body's own employment practices whether there are clauses in contracts of employment specifying that racial and sexual harassment at work is a disciplinary issue;

(12) whether the post of chief executive in the London Residuary Body was advertised nationally;

(13) what meetings have taken place between the London Residuary Body and the co-ordinating committee, committees of London boroughs and other successor bodies;

(14) what motor vehicles are at the disposal of the London Residuary Body; and what is the total estimated cost in the current financial year;

(15) how many people with disabilities are employed by the London Residuary Body and at what grades;

(16) what is the London Residuary Body's budget for the current financial year with a detailed breakdown of expenditure under different headings;

(17) into what sectional and divisional structure the staff of the London Residuary Body are organised;

(18) if he will list the consultants used by the London Residuary Body to date for staff recruitment and the consultancy fees incurred;

(19) what is the total number of temporary staff directly employed by the London Residuary Body as at 30 September;

(20) as at 30 September, how many Greater London council and former Greater London council employees are working for the London Residuary Body (a) on a full-time basis, (b) under a dual appointment arrangement, (c) under an agency agreement and (d) on a shared time basis between the Greater London council and the London Residuary Body;

(21) how much has been spent by the London Residuary Body on hospitality, public relations and personal expenses since its establishment;

(22) when he anticipates that the London Residuary Body will give a provisional estimate of its budget and levy;

(23) whether there are any proposals to relocate the London Residuary Body after 31 March 1986;

(24) if the London Residuary Body keeps a register which indicates the number of homosexual men and women employed;

(25) how many applications were received for the secretarial posts advertised recently for the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Tracey: These are all matters for the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how long he expects responsibility for Thamesmead to rest with the London Residuary Body.

Sir George Young: For a short period only.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to make an order to effect the transfer of property at Thamesmead currently owned by the Greater London council to the London Residuary Body.

Sir George Young: By virtue of section 62 of the Local Government Act 1985 all GLC properties will pass at abolition to the London Residuary Body unless they have been transferred elsewhere by order.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to issue a transfer order to effect the transfer of staff currently employed by the Greater London council in connection with Thamesmead to the employ of the London Residuary Body.

Sir George Young: We do not intend to decide the exact means for the transfer of the GLC's Thamesmead staff until the long-term arrangements for the area have been finalised.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if it remains his policy to seek the consent of individual mortgagors under the Greater London council's mortgage account before each loan is transferred from the London Residuary Body to any alternative body.

Sir George Young: Yes, so far as voluntary transfers during the life of the residuary body are concerned. Arrangements for the disposal of any assets remaining when the residuary body is wound up are still under consideration.

Waste Disposal (Lond)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many London boroughs have now submitted proposals for practical arrangements for transfer of waste disposal functions; and what proportion of London's population they represent.

Mrs. Rumbold: Six London boroughs and the City of London have submitted practicable proposals for two voluntary groupings for waste disposal operations. In addition, four London boroughs have invited the setting up of a statutory joint authority for their area. Thirteen other boroughs have made various proposals which either have not achieved sufficient support or which do not appear to be satisfactory. In all, authorities representing three quarters of the population of Greater London have made proposals.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial information relating to economy, efficiency and effectiveness he is considering or has considered on the different options for providing waste disposal services in London after 1 April 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: All relevant information available will be taken into account.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement further to his Department's note of guidance on arrangements for co-ordinating licensing control planning and research and development for waste disposal in the London area.

Mrs. Rumbold: No proposals commanding general acceptance have so far been received. Unless the situation changes, it will fall to the Secretary of State to consider the setting up of joint statutory arrangements in pursuance of section 10 of the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the likely costs to the London borough of Newham of the waste disposal service after 1 April 1986 compared with that borough's present contribution to the service provided by the Greater London council.

Mrs. Rumbold: The costs of waste disposal in any London borough after the abolition of the Greater London council will depend on the policies and practices of the authorities which become responsible.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many London borough councils submitted proposals for the future of the waste disposal service in Greater London by his Department's deadline of 30 September; how many have submitted proposals since that date; and how many of the submissions made indicated unqualified support for his Department's proposals for seven voluntary groupings.

Mrs. Rumbold: Twenty three London boroughs and the City of London submitted proposals either before or shortly after 30 September. Most of the submissions did not address themselves to the question whether there should be seven voluntary groupings in London.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet in a position to indicate what the arrangements for waste disposal in London will be after 1 April 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: This would be premature as under the terms of section 10 of the Local Government Act 1985, the Secretary of State cannot take a final and complete view on the arrangements to be made until 15 November 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what savings will result from his proposals to split London's waste disposal service into seven groups.

Mrs. Rumbold: Savings resulting from the abolition of the Greater London council, on waste disposal as on other functions, will depend on the economy, efficiency and effectiveness with which successor authorities carry them out.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish studies on the risks attendant in sea dumping and nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: I assume the hon. Member refers to the study of best practicable environmental options for the management of low and intermediate-level radioactive wastes which my Department is currently undertaking. I hope to publish the report of the study early next year.

London Ecology Centre

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current situation regarding the future of the London Ecology Centre.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will answer this question shortly.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much his Department has spent on office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decoration in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Prior to 1983-84 Departments were not charged separately for office furniture, curtains and carpets, nor for maintenance work undertaken by PSA on their estates.

For 1983-84 and 1984-85 the information for DOE Central is as follows:

	Supplies Items £	Office Decoration £
1983-84	*920,658	†
1984-85	*1,123,382	†

Notes:

* Expenditure on supplies, which includes office furniture curtains and carpets, is not separately itemised.

† It is not possible to separate the cost of office decoration from other maintenance work.

The information for the rest of the Department is not readily available.

London Co-ordinating Committee

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what matters the London Co-ordinating Committee (a) has considered and advised him on and (b) has still to consider.

Mr. Tracey: The co-ordinating committee is under no obligation to offer my right hon. Friend advice, or to inform him of its discussions.

Planning (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional capacity is being created in his Department to handle his responsibilities under the Local Government Act 1985 for issuing strategic planning guidance to the London boroughs; what is the staffing complement of any new unit; and what is the annual cost.

Mr. Tracey: I am augmenting my Department's Greater London regional office with a new unit to prepare strategic planning guidance for Greater London. The unit is at present expected to comprise 7 people, with an annual staff and accommodation cost of about £160,000; it will be able to draw upon support from elsewhere in the Department; and consultants may be employed on particular tasks. The cost of these additional contributions cannot be estimated at this stage.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to issue his first strategic planning guidance to the London boroughs; whether it will be London-wide; and what issues it will cover.

Mr. Tracey: The timing and content of strategic guidance will be decided in the light of consultation with the joint planning committee for Greater London when that is established and with other bodies including the London and South East Regional Planning Conference.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has given to the Central Office of Information as to where, after 1 April 1986, overseas visitors wishing to explore and discuss current planning developments in Greater London will be directed.

Mr. Tracey: None. My Department is, however, always willing to give advice.

Rates (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what options he has considered in order to phase out the proposed London rate equalisation scheme after 1986-87;

(2) if he will ensure that the proposed extended London rate equalisation scheme will not be phased out in such a way that results in a greater rate burden being placed upon London's inner city partnership areas.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has considered no proposal to phase out the London-wide rate equalisation scheme (LRES) after 1986-87. The London Boroughs Association has suggested that the overall level of the extended scheme should be reduced systematically over a run of years after 1986-87, to reflect potential savings compared to the present level of expenditure by the GLC. My right hon. Friend has accepted in principle that this might be appropriate, but any decisions about the LRES pool in future would be subject to the outcome of the statutory consultations on the scheme for each financial year.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to the percentage of houses built on London Docklands Development Corporation-owned land during 1984-85 which were priced at under £40,000;

(2) what information he has as to the average price for a three-bedroom house in docklands in 1984-85.

Sir George Young: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as the information is available.

Unitary Development Plans

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the regulations governing the preparation of unitary development plans will be issued.

Mr. Tracey: Regulations will be made before the first order is made under section 4 of the Local Government Act 1985 bringing into force in any area schedule 1 of the Act which requires the preparation of unitary development plans.

Radioactive Mud (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment where the radioactive Windscale mud deposited by Greenpeace outside the Department of the Environment was disposed of; what route it took; what tests and precautions took place; and whether any consultations were made with the respective local authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: Exhaustive tests indicated that the material deposited by Greenpeace outside the Department of the Environment on 26 February 1985 was not radioactive waste and that it presented no hazard to the public or to those handling it. It was therefore disposed of by a private waste disposal contractor who was responsible for arranging for its transport and burial at a commercial landfill site. There was no occasion for consultations with local authorities.

County Hall

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what future uses of County hall have been considered by his Department.

Mr. Tracey: It will be for the London Residuary Body to consider the future use of County hall.

Written Answers to Questions

PRIME MINISTER

General Belgrano

Q8. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what recommendations of the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on the circumstances of the sinking of the General Belgrano have now been implemented by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs told the hon. Member on 24 July, the Government will respond in the normal way to this report. It would be wrong of me to anticipate our reply, which will be published shortly.

Queen's Speech (Implementation)

Q12. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister which matters on which Government action was promised in the Queen's Speech have not yet been brought to a conclusion.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Our legislative programme is close to a successful conclusion. We have not proceeded with two measures in connection with the review of Crown court sentences and corporal punishment in schools. We have pursued with vigour our aims in the fields of foreign affairs, defence and the economy, as announced in the Gracious Speech. Where these have not been of a nature to be brought to a conclusion within a fixed time, action continues.

Middle East

Q60. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her visits to the middle east during the summer recess.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 21 October at column 10.

EC (Treaty of Union)

Q95. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if a date has yet been fixed for the special meeting of the Council of Ministers to discuss the draft treaty of European union; and if she will make a statement

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The inter-governmental conference on the future development of the European Community met on 9 September and again this week.

Third World (Aid)

Q106. Miss Maynard asked the Prime Minister what has been the United Kingdom's level of aid to the Third world in each of the past six years.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Gross public expenditure on overseas aid for the last six calendar years has been as follows:

	£ million
1979	939
1980	966
1981	1,151
1982	1,085
1983	1,173
1984	1,311

Engagements

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 October.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 October.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 October.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is attending the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in the Bahamas.

Teachers (Scotland)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on Government policy concerning the Scottish teachers' pay dispute.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement this afternoon by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Ministerial Powers

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister what are the respective responsibilities of (a) departmental legal advisers and (b) the Law Officers of the Crown for advising whether draft regulations accord with ministerial powers under primary legislation.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The primary responsibility for advising a Minister on whether subordinate legislation which he proposes to make would be intra vires rests with his departmental legal advisers, or if his Department does not have its own legal staff, with the Treasury Solicitor. In appropriate cases a second opinion may be sought from Treasury Counsel or other counsel nominated by the Attorney-General. However, the Attorney-General—or the Lord Advocate for questions involving the law of Scotland—is the Government's principal legal adviser, and departmental advisers are aware that they should consult the Law Officers in good time before the Government are committed to critical decisions involving legal considerations and in particular when a Department's legal adviser is in doubt concerning the vires of proposed subordinate legislation.

TRANSPORT

Road Planning

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport when a decision will be made on Warwickshire county council's plan to use part of the M45 motorway for a bypass for the village of Dunchurch.

Mrs. Chalker: I am awaiting Warwickshire county council's detailed proposals. When these have been received they will be carefully considered. I will announce my decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there are any plans for increasing the number of lanes on the M6 motorway between its junction with the M1 and junction 4.

Mrs. Chalker: We have no plans for increasing the number of lanes on this length of the M6.

M25 (Defects)

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the arrangements for meeting the cost of rectification of defects which have occurred in the concrete carriageway of the Reigate to Leatherhead section of the M25.

Mrs. Chalker: Under the provisions of the contract, it is for the Department's consulting engineers, W. S. Atkins and Partners, who are the engineer for the contract, to determine where the responsibility lies. That determination will be binding unless referred to arbitration by the Department or the contractor.

I have no contractual powers to impose a timetable on the engineer to produce his determination, although I have explained I would like it to be dealt with expeditiously. This is, however, a complex technical matter which requires thorough investigation and careful consideration. I will inform my hon. Friend of the engineer's determination when it is issued.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Overseas Students (Language Courses)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of polytechnics and colleges of further education are charging the recommended fees for English as a foreign language course run by the public sector for overseas students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Educational and Professional Qualifications

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the percentage of residents in England without degrees or professional qualifications.

Mr. Brooke: The percentage of residents in England, aged 18 and over, without degrees, professional or other higher education qualifications was 90·3 according to the 1981 census of population.

Universities (Grants)

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list grants made available to universities in Great Britain in the financial year 1984-85, on the advice of the University Grants Committee and of the computer board.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information requested is as follows:

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EUREKA

49. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current position on the EUREKA strategic defence research project.

Mr. Pattie: EUREKA is not a strategic defence research project. The EUREKA initiative now engages the Governments of all the present and acceding members of the European Community, Austria, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and Turkey, as well as the European Commission.

There is a broad consensus that most EUREKA projects should have as their objective the exploitation of advanced technologies through the development and marketing of products and processes with a profitable global sales potential, where this can more effectively be achieved within Europe on a co-operative basis. There is also a broad consensus among Government that a more closely integrated European market can make an important contribution to the success of EUREKA projects.

My Department has been in close consultation with United Kingdom industry to ensure that EUREKA is shaped by industry's needs. With its guidance, we have identified six market/product areas in which specific collaborative projects could emerge in due course.

EUREKA projects will serve civilian purposes.

Fireworks (Injuries)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many children (a) aged under 13 years and (b) aged between 13 and 15 years were injured by fireworks in 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Howard: A table showing the number of people who required hospital treatment for injuries caused by fireworks in 1982, 1983 and 1984 was published in the Official Report on 12 March 1985. For the hon. Member's convenience, the number of children involved were:

	1982	1983	1984
Aged under 13 years	265	337	281
Aged 13-15 years	149	173	208

British National Space Centre

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he hopes to make a statement regarding the establishment of the British national space centre.

Mr. Pattie: I welcome the wide support there has been to the Government's intention to create such a centre which will enable it soon to make an early and vigorous start. I anticipate being able to say more by about mid-November.

Motor Industry

404. Mr Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what share of the home market for motor cars is taken by the motor industry in Britain; and what information he has as to the comparable figures for France, Italy and Germany.

Mr. Butcher: The following is the most recent available information:—

Percentage share taken by home manufacturers in their passenger car markets
United Kingdom	41·5	(year to September 1985)
France	65·3	(year to June 1985)
Italy	60·3	(year to June 1985)
West Germany	69·6	(year to June 1985)

Trade Statistics

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the share of United Kingdom exports and imports attributable to manufactured and semi-manufactured goods in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985, respectively;

(2) what was the United Kingdom share of world exports in (a) manufactures and (b) total trade in 1955, 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Industry Council

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the outcome of the Industry Council on 17 October.

Mr Peter Morrison: I represented the United Kingdom at this council, which had initial discussions on the system of market organisation for the EC steel industry after 1985, and on restrictions on state aid for steel after 1985. No decisions were reached, and a further council meeting will take place on 29 October.

The council also adopted a declaration expressing very great concern about the unacceptable attitude being adopted by the USA in current negotiations on EC steel exports to the USA.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Speeches (Reprints)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Lord Privy Seal if arrangements can be made for reprints of hon. Members' speeches to reach them in less than six weeks after being ordered.

Mr. Biffen: Normally, reprints of such speeches should be delivered within a week of being ordered. Where proof-checking is required, they should be available within three weeks. I am aware of the problems experienced by the right hon. Gentleman and steps have been taken to ensure that they do not recur.

Telephones

Mr. Skinner asked the Leader of the House what was the total outturn cost, including labour costs, of the new telephone system installed throughout the Houses of Parliament and adjoining parliamentary office buildings.

Mr. Biffen: The final outturn costs of the new telephone system, including labour costs, are not yet available, but the indications are that they will be within the estimated costs contained in the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 26 June at column 401.

SCOTLAND

Forestry

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on forestry.

Mr. John MacKay: The Government's policy on forestry continues to be based on the statement made to the House by my right hon. Friend on 10 December 1980. A number of statements have been made by my right hon. Friend since then on developments relating to particular aspects of forestry policy. These were as follows:

	Date
Forestry grants	28 July 1981

Oak Wilt

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what contingency plans his Department is making to seek to contain any outbreaks of oak wilt in the event of the disease spreading to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has drawn up contingency plans, after consultations with local authorities. If the disease did appear in Great Britain, the commission would take swift action to contain it through its powers under the Tree Pests (Great Britain) Order 1980.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether there is any evidence of oak wilt spreading from the United States of America to the United Kingdom.

Mr. John MacKay: There is no evidence of oak wilt spreading from the United States to the United Kingdom, or indeed to any other country. I understand that the disease is quiescent in most parts of the United States, and at a very low level in the timber-producing forests.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what liaison is taking place between his Department and the appropriate authorities in the United States of America on the question of oak wilt.

Mr. John MacKay: Forestry Commission representatives are in close contact with United States plant health officials, mainly through the EC Standing Committee on Plant Health. Two Forestry Commission officials participated in an EC fact-finding visit to the USA earlier this year and a Forestry Commission scientist is the co-ordinator of an EC expert group on the disease.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what effective measures his Department is aware of for controlling the fungus responsible for oak wilt.

Mr. John MacKay: A variety of measures has proved effective in the United States, depending on the degree of control required. These include the destruction of all diseased material by felling and burning, the isolation of infected trees by root-trenching and the selective use of fungicides and insecticides.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what machinery exists to examine imported oak from the United States of America at ports of entry into the United Kingdom for signs of oak wilt.

Mr. John MacKay: Oak imports from north America are subject to inspection at ports of entry by Forestry Commission plant health inspectors.

Degrees and Professional Qualifications

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the percentage of residents in Scotland without degrees or professional qualifications.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The 1981 census sample indicated that the percentage of residents in Scotland aged 18 and over without degrees or professional qualifications was 89·7.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Falkland Islands

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date he received the detailed joint document from the Government of the Falkland Islands and the Falklands Development Corporation concerning land subdivision; and when he expects to reach decisions on these proposals.

Mr. Raison: The document was received in January of this year and has been the basis of our continuing discussions with the authorities in the Falkland Islands.

PAYMASTER GENERAL

Miss Juliet Kent

Mr. Rooker asked the Paymaster General when he expects the Wages Inspectorate to commence civil proceedings for the recovery of wages owed to Miss Juliet Kent of Birmingham, details of whose case have been supplied to him.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Action is already in hand to recover the arrears by civil proceedings.

ENERGY

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will detail the projects and cost of assistance given to signatories of the non-proliferation treaty under the footnote A provisions; to which purposes of development each item was directed; what plans he has for further allocations; and what criteria he uses in this form of assistance.

Mr. Goodlad: Details of footnote A projects which have been funded by the United Kingdom are set out below. All such projects meet the requirements of the International Atomic Energy Agency for projects eligible for technical assistance that they should serve to "accelerate and enlarge the contribution of atomic energy to peace, health and prosperity in Member States" of the agency. Since 1980 the United Kingdom has provided $1·2 million for footnote A projects.

In his recent statement to the non-proliferation treaty review conference in Geneva my hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs announced that the United Kingdom intended to double the amount of money contributed by the United Kingdom through the IAEA footnote A system over the period up to 1990. In determining which projects the United Kingdom will support in this manner the paramount criterion is that the recipient state should be a party to the NPT. The agency's own screening process provides assurance that the project proposals are technically sound. Preference is given to projects where there is the possibility of the United Kingdom supplying the experts or equipment required.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Race Relations

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when and in what form he expects the response to the content and proposals contained in the paper, "The Race Relations Act 1976 — Time for Change?" published by the Commission for Racial Equality.

Mr. Waddington: The Government believe that it is essential to maintain effective laws against racial discrimination. We are, therefore, examining very carefully the proposals for changes in the current law which were sent to the Secretary of State in June 1985. It is too soon to say when we will be in a position to make a substantive response to them.

Amphetamines

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in (a) Mid Glamorgan, (b) South Glamorgan and (c) Gwent have been charged with (i) possession of and (ii) supplying amphetamines in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information, which relates to court proceedings in police force areas, is given in the following table.

Persons proceeded against in the Gwent and South Wales police force areas for unlawful possession or supply of amphetamines*

Number of persons

Police force area and type of offence	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Gwent
Unlawful possession	5	10	22	10	15
Possession with intent to supply unlawfully	—	1	2	1	2
Unlawful supply	—	—	1	—	—
South Wales
Unlawful possession	7	16	36	85	106
Possession with intent to supply unlawfully	1	6	3	20	13
Unlawful supply	1	1	—	11	9

* As the same person may be proceeded against for more than one offence, rows cannot be added together to produce totals.

Charities Act 1985

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make an order to bring into force the Charities Act 1985.

Mr. Hurd: I have made an order to bring the Charities Act 1985 into effect on 1 January 1986. A circular of guidance will be issued shortly to local authorities on the provisions of the Act.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Isle of Dogs

Mr. Spearing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the loss of income to the Treasury arising from exemption from development land tax and exemption from tax on construction costs of the scheme for 10 million sq ft of commercial floor space in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone currently under consideration by the London Docklands Development Corporation.

Mr. Moore: No such estimate is possible. Development land tax has been abolished, while the value of the initial allowance for tax purposes of 100 per cent. of the capital costs of constructing industrial and commercial buildings within an enterprise zone will depend on a number of factors, including the individual circumstances of those persons entitled to the relief.

Government Departments (Costs)

Mr. Chope asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any further announcement to make about the control of expenditure on the running costs of Government Departments.

Mr. MacGregor: My predecessor announced the Government's intention to set targets for the control of running costs in Departments on 24 May 1985. The Government propose to set limits on running costs for each Department, for the financial year 1986-87 and following years, to determine the cash available to finance departmental expenditure on administration.

These limits will be set at a level which continues to apply firm control on aggregate running costs, taking account of the factors expected to affect each Department's paybill and other administrative costs. This will replace the single centrally imposed assumption about the pay increases for central Government groups (the "pay assumption") which has been applied in previous years.

These limits on total running cost expenditure will be announced to Parliament, as will details of the Government's proposals on public expenditure, early next year. As with cash limits, Departments will monitor and control their running costs against these agreed limits and if, exceptionally, a limit has to be changed during the year Parliament will be informed.

This change in the method of control of Civil Service costs will have consequences for the presentation of running costs in Estimates. The Government's proposals on this are being discussed with the Public Accounts Committee and the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee.

Venture Capital

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what information he has as to whether the Treasury's definition of the term venture capital is comparable with definitions adopted by other European Economic Community countries;

(2) what is the Treasury's definition of the term venture capital; and whether this includes (a) capital made available to any persons by banks or licensed deposit takers, (b) loan capital, preference share capital or ordinary equity share capital and (c) capital available to persons carrying on trades which are excluded from the scope of the business expansion scheme;

(3) what information he has about any published or unpublished records of the provision and sources of venture capital in the United Kingdom since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 8]: There is no generally accepted comprehensive definition of "venture capital". The essence of venture capital investment is that investors support entrepreneurial talent with finance and often in addition with business skills, frequently from a very early stage in the life of the business.

Venture capital investment can take various forms. Often, a package of financial support is provided which, in addition to ordinary shares, may include preference or convertible preference capital and loans of various kinds.

Venture capital investors include individuals, specialist venture capital organisations, which may be independent private companies or subsidiaries of banks and insurance companies, and other organisations.

The Treasury's "Economic Progress Report" for September-October 1985 quotes figures for the provision of venture capital since 1979, from estimates published in the UK Venture Capital Journal by Venture Economics Ltd. These figures include BES investments by approved investment funds but exclude direct BES investment by individuals, investments made by non-specialist institutions, and private placings arranged by stockbrokers.

The European Venture Capital Association has commissioned a study from Peat Marwick Mitchell and Co. comparing the provision of venture capital in different EC countries which will be published shortly. However, because of institutional differences and other problems, definitions will inevitably not be strictly comparable.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chemical Weapons

50. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning forthcoming negotiations about banning chemical weapons.

Mr. Renton: During the summer session of the conference on disarmament in Geneva 14 papers have been tabled relevant to the negotiations to ban the use of chemical weapons. I am also aware of continuing parliamentary and public interest in a successful outcome to these negotiations.

Departmental Papers

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of his Department's papers have been made available to the public since October 1984.

Mr. Eggar: Since 1 October 1984 the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (excluding the Overseas Development Administration) has made the following papers available to the public on request:

ENVIRONMENT

GLC

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current situation regarding the future of the Greater London council's central purchasing units.

Mr. Tracey: This is a matter for successor authorities, and the London co-ordinating committee is required to consider whether joint arrangements would be advantageous.

Rates

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement of the Government's policy towards the conclusions contained in the paper entitled "Rates in the Future" published by the council of the Rating and Valuation Association, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Waldegrave: We shall take account of the association's views in framing our proposals on the reform of local government finance. We hope to announce those in a consultative document around the turn of the year.

London County Hall (Accommodation)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to the accommodation and its area in square feet which was designed for or has been adapted for specific use of the Inner London education authority and its predecessors together with the approximate number of statutory meetings of that authority and its committees which take place in a normal month and the number of other meetings held under the aegis of that authority in county hall over the same period;

(2) what information he has concerning the approximate square footage of office accommodation at London county hall or its associated premises that is currently used for functions that will continue to be centrally administered by the residuary body or other organisations, including the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Tracey: I understand that ILEA's staff occupy approximately 137,000 sq ft of office space in county hall, and buildings in the immediate vicinity. I do not have information about meetings which the authority holds in county hall or about other GLC office space used for particular functions.

Isle of Dogs

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate, in terms of current rate poundage, the approximate amount of money that will need to be paid to the local authority each year in lieu of rates forgone in respect of each million sq ft of commercial development occupied before 1992 in the scheme for Canary wharf in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone.

Mr. Waldegrave: The proposed development is at a very early stage and it is not yet possible to estimate the rateable value, and hence the amount of rates that will be forgone because of its location in an enterprise zone.

Council House Sales

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will provide further protection against high service charges for public sector tenants who buy their flats under the right to buy.

Mr. John Patten: I have reviewed the current provisions in the light of a number of cases in which purchasers have faced difficulty because of unexpectedly high service charges for repairs. I have concluded that public sector tenants should be more fully informed, before they buy, about the charges they are likely to face, and that a limit should be placed on charges for repairs during the initial years of the lease. I believe also that purchasers should have the right to spread abnormally large payments for repairs over a number of years.

These proposals are set out in a consultation paper which is being issued today. Copies have been placed in the Library.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Social Security Reviews

48. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many submissions he has received to date relating to the social security reviews; and broadly, how many of these are in support of the Government's proposals, and how many are opposed to them.

Mr. Newton: More than 7,000 responses to the Green Paper on social security had been received by 21 October. We are still considering and analysing these responses.

Hospital Telephones

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 2 July, Official Report, column 130, when he intends to bring to the attention of health authorities the Government's view that it is a desirable objective to ensure that all telephones, including patients' trolley telephones, in National Health Service hospitals can be used by people who wear hearing aids.

Mr. Newton: Our view will be brought to the attention of regional works officers at their next regular meeting with the Department in November.

Departmental Offices (Access)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of his Department's offices open to the public are currently maintained; how many of these are accessible to disabled citizens in wheelchairs; and what measures he is taking to ensure that all such offices are accessible to disabled citizens in wheelchairs.

Mr. Newton: There are currently 497 DHSS local offices, of which 359 have arrangements for access by the physically disabled to all public areas. Provision of these facilities in all cases where the cost exceeds £1,000 is the responsibility of the Property Services Agency. It is its policy to ensure that all new buildings commissioned by the agency have satisfactory access facilities for disabled people and that existing buildings are adapted to meet their needs wherever this is practicable and funds permit.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he has made to the representations from the Royal College of Nursing for an urgent national inquiry into the issue of cervical cancer screening.

Mr. Hayhoe: No such representations from the Royal College of Nursing have been received.

District Nurses and Midwives (Car Loans)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his recent advice to health authorities concerning car loans for district nurses and midwives.

Mr. Hayhoe: Health authorities have been asked, when considering requests for discretionary loans for car purchase, to take into account the availability to applicants of loans on reasonable terms from non-National Health Service sources, several of which have indicated their willingness to lend to NHS staff on special terms. As existing loans are repaid a substantial proportion of the £11·5 million currently involved should be spent on services to patients, rather than used to grant new loans.

Nurses (Eviction)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the number of nurses who are being evicted from accommodation because of property sales and the addresses of these properties, together with the hospitals for which the nurses work, in each of the four regional health authorities serving London.

Mr. Hayhoe: No nurses have been so evicted. Staff who are no longer to be offered accommodation will either have the chance to buy at a discount the property they currently live in, or be given at least a year to make alternative arrangements.

Ward Sisters (Pensions)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the difference between the pension which will be paid to a ward sister who retires during the next 18 months taking into account the salary actually paid in 1985-86 and what she would have received had the review body recommendation been paid for the whole of that year.

Mr. Hayhoe: No meaningful estimate can be made: an individual's pension award depends on his or her date of retirement, length of service and final year's superannuable pay which will include allowances and special duty (unsocial hours) payments as well as basic salary.

Lone Parent Families

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the percentage of households with at least one lone parent family with dependent children as a percentage of all households with dependent children in England.

Mr. Whitney: Results from the general household survey published in OPCS Monitor GHS 84/1 indicate that over the period 1981 to 1983 about 13 per cent. of families with dependent children in Great Britain were lone parents with dependent children.

As a very small proportion of households contain more than one family, the figure for households will be about the same as that given above for families. Corresponding information is not available for England alone.

Prescriptions

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in each of the last five years, what has been the average number of prescriptions issued per patient on general practitioner lists in England.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
1980-81	6·5
1981-82	6·6
1982-83	6·8
1983-84	6·9
1984-85	7·0

Single Pensioners

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the percentage of single pensionable households in England.

Mr. Major: Of the total number of households in England there are some 14·15 per cent. with one person of pensionable age usually resident and living alone. (Source 1981 census.)

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, county by county for England, the number and proportion of people classified as (a) drinking to excess, (b) problem drinkers and (c) severely dependent drinkers for each of the last five years.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Dental Amalgam

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the safety of dental amalgam.

Mr. Hayhoe: Dental amalgam has been widely used in this and many other countries for over a century to fill cavities in teeth—over 25 million such treatments were provided under the general dental service in England and Wales in 1983 alone, but very few adverse reactions in patients to amalgam have been reported. Most have been an allergic or sensitivity reaction to mercury which is one of the constituents of amalgam and such patients can have their teeth filled with other materials. I am advised that there is no good scientific evidence which would indicate that any clinically significant amounts of mercury are absorbed by patients from fillings in their teeth. Moreover any small degree of risk has to be offset against the substantial benefits of a material which has been proved to be long lasting, convenient for dentists to use and can be produced at relatively low cost. No other modern material has yet been proved as suitable and convenient for most fillings where appearance is not a consideration.

The potential risk to dentists and their staff from the mishandling of mercury in dental practice is well recognised and can be minimised by taking adequate precautions. Guidelines on the safe handling of mercury prepared by the British Dental Association were last revised and issued in the autumn of 1982.

Whilst there is therefore no convincing evidence of any obvious health effect on the vast majority of patients nevertheless it is helpful to have a comprehensive review of the evidence from time to time. For this reason I have asked the committees on toxicity and on dental and surgical materials to consider the evidence on the risks and benefits and to let me have their advice in due course.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was paid out in exceptionally severe weather payments in 1984-85 and how many claimants benefited.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1985, c. 412]: About £1·7 million was paid to around 170,000 supplementary benefit claimants for extra fuel used during the period of exceptionally severe weather at the beginning of 1985.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Inmates (Work)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sort of work has been done by persons convicted of scheduled offences and serving sentences in the Maze prison, where the prisoners are or are believed to be members of (a) the Provisional Irish Republican Army, (b) the Official Irish Republican Army, (c) the Irish Republican Socialist Party, (d) the Irish National Liberation Army, (e) the Ulster Defence Association, (f) the Ulster Volunteer Force and (g) other terrorist organisations in (i) 1981, (ii) 1982, (iii) 1983, (iv) 1984 and (v) 1985; and if there are any kinds of work which the prisoners refused to do.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: This information is not available.

Prison Inmates (Clothing)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether persons convicted of scheduled offences and imprisoned in Northern Ireland have the right to wear their own clothes and excercise that right.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: All prisoners in Northern Ireland may wear their own clothes if they wish, and most of them do so. Within reasonable limits a wide variety of types and designs of private clothing is allowed. But clothing which resembles that of prison officers, is tantamount to a uniform, or is otherwise offensive or unsuitable is nor permitted.

Maze Prison (Civilian Instructors)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why it was decided to terminate the employment of civilian instructors at the Maze prison; how long it has been since they actually gave instruction to prisoners there where the prisoners concerned were members of terrorist organisations; what savings he expects as a result of their dismissal; and what the cost of employing them has been in each year since they last gave regular instruction to prisoners who were members of terrorist organisations.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: The civilian instructors have not been required to instruct inmates in industrial tasks in Maze (cellular) prison, except on a few occasions, since the escape in September 1983. It was not economical to continue to employ them for a minimal amount of work, and it was therefore decided that they should be declared redundant.

The total cost of employing the civilian instructors since September 1983 has been as follows:

Period	Amount £
25 September 1983 to 31 March 1984	147,298
1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985	293,659
1 April 1985 to 30 September 1985	136,429

Maze Prison (Free Association)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sort of free association is presently enjoyed by prisoners convicted of scheduled offences at the Maze prison; when it was introduced; and what groups enjoy such free association.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: Since 1976 all sentenced prisoners have been allowed three hours' association each evening, and also periods of association on Saturday and Sunday afternoons and on public holidays. In addition, prisoners are able to associate during exercise and at meal times.

Maze Prison (Convicted Terrorists)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any groups of terrorist prisoners in the Maze prison are allowed one letter, one visit and one parcel per week and can arrange their own recreational activities.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: Since 1976 all prisoners in Maze (cellular), other than those who have forfeited privileges as punishment for an offence against prison rules, have been allowed to send out two letters each week at public expense and are permitted one weekly parcel. Prisoners receive one statutory and three privilege visits in each four-week period.

Prisoners are not compelled to participate in exercise or association. They may if they wish remain locked in their cells. Within the association room, prisoners may choose how to spend their time subject to the requirements of security and control.

Prison Inmates (Remission)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether Her Majesty's Government plan to restore the remaining 50 per cent. of remission lost by prisoners in the Maze prison during the hunger strike, or to provide conditions under which it would be restored; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: At the end of the hunger strike in October 1981, it was decided to restore 50 per cent. of remission lost prior to 1 November 1981, except in cases of violent behaviour in prison, to prisoners who conformed to prison rules for a period of 3 months. The arrangements were wholly exceptional; there has been no across the board restoration of lost remission since then, and no such measure is contemplated.

Maze Prison (Hunger Strike)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which aspects of the five demands made by terrorist prisoners in the Maze prison during the hunger strike have not as yet been incorporated in changes in prison régime and policies.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 59]: It was decided at the end of the hunger strike in October 1981 that all sentenced prisoners should be allowed to wear their own clothes, subject to the limitations mentioned in the reply to another question by the hon. Gentleman. This was a development of the policy introduced in October 1980 under which civilian-type clothing issued by the authorities was made available to convicted inmates.

This is the only one of what became known as "the five demands" which could be said to be reflected in the prison regime.

DEFENCE

NATO (Northern Region)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning United Kingdom forces in the northern region.

Mr. Stanley: NATO's northern flank is of vital importance to the integrity of the Alliance and to the conduct of maritime operations, as well as to the defence of the United Kingdom itself. We therefore commit substantial resources to the defence of the region, details of which are given in paragraphs 430 and 431 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985.

Procurement Policy

15. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on defence procurement policy for the next 12 months.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We shall continue to seek to procure the equipment the services need at a price which gives the taxpayer value for money. To this end we shall pursue vigorously the twin aims of competition and collaboration.

Trident

16. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the cost of the Trident programme.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the most up-to-date estimate of the cost of Trident.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced an estimate for Trident of £9,285 million at 1984-85 prices and at an exchange rate of £1=$1·38 on 29 January at columns 134-37.

19. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received in the last three months against continuing with the Trident programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Secretary of State for Defence has received some 108 such representations.

Command and Control Systems

17. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent studies he has made on the effectiveness of command and control systems.

Mr. Stanley: The effectiveness of our command and control arrangements is regularly tested in a range of both national and NATO exercises.

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

18. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he has made in the investigation into the alleged loss of a log book from HMS Conqueror; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: Further investigations by a specially constituted naval team have been unable to discover any trace of the missing control room logs and this search has now been concluded.

Nerve Gas

20. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate that has been made of the quantities of nerve gas held and personnel trained in the use of it in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The Warsaw pact has a major chemical warfare capability. Its chemical weapon stockpile is assessed to include some 300,000 tonnes of nerve agent alone. It has specialist troops responsible for aspects of nuclear, biological and chemical warfare. Soviet forces are also comprehensively equipped and trained to operate in a chemically contaminated environment. There are no chemical weapons declared to NATO, although the United States possesses a limited and aging retaliatory capability.

British Companies (Contracts)

21. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will conduct a review throughout his Department of the number and value of contracts allocated to British companies.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have carried out a review which shows that the following orders were placed on United Kingdom contractors to the Ministry of Defence during the financial year 1984-85:

	Total	Value (£ million)
Contracts including amendments placed by headquarters	96,191	7,819
Local purchase orders	389,050	303

North Atlantic Council

22. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Council on defence matters.

42. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Council on defence matters.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend had discussions with the NATO Secretary General during the course of the defence planning committee ministerial meeting in May of this year.

Chemical Defence Capability

23. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the United Kingdom's chemical defence capability.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) on 2 July at column 173.

Storage, Security and Personnel

24. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there have been any changes in storage practices, security and personnel following the loss of £174 million in the fire at Royal Air Force Donnington in June 1983.

Mr. Lee: Following the fire at the Army's central ordnance depot, Donnington, in 1983, the Ministry of Defence has introduced a number of changes in store practices, including increased levels of stock inspection and restoration, and dispersion of operationally vital items. Security arrangements have also have been reviewed and some new measures have been, or are in the process of being, implemented. No specific changes in personnel were considered necessary as a consequence of the fire.

Anti-Submarine Capability

25. Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning United Kingdom anti-submarine capability.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to paragraphs 433 to 435 of volume I of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985.

Strategic Defence Initiative

13. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Defence what studies he has made on the effect of the strategic defence initiative on his deterrence strategy.

Mr. Heseltine: The effectiveness of NATO's policy of deterrence is kept under constant review. The United States strategic defence initiative is a long term research programme intended to investigate the technical feasibility of defences against ballistic missiles. It would be premature at this stage to form judgments about the outcome of the research.

35. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next plans to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to discuss the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Heseltine: I shall be meeting NATO Defence Ministers at the nuclear planning group meeting in Brussels at the end of this month, when I expect to discuss a variety of matters associated with the Alliance's policy on nuclear weapon issues.

Military Training

26. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence which countries currently send some of their people for training at British military establishments.

Mr. Stanley: The following countries sent personnel on training courses at United Kingdom military establishments in 1984-85 or are expected to do so in 1985-86:

Soviet Defence Minister

27. Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to meet his counterpart in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Heseltine: None.

Airborne Early Warning Programme

28. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with GEC Avionics about the Nimrod airborne early warning programme and the proposed Lockheed Hercules airborne early warning project.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Lockheed Hercules project is a purely private venture by GEC Avionics. However, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Butler) stated on 17 June at column 38, the company has kept my officials informed of its plans. The company has confirmed that work on this project will have no adverse effect on the Nimrod AEW programme.

Defence Expenditure

29. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on measures which he is taking to keep defence spending within budget.

Mr. Stanley: Defence spending is subject to close monitoring and control to ensure adherence to the cash limit. Defence spending has been kept within the cash limit in each of the last four years.

Gurkhas

30. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement about the future of the Gurkhas within the Army.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the press statement made by my right hon. Friend on 27 September and headed "Hong Kong Stability Permits Force Reduction," the text of which is in the Library.

AST 404

31. Mr. McCartney asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had concerning AST 404.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer which I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) and for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham).

European Defence Ministers (Talks)

32. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with European Defence Ministers about defence matters.

Mr. Heseltine: I last met collectively my European colleagues at the meeting of Defence Ministers of IEPG nations in London on 17-18 June. A copy of the communiqué from that meeting has been placed in the Library of the House.

Departmental Efficiency

33. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to improve the efficiency of his Department.

Mr. Heseltine: I informed the House of certain steps which have been taken to improve the efficiency of defence in my speech in the defence debate on 12 June at columns 915-16, and a fuller record was given in the Statement on the Defence Estimates (Cmnd. 9430-I). Measures which have been taken, are in hand or are planned include:

—Increased competition for defence contracts. This has led to major savings—for example, about £60 million in the case of the new RAF basic trainer and over £100 million on mechanised combat vehicles — compared with internal budgeted estimates.

—A wide range of support operations has been contracted out, including catering, cleaning, printing, storage, transport and training tasks. In the search for better value for money, considerable efforts are being made to contract out or rationalise more work in such areas.

—The front line will benefit from the transfer of manpower from support areas, as a result of contracting out, rationalisation and elimination of functions, in the Army, 4,000 posts will be transferred from the "tail" to the "teeth" by 1990, making it possible to man new regiments of armour and artillery.

—Operational capabilities are also being increased by force multipliers such as air-to-air refuelling and by enhancements to our highly cost-effective reserve forces.

— A new regime of managerial budgets, with appropriate delegation of authority, is being introduced with the aim of promoting better management of resources. The MINIS system continues to provide a framework for this and to stimulate greater awarenesss of functions, performance, targets and objectives.

—The reorganisation of the Ministry of Defence which came into effect in January this year was aimed at the more efficient conduct of business and at substantially improving the Department's system for marketing its forward programme to the available resources. The indications are that it is working well.

—The reorganisation resulted in savings of 15 per cent. of posts at two-star level (Major-General or equivalent) and 29 per cent. of 3-star (Lieutenant General or equivalent) posts.

—The Department's total civilian work force numbered 174,000 on 1 April, some 74,000 lower than when this Government came to office.

—As part of the reorganisation in January, we implemented the recommendations of Sir Henry Yellowlees' study relating to the establishment of a unified functional defence medical services headquarters.

—Many other major efficiency studies are being progressed or implemented, covering subjects such as the defence estate, the contracts organisation, the legal services, the Ministry of Defence Police, information technology and the proof and experimental establishments.

—Royal Ordnance plc has been established and, subject to the usual caveats of trading performance and stock market conditions, we would hope that the company could move to the private sector in mid-1986.

—Work is proceeding to introduce commercial management into the royal dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth not later that April 1987. Quite apart from this, local management is pursuing a series of measures to improve efficiency in the dockyards, in areas such as management structure, control procedures and use of resources, which will reduce manpower numbers by 2,000 at Devonport and 400 at Rosyth. It is hoped that these savings can be achieved without recourse to compulsory redundancy.

Mr. Casper Weinberger (Meeting)

34. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will next be meeting Mr. Casper Weinberger, the United States Secretary for Defence, to discuss United Kingdom/United States defence co-operation.

40. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will next be meeting Casper Weinberger, the United States Secretary for Defence; and what subjects will be discussed.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Ms. to the replies I gave earlier today to my hon. Friends the Members for Wokingham (Sir. W. van Straubenzee) and for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson).

45. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with the United States Secretary for Defence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I last met Mr. Weinberger in Washington on 22 July. Among other matters which were discussed, we had a constructive and helpful exchange of views on the question of possible British participation in the United States strategic defence initiative research programme.

Horseshoe Barracks, Shoeburyness

36. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future plans for the Horseshoe barracks at Shoeburyness.

Mr. Stanley: A number of options for the future use of Horseshoe barracks are currently being studied, but it is unlikely that any decisions will be made until well into 1986 at the earliest.

Summit Meeting

37. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he was last consulted by the United States Administration about the stance they will be adopting at the forthcoming summit.

Mr. Heseltine: Her Majesty's Government have been consulted by the United States Administration at both ministerial and official level on a number of occasions. For example, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), attended Mr. Shultz's recent briefing of the North Atlantic Council and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be taking part in the seven power meeting in New York on 24 October.

RAF (Fighter Aircraft)

38. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current position on a replacement fighter for the Royal Air Force.

41. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had concerning the Phantom and Jaguar replacement.

43. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest developments on the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Excellent progress has been made on the European fighter aircraft, which it is proposed should replace Phantom and Jaguar aircraft in RAF service. Agreement was reached in Turin on 2 August between the United Kingdom, Germany and Italy to proceed with the further definition and refinement of the EFA programme; since that time Spain has confirmed that it also intends to continue its participation in the programme. The fact that four countries have been able to reach agreement to work together on a programme of this magnitude is a splendid example of European collaboration.

Work on the project definition stage of the programme is now well under way and a report is expected from industry next summer.

Nuclear Weapons

39. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest assessment of the numbers and categories of nuclear weapons between east and west.

Mr. Stanley: Information on the numbers and categories and nuclear weapon systems and the balance of nuclear forces between East and West is contained in figures 12 and 13 of annex A of volume I of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985.

44. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will now take steps to seek to change North Atlantic Treaty Organisation plans to deploy new nuclear weapons systems and seek instead a mutual verifiable cessation of research, development and deployment of all nuclear weapons systems with the Warsaw pact countries.

Mr. Stanley: No. Our objective is to secure reductions in nuclear weapons through the negotiation of balanced, effective and verifiable disarmament agreements rather than to freeze existing imbalances which include substantial superiority for the Soviet Union in certain categories of nuclear weapons.

Royal Dockyards

46. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on his proposals to reorganise the royal dockyards.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced his decision on the options for the future management of the royal dockyards on 23 July 1985 at cols. 867-68. Work within the Ministry of Defence to implement the proposals is continuing; the level of commercial interest in the scheme remains high and a number of interested companies have visited Devonport and Rosyth for briefings. Work is also in progress to form a new customer organisation within the Ministry of Defence.

Air Defence Capability

47. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning United Kingdom air defence capability.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to paragraphs 410 to 413 of volume I of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985.

Departmental Reorganisation

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the improvements which have resulted from the reorganisation of his Department.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The new organisation is settling down well. A formal review of its effectiveness will be carried out early in 1986.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of Exercise Brave Defender.

Mr. Heseltine: The exercise successfully tested plans and procedures for the ground defence of vital installations in this country. I should like, in particular, to pay tribute to the enthusiasm of the volunteer and reserve forces who took part. A detailed analysis of Brave Defender is now under way, but I have today placed in the Library a report on first impressions of the exercise.

WALES

Welsh Plant Breeding Station

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from staff of Welsh plant breeding station at Aberystwyth regarding expenditure cuts and future plans for the station, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have received letters from two members of staff expressing concern about the recently announced expenditure cuts at the Welsh plant breeding station.

I am aware of the concern that has been expressed regarding the future of the WPBS and I discussed the situation with Lord Selborne the chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council on 30 September 1985. The council is considering its forward policy and is expected to issue a statement shortly.

Bangor District General Hospital

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the repairs now required for the Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor district general hospital, if his Department will provide funds to meet the costs, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Gwynedd health authority is responsible for the maintenance of Ysbyty Gwynedd and for ensuring that any necessary repairs are carried out.

The Welsh Office is considering whether recently developed techniques for the protection of exposed concrete by the application of a weather resistant coating can be used to extend the life and reduce future maintenance costs of the external cladding at Ysbyty Gwynedd. If it is decided to use this protective measure the initial cost will be funded centrally. This is not a repair; it is simply a commonsense protective measure.

School Playground Supervision

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make additional funds available to Welsh education authorities for the provision of playground supervision in schools where there has been a proven problem with drug-taking amongst children.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I am making available under the education support grants scheme £112,000 in 1986-87 to enable each local education authority in Wales to appoint a person to co-ordinate drug advice and to provide support for schools, colleges and the youth service. The Government are very concerned about the misuse of drugs and its present campaign is targeted at young people. The guide for teachers and youth workers "Drug Misuse and the Young" was issued in July 1985 and had a very wide distribution. It is for local education authorities using their own resources to determine the need and extent of playground supervision.

Health Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of people in each Welsh county, and for Wales as a whole, who are aged between 16 and 65 years and are permanently sick.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information in the form requested is available only from the 1981 census and is as follows:

	Percentage of usually resident population aged 16-64 who were recorded as permanently sick at 1981 census Percentage
Clwyd	2·4
Dyfed	3·1
Gwent	3·3
Gwynedd	2·9
Mid Glamorgan	4·7
Powys	2·5
South Glamorgan	2·7
West Glamorgan	3·5
Wales	3·3

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many places in hostels, hospitals and so on, have been provided in Wales for people with drink problems in each of the last six years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not available centrally in precisely the form requested. The following table gives the numbers of deaths and discharges from hospitals in Wales of inpatients and day cases diagnosed as having alcohol-related diseases.

Diagnosis	Numbers of deaths and discharges
	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

Diseases of the liver associated with alcohol abuse:
Non-psychiatric hospitals	304	332	407	365	459	462

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the average age of those people admitted to hospitals or clinics in Wales suffering from problems associated with alcohol, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is as follows:

Average age on admission (years) of in-patients and day cases diagnosed as having alcoholic psychosis, alcoholic dependence syndrome and non-dependent abuse of alcohol

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

* Average age on admission of discharges—deaths.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of those registered as having contracted dysentery in Wales in 1984 and 1985 were aged 16 years or under.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In 1984 there were 69 notifications of dysentery in Wales of those persons aged 16 and under. In the first three quarters of 1985 the corresponding provisional figure is 384.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales have (a) suffered from and (b) died as a result of hepatitis B in each of the last five years, county by county, at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The numbers of registered deaths from hepatitis "B" are given in the following table:

Registered deaths from Hepatitis B

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Clwyd	—	—	—	—	—
Dyfed	—	—	—	—	—

Mid Glamorgan	—	—	—	—	—
Powys	—	—	—	1	—
South Glamorgan	—	1	—	—	—
West Glamorgan	1	—	—	1	—

Notifications of hepatitis "B" are not separately identified centrally; they are included in the category "Infective Jaundice" which also covers hepatitis "A", non-A, non-B and other viral hepatitis.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people of school age in Mid Glamorgan, Gwent and South Glamorgan his Department estimates have misused amphetamines or controlled narcotics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There are no reliable estimates of the level of misuse of amphetamines and other controlled drugs among children of school age in south Wales. Assessments prepared in 1984 by district health authorities at the request of the Welsh Office suggest a varied pattern of misuse among misusers as a whole, with particular concentration in the major towns. However, information from these sources does not extend to school children.

The Department has required health authorities to establish, in the form of district or county drug advisory committees, local arrangements for keeping the extent, character and intensity of local drug misuse under review and for co-ordinating and planning the development of an effective response. These committees are representative of the health and local authorities, the police and probation services and voluntary sector interests. A clearer picture of the nature and extent of drug misuse should emerge from the work of these committees, with which the Department is keeping in close touch.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from health officials in Wales regarding the possible escalation in the outbreak of hepatitis B; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: We have received no such representations, but the Department's officials have been made aware by the responsible authorities of cases of hepatitis "B" in South Wales. They have discussed with these authorities the action needed to control the outbreak and I am satisfied that all appropriate steps are being taken.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs in service industries have been (a) gained and (b) lost in Wales in each of the last six years, to the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Net changes in levels of employment are indicated by the estimates of employees in employment compiled by my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. Those covering service industries for the years concerned are:

	Thousands at June each year
1979	574
1980	573
1981	564
1982	557
1983	566
1984	578
1985	583

These figures do not include the self-employed.

Welsh Language Teaching

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the amount of cash expended by the local education authorities in Wales on Welsh language education in the current year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend makes no separate estimate of local government expenditure on Welsh language education.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make available extra money to Welsh local education authorities to enable them to develop and extend Welsh language teaching in their schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. It is for the local authorities themselves to determine their spending priorities within the resources available to them. The per capita grant-related expenditure assessment for county councils in Wales are considerably higher than for comparable authorities in England, which in part reflects the cost of their bilingual policies.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to meet local education authorities to discuss the funding of Welsh language teaching in Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Funding of Welsh language teaching is the responsibility of the local education authorities and it is for them to determine their spending priorities within the resources available to them. However, I expect to meet representatives of the eight authorities and the Welsh Joint Education Committee shortly to discuss with them the scope and nature of the Welsh Joint Education Committee's enhanced role in offering advice on policies and priorities in Welsh language education development and in particular on the direction of grant paid under section 21 of the Education Act 1980.

Lone Parent Families

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the percentage of households with at least one lone parent family with dependent children as a percentage of all households with dependent children for (i) each Welsh county, and (ii) Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The most recent information at a county level is that collected at the 1981 census and is as follows:

Percentage of households with dependent children containing at least 1 one-parent family with dependent children* percentage

Clwyd	12·1
Dyfed	12·2
Gwent	13·1
Gwynedd	13·3
Mid Glamorgan	13·3
Powys	11·0
South Glamorgan	15·6
West Glamorgan	12·7
WALES	13·1

* Includes all persons under 16 and those under 25 who are never married and classified as a student at the census.

Abortion Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any information as to how many Welsh women had pregnancy terminations privately outside Wales in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The numbers of legal abortions carried out in England on non-NHS premises for women usually resident in Wales are published annually by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in OPCS series AB "Abortion Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library.

National Health Service (Resources)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his policy towards the allocation of resources to the Health Service in Mid Glamorgan in the light of the Mid Glamorgan health authority report, "Mid Glamorgan Deprivation and Health: The Need for Health Care," a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The joint Welsh Office—NHS resources allocation working group are currently considering whether a weighting for social deprivation should be included in the formula which is used to assess health authorities' relative funding needs. I look forward to receiving their recommendations.

Degrees and Professional Qualifications

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the percentage of residents, in each Welsh county and for Wales as a whole, without degrees or professional qualifications.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information from the 1981 census (10 per cent. sample) is as follows:

	*Percentage of residents aged 18 or over without degrees or professional qualifications
Clwyd	91·1
Dyfed	90·7
Gwent	92·2
Gwynedd	89·2
Mid Glamorgan	92·7
Powys	91·0
South Glamorgan	88·7
West Glamorgan	91·6
WALES	91·1

* Above GCE 'A' level.

Prescriptions

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what, in each of the last five years, has been the average number of prescriptions issued per patient on general practitioner lists in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information given in the following table is based on all prescriptions dispensed by chemists, appliance contractors and dispensing doctors in Wales:

	*Average number of prescriptions per patient
1980-81	8·6
1981-82	8·6
1982-83	9·0
1983-84	9·1
1984-85	9·2

* Patients on GP lists at 1 October in each year.

Single Pensionable Households

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of single pensionable households in each Welsh county and for Wales as a whole.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The most recent information is that collected during the 1981 census of population and this is given in table 15*(b)* of "Welsh Social Trends, No 5 1982", published by the Welsh Office, a copy of which is in the Library.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, county by county for Wales, the number and proportion of people classified as (a) drinking to excess, (b) problem drinkers and (c) severely dependent drinkers for each of the last five years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not available centrally.

Association of District Councils

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to the proposal made to him by the Association of District Councils on 13 February that there should be a specific rural grant to help small-scale initiatives including economic development, transport, social and leisure schemes, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I have no record of receiving such a proposal.

River Conwy Tunnel

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales by what date he hopes to announce the details of the letting of the contract to build the tunnel under the river Conwy and the commencement date of work on the tunnel.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We hope to issue invitations to tender early next year and to let the contract later that year; work should start shortly after.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sunday Trading

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has given to traders about the observance of the law on Sunday trading.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has given no specific guidance to traders about the observance of the law on Sunday trading, but the Government have made it clear that the law should be obeyed until such time as it is changed by Parliament.

Police (Codes of Practice)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to issue codes of practice in accordance with sections 66 and 67 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Hurd: I have today laid before Parliament draft codes in accordance with section 66 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. It is my intention to bring them into operation with effect from 1 January 1986 by order made by statutory instrument and I shall seek the approval by resolution of each House of Parliament as soon as possible.

National Radio Networks

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the allocation of frequencies for new national radio networks.

Mr. Hurd: One of the United Kingdom's objectives at the international VHF band II planning conference in Geneva in late 1984 was the creation of two new national VHF radio networks to add to the three which already exist. As my noble Friend Lord Whitelaw informed the House on 29 March 1983, at column 90, he envisaged that one of the new networks would be allocated to the BBC so that there could be separate VHF networks for Radios 1 and 2, and the other, provided that satisfactory financing arrangements could be developed, to the IBA for the provision of an independent national radio service.

In the light of the satisfactory decisions taken at the Geneva conference, the two new national networks (97·6 to 99·8 MHz and 99·8 to 102 MHz) will become available at the beginning of 1990, although some of the frequencies in the fourth network (97·6 to 99·8 MHz) may be capable of use at an earlier stage. In considering the allocation of the new networks, I have taken account of the fact that legislation would be required to enable the IBA to provide a new national service, and that detailed consideration will need to be given to how such a service might fit into the existing pattern of sound broadcasting and, in particular, to its relationship with independent local radio. I have therefore decided to allocate the fourth network to the BBC to enable progress to be made on the provision of separate services for Radios 1 and 2. The fifth network (99·8 to 102 MHz) will remain available for independent national radio, and I have asked the IBA to develop proposals on the form such a service might take.

WALES

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce separate funding for youth training scheme mode A schemes and youth training scheme mode B schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: With the introduction of the two year youth training scheme, the present separate arrangements for funding mode A and mode B schemes will be replaced by a more flexible and cost effective system under which all training providers will receive a managing agent's fee as well as a basic grant £160 per trainee per month. Many current mode B providers will also be eligible for an additional premium of £110 per trainee per month for those offering places for disadvantaged young people or in areas where there is a shortage of employer led provision. There will also be transitional funding for those presently running mode B schemes.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from managers and staff who operate the youth training scheme mode B scheme regarding future ex-mode B schemes funding; how many mode B schemes are currently operating in the North East Wales institute; how many information technology centres operate in (i) North Wales and (ii) Wales; if he has assessed the impact upon the future of information technology centres of new youth training scheme funding policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have received two representations about the future of mode B schemes in Wales under the expanded youth training scheme. There are four mode B schemes wholly operated by the North East Wales institute and one scheme in which the institute is a co-sponsor.

There are 12 information technology centres operating in Wales, of which four are in North Wales. The Manpower Services Commission is currently considering the future funding and development of these centres within the new scheme.

Mencap Play Scheme, Shotton

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide special financial help to Mencap's play scheme for handicapped pupils at Ysgol y Bryw, Shotton, when the five year urban aid grant expires in 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Longer-term funding of projects supported by the urban programme is a matter for the sponsoring councils to consider. MENCAP could also explore with the Clwyd Joint Secretariat for Services to Mentally Handicapped People whether the Ysgol y Bryw scheme could be included in the development of services under the mental handicap strategy, which is funded by the Welsh Office.

River Dee (Crossing)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects a second crossing of the River Dee in the Connah's Quay area to be built; when he expects the Plough Lane Link road scheme to be built; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Clwyd county council, as the local highway authority, is responsible for these projects. The council's latest published road improvements programme envisages a start on the second crossing of the River Dee after 1993-94, and the Plough Lane link road scheme being undertaken in two parts, with construction of the hospital access starting in 1988-89 and the remainder in 1993-94.

Roads (Alyn-Deeside)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, on receiving a video film of the traffic problems of Shotton, Connah's Quay, and Queensferry from the Alyn-Deeside district council and on receipt of the authority's views concerning the road programmes for the alleviation of traffic congestion, he will visit the Alyn-Deeside local authority for discussions; if he has received the Clwyd county authority proposals for priority road building and improvements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have not received from Alyn and Deeside council the video film or the views of the district council to which the hon. Gentleman refers. We have received a copy of Clwyd county council's roads improvement programme, which was approved by the highways sub-committee on 6 March 1985, and its bid for capital allocations and transport supplementary grant for 1986-87. We note that its future programme includes proposals for a Shotton-Connah's Quay bypass.

If the Alyn and Deeside district council has views on these proposals, it should convey them to the county council. It would not be appropriate for us to discuss with the district council matters which are the responsibility of the county council.

NHS (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to meet members of the National Health Service unions to discuss competitive tendering for hotel services in the National Health Service in Wales; what representations he has received from them objecting to competitive tendering; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I have no plans to meet representatives of the National Health Service unions, from which I have received a limited number of representations. Experience has shown that competitive tendering can improve efficiency and release resources for the benefit of patients.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has had discussions with area health authorities in Wales concerning the open competition for catering, domestic and laundry services in the National Health Service in Wales; which area health authorities have declared their willingness to test the cost effectiveness of the area health authorities hotel services by subjecting them to open competition; when he met area health authorities chairmen in Wales concerning open competition; which area health authorities expressed their acceptance of Government guidance concerning this aspect of policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend had discussions with the chairmen of district health authorities in Wales last July and all authorities are aware that we require them to take decisive action to test the efficiency and cost effectiveness of their catering, domestic and laundry services. I am aware of delays in implementing some competitive tendering programmes, but I expect all authorities to realise the potential savings which exist in these services.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to meet the South Glamorgan area health authority to discuss competitive tendering for hotel services in National Health Service establishments; if he proposes to direct South Glamorgan area health authority to expose hotel services to open competition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I have no plans to meet the South Glamorgan health authority specifically to discuss competitive tendering. The authority is aware of the Government's wishes concerning the testing by competition of catering, domestic and laundry services.

Plant Breeding Station

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to visit the Welsh plant breeding station at Aberystwyth to meet staff members and to discuss the station's future.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have no immediate plans to revisit the Welsh plant breeding station. However, I recently met Lord Selborne, chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council, to discuss the station's future and have also met Professor Owen, Principal of Aberystwyth university.

Welsh Language (Newspapers)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give financial assistance to Yr Herald Gymraeg and Herald Môn Welsh language newspapers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I am aware of the financial problems facing Yr Herald Gymraeg and Herald Môn but have received no direct requests for financial assistance.

Agricultural Research Centres

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales why the research centres at Llanishen and Bangor are to be closed; how many staff there are at each; how many at each will be made redundant; what work each centre does for Welsh agriculture; where that work will be carried out in future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced on 22 January 1985 that Government expenditure on agricultural research and development was to be reduced. The contribution to these economies which is to be made by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in 1986-87 will be achieved by rationalising the organisation of the service's R and D and concentrating work on fewer sites.

The laboratories at Llanishen and Bangor provide analytical and diagnostic services in the fields of analytical chemistry, entomology, microbiology, nutrition chemistry, vertebrate pest control, plant pathology and soil science. Arrangements are being made to maintain these services to the agricultural industry. Laboratory services will be provided mainly from the centre at Trawsgoed, and advice from the divisional offices in the areas concerned.

There are 20 scientific staff in the science service laboratory at Bangor and 15 at Llanishen. Some of these staff can be redeployed, and a number of job losses can be achieved by natural wastage, but the total cannot be achieved without some redundancies. It is not possible at this stage to state the number of redundancies which will be necessary at each location. Reductions in the Welsh Office support staff of three at Bangor and four at Llanishen will be achieved by natural wastage or redeployment.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Responsibilities (Revised List)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Prime Minister why the revised list of ministerial responsibilities within Departments together with the Ministers' Private Office telephone numbers, produced by the Cabinet Office, was not available to right hon. Members and hon. Members when the House sat again on 21 October; and when it will be available.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

A revised edition of the "List of Ministerial Responsibilities" was not available on 21 October because the information required to update the text was not complete until late on 16 October. The final text was sent for reproduction on 18 October and copies will be available in the Whips' Office tomorrow.

European Anti-poverty Programme

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the different criteria adopted by the Scottish Office, the Welsh Office, Northern Ireland Office and other United Kingdom Government Departments in relation to projects involving proposals for the European anti-poverty programme.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Decisions on whether the different parts of the United Kingdom should participate in the second European Community programme to combat poverty were taken by Ministers in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and the Department of Health and Social Security. The criteria for the selection of applications were set out in a Council decision (85/8/EEC) of 19 December 1984 and associated Commission document (COM(84)681) and communicated to Government Departments and possible applicants in the United Kingdom by the Department of Health and Social Security. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland concluded that the potential benefits to Scotland were not sufficient to justify participation in the programme.

Fourteen projects in the United Kingdom have just been selected by the Commission for Community financial assistance amounting to a total of about £1·78 million over the three and a half years of the programme. Nine are in England — Stoke on Trent, Whitley Bay, Wolverhampton, Bolton, Bristol, Lancashire, and the London boroughs of Tower Hamlets and Newham — three are in Wales—West, Mid and South Glamorgan— and two double projects in Northern Ireland. The projects are intended to assist the poor elderly, young and long-term unemployed people, single parent and ethnic minority families. The United Kingdom and Germany each receive about 17 per cent. of the Community funds available for projects under the programme; other member countries receive lesser amounts.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dental Treatment

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average cost of the operation to remove wisdom teeth for hospital inpatients.

Mr. Hayhoe: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. However, for 1984-85 the estimated cost to the National Health Service of treating inpatients for disorders of tooth development and eruption, including the removal of wisdom teeth, was £164 per case treated.

Vaccinations (Deaths)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in each five-year period since 1964, what was the number of yellow card reports made to the Committee on Safety of Medicines regarding sudden death, that is within 48 hours, after (a) vaccination against whooping cough and (b) other vaccinations; in each of these periods, how many vaccinations against whooping cough were carried out and what was the number of other non whooping cough vaccinations; and what investigations were made by the Committee on Safety of Medicines as to the possibility of a causal relationship between vaccination and the reported deaths.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid and Trade

37. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the proportion of overseas trade which is tied to aid.

Mr. Raison: In 1984 about 74 per cent. of the bilateral aid programme, excluding administrative costs and expenditure by the Commonwealth Development Corporation, was tied to the purchase of British goods and services. Contributions to multilateral institutions from Britain and other donor countries are untied thus allowing British firms to bid for all contracts which these institutions finance.

Tropical Development Research Institute

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what requests have been made to the Tropical Development Research Institute and the Land Resources Development Centre, relating to famine, which have had to be declined since August; and what were the reasons in each case.

Mr. Raison: None.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he has made, or intends to make, to facilitate the transport of his officials, scientists visiting London, the personnel of university departments and learned societies, Ministers of foreign Governments and officials of multi-national agencies to and from Chatham and London after the transfer to Chatham of the Tropical Development Research Institute.

Mr. Raison: I do not expect any special arrangements to be necessary. Direct public transport links between central London and Chatham are good and there will be convenient motorway access to Chatham from Heathrow and Gatwick.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration he gave to relocating the various elements of the Tropical Development Research Institute in the London Docklands.

Mr. Raison: The possibility was investigated. A large warehouse site which was potentially available was considered but not pursued because of expected high conversion and maintenance costs.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what bodies or groups, including scientific societies, he consulted over his decision to re-locate the Tropical Development and Research Institute in Chatham.

Mr. Raison: The directors of ODA's scientific units and their staffs, many of whom are members of scientific societies, were consulted. So also were Ministers of several other Departments, including those with regional interests.

Chile (Political Refugees)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what requests he has received from the United Kingdom branch of World University Service concerning return of political refugees to Chile; what response he has made; and for what reasons.

Mr Raison: I shall write to the hon. Member.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

USSR

13. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what study his Department has made of the relative potential benefits to the United Kingdom and Union of Soviet Socialist Republics economics of increasing trade between the two countries.

Mr. Channon: The relative potential benefits of increased trade between two countries are unpredictable and very difficult to assess. However, the Government believe that a higher level of trade with the Soviet Union would be to the benefit of both countries, and we are therefore doing all that we can to see that this is achieved.

Japan

16. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the visible trade deficit with Japan during the last 12 months for which figures are available; and how this compares with the previous 12 months.

Mr. Channon: In the period from September 1984 to August 1985 the United Kingdom had a crude visible trade deficit of £3,086 million with Japan. This compares with a deficit of £2,723 million for the previous 12 months.

36. Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on recent moves by the Japanese Government to liberalise exports to Japan from the free world.

Mr. Channon: The Japanese Government's action programme announced on 30 July proposes a wide range of measures to improve access to Japan's domestic market. The Community is studying how far the action programme meets the Community's stated objective of achieving a significant and sustained increase in the level of Japan's imports of manufactures.

Overseas Sales (Government Assistance)

17. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received regarding Government assistance for United Kingdom companies selling in overseas markets.

Mr. Channon: My Department has received a variety of different representations this year in response to a consultative document on changes to BOTB services.

Footwear Industry

18. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is yet able to give details of any investment advisory scheme for the footwear industry.

Mr. Howard: There is no investment advisory scheme designed specifically for the footwear industry. However, under my Department's business and technical advisory services the industry has been invited to submit an application for a consultancy study. This study would determine the feasibility and industrial need for a computer-integrated manufacturing package.

Tameside

19. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many meetings his regional staff have had with firms in Tameside during the last three months to discuss Government assistance.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I attach the greatest importance to regional policy and in the three months ending 30 September staff in the north-west regional office of my Department have had 34 meetings with firms in Tameside to discuss Government assistance.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

20. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the negotiations to renew the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Channon: Detailed negotiations are not likely to begin until next year. In the meantime I am meeting representatives of the textile industry next week to discuss development.

29. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to discuss the multi-fibre arrangement re-negotiations with representatives of the knitwear industry in Scotland.

Mr. Channon: I and my officials are in touch with all interested parties, including representatives of the knitwear industry in Scotland, and intend to remain in touch with them throughout the negotiations.

North-East Region

21. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the business prospects of the north-east region.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The broadening of the industrial base in the north-east to include new and expanding industries as well as the efforts in promoting industry-education links and training initiatives provide a sound base for the region's future.

Confectionery Industry

22. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to prevent counterfeiting of United Kingdom confectionery products; and what representations he has received from the United Kingdom confectionery industry on this subject.

Mr. Butcher: The existing laws covering trade descriptions, trade marks, copyright, patents, designs and passing-off, protect against counterfeiting in the United Kingdom. Protection in other countries depends on national laws there. I have received no representations specifically from the United Kingdom confectionery industry although proposals for changes in the law have been made by the Anti Counterfeiting Group which represents companies in a range of industries.

Insolvency Bill

23. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the organisations he has consulted about the terms of the Insolvency Bill [Lords] during the summer Adjournment.

Mr. Howard: The Department has consulted the following organisations:

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales
The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Scotland
The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland
The Chartered Association of Certified Accountants
The Insolvency Practitioners Association
The Law Society
The Law Society of Scotland
The Committee of London and Scottish Bankers

Companies (Accounts)

24. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies are currently in default for failure to file accounts at Companies House on 1 March.

Mr. Howard: Of 379,000 companies which had failed to deliver accounts to the Registrar of Companies at 1 March 1985, 140,000 have still to remedy the default.

Company Law

25. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what specific proposals he has for the simplification of company law, especially as regards the regulatory burden on smaller companies.

Mr. Howard: Work is in hand on the proposals relating to company law requirements outlined in the White Paper, "Lifting the Burden" (Command 9571). More generally, I am considering the case for further reforms, with the desirability of simplification and the needs of small companies very much in mind.

Accountants' Associations

26. Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any proposals to extend recognition under section 161 of the Companies Act 1948 to other accountants' associations.

Mr. Howard: No. But I am ready to consider any request for recognition on its merits.

Philippines (Aircraft Sales)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about orders for the sale of British aircraft to Philippines and assistance provided by his Department for such exports.

Mr. Pattie: The full range of services of the British Overseas Trade Board is available to companies wishing to export to the Philippines. Representations have been received from aerospace companies in relation to the dispute with the Philippines over air services. This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. However, I understand that at recent negotiations in London, agreement was reached which should allow the continuation of air services until March 1987.

European Community (Trade Barriers)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had within the European Economic Community concerning the abolition of internal barriers to trade.

Mr. Channon: I attended a meeting of the Internal Market Council on 7 October which discussed the framework for follow-up action on the Commission's recent White Paper in the light of the conclusions of the European Council meeting at Milan.

Manufacturing Industries (Exports)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further steps he proposes to take to encourage the growth of exports by manufacturing industries.

Mr. Channon: My Department provides a full range of export services in support of British industry and commerce, including the manufacturing sector. Exports of manufactured goods were up by 9·5 per cent. in volume terms in the first eight months of this year compared with the same period in 1984, and in the first half of this year the United Kingdom increased its share in volume terms of exports of manufactures from the main manufacturing countries.

Steel Industry

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has had any discussions with the chairman of the British Steel Corporation concerning the corporate plan.

Mr. Butcher: A statement on the British Steel Corporation's corporate plan was made by my right hon. Friend on 7 August, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Overseas Companies

32. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to attract more overseas companies to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Invest in Britain Bureau in the Department of Trade and Industry is currently engaged in a major promotional campaign — Britain Means Business. In collaboration with the public and private sectors the bureau is conducting this campaign in addition to its normal activities and draws attention to the undoubted attractions of the UK to foreign investors. Not least of these is the new economic climate for which this Government have been creating the right conditions. More than 88,000 jobs are likely to be created as a result of foreign-owned projects embarked upon between 1980 and 1984 and in 1984-85 my Department made offers totalling more than £128 million to foreign companies whose projects are likely to create more than 17,000 jobs and safeguard some 4,000 others.

Manufacturing Industry (Output)

33. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to seek to boost the output of manufacturing industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I intend to encourage the growth of manufacturing industry through the further development of a climate which encourages enterprise and in which business can become more competitive, and through various forms of assistance to business. The success of this policy is already evident. Manufacturing output has risen 11 per cent. since the trough of the recession in the first quarter of 1981.

British Shipbuilders

34. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, if he will make a statement on the latest progress in privatising the interests of British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Peter Morrison: British Shipbuilders have sold two of their warship yards: Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd and Brooke Marine Ltd. Negotiations are continuing for the sale of Hall Russell Ltd, Swan Hunter Shipbuilders Ltd and Vosper Thornycroft (UK) Ltd. The sale documents for Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd, together with its subsidiary Cammell Laird Shipbuilders Ltd, were issued on 10 October. In addition, during the current financial year, British Shipbuilders have sold Sunderland Forge Ltd and Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd.

Book Publishing

35. Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received about the effects on the United Kingdom book publishing industry of infringements in Singapore of their copyright; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Government are much concerned by piracy of United Kingdom books in Singapore. Over the past few years we have received representations from the Publishers Association, the British Copyright Council, the British Printing Industries Federation and the Confederation of Information Communication Industries. Three Ministers have raised the matter during visits there. We are, however, encouraged to learn that new legislation is being drafted, and we will monitor its progress carefully.

English Estates

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the reasons for imposing a moratorium on the development and investment programme of English Estates.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There has been an unprecedented demand for English Estates (EE) to build factories to the specific order of prospective tenants, and there is just not enough money to meet all the demands. EE has called a temporary halt to further commitments on specific projects whilst it sorts out with the Government what type of work should be given priority within its limited financial resources.

This does not mean, of course, that the Government have taken a decision to stop English Estates' factory building in the assisted areas.

Video Tapes

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if it is now his intention to implement the proposal contained in his Department's Green Paper, "The Recording and Control of Audio and Video Copyright Material", to make video tapers pay both a television licence fee and a tape levy.

Mr. Butcher: We hope soon to publish a White Paper setting out our proposals for the reform of copyright law. The White Paper will announce our conclusions on whether a levy on blank audio and video recording tape should be introduced.

Small Firms

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been received on the consultative document, "Accounting and Audit Requirements for Small Firms".

Mr. Howard: We have received comments on the consultative document from more than 197 representative organisations, individuals and other Government Departments. Work on analysing the responses is now under way. This will inevitably take some time to complete, but I will let the House know the outcome as quickly as possible.

Exports (Latin America)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what actions he has taken since 18 July to promote the sale of British exports in Latin America and provide more lenient Export Credits Guarantee Department cover.

Mr. Channon: My Department has continued with its selective marketing strategy, identifying those sectors within the Latin American market which offer the best prospects for United Kingdom exporters. In recent months ECGD has resumed medium-term cover for Ecuador and Venezuela.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the share of United Kingdom exports and imports attributable to manufactured and semi-manufactured goods in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, Tuesday 22 October 1985; c. 118]: Information as follows:

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Dyslexia

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children with dyslexic problems have been placed in private boarding schools by local education authorities for each of the last five years; and at what cost.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is not collected centrally.

ENVIRONMENT

Rural Areas (Grant Aid)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will establish a new grant for rural areas along the lines of the urban aid grant.

Sir George Young: In England, the Development Commission in conjunction as necessary with its agency, the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas, already provides help to strengthen the economic and social life of rural communities especially in rural development areas. It does so through the provision of advance factories, grants for the development of redundant buildings, business advice, job training, support for voluntary bodies and rural services and other forms of assistance. Development boards or units in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland perform similar functions.

Prefabricated Reinforced Housing

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his recent announcement of his intention to allocate £37 million to 28 local authorities to enable them to repurchase defective prefabricated reinforced concrete houses previously sold to tenants.

Mr. John Patten: My predecessor announced on 9 August 1985 that an additional £37 million would be made available for 1985-86 to help those local authorities which were unable to meet their obligations under the Housing Defects Act 1984. Of the 119 authorities which applied for assistance, 28 seemed unlikely, on the basis of their own estimates, to have sufficient resources to meet these obligations. Additional housing investment programme allocations will be made retrospectively, after the end of the financial year, if these estimates are confirmed by actual expenditure.

The estimates submitted were drawn up early in the financial year and were inevitably subject to some uncertainty. For this reason I have asked all those local authorities which applied for assistance to send updated returns to my Department at the end of December.

A list of the 28 authorities is given below:

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums have been paid to each local authority in the United kingdom in lieu of rates forgone from enterprise zones for each of the years 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85, respectively.

Sir George Young: Payments in respect of rates revenue forgone by local authorities in England were as follows:—

Tropical Development Research Institute

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial arrangements have been made with English Estates Ltd. for the relocation of the Tropical Development Research Institute in the former Chatham Dockyard; and what will be the capital cost of the building adaptation.

Sir George Young: English Estates Limited will meet the capital cost of approximately £10·8 million of adapting buildings in the former HMS Pembroke. It will then lease them to the Property Services Agency, on behalf of the institute, on completion of the work, and lease negotiations are now in progress.

Housing Stock

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish a report on the work needed to improve existing housing stock; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend expects to publish the findings of the Department's recent inquiry into the condition of the local authority housing stock shortly.

Royal Armouries Littlecote Appeal

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what support and encouragement the Government will give to the Royal Armouries Littlecote appeal.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend welcomes and supports the Royal Armouries in its bid to purchase the collection of civil war uniform and armour at Littlecote house. In the light of the amount of money that the armouries are able either to raise from their public appeal, or find from within their existing budget, he will consider with the trustees what further support he might be able to give.

London Ecology Centre

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current situation regarding the future of the London Ecology centre.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer Monday 21 October 1985, c. 104]: The London Ecology centre is currently run by an interim charitable trust supported by the Greater London council, pending incorporation of the London Ecology centre trust and its registration by the Charity Commission. My right hon. Friend has given his consent to a GLC grant to support the running costs of the centre up to 31 March 1986.

Following abolition, full responsibility for local authority grants to voluntary bodies in London falls to the boroughs. A collective scheme for funding Londonwide voluntary bodies has already been established under powers we provided in the abolition legislation, and such bodies as the London Ecology centre should by now have approached the grants unit at Richmond. In addition, we are providing transitional grant on £20 million a year of grants expenditure by individual boroughs and districts: once again, groups seeking funding should by now have approached the local authority concerned.

DEFENCE

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement about the outcome of the latest meetings between representatives of his Department and their counterparts from France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and Spain about the proposed European fighter aircraft; and when he now expects to make a decision about the future of this project.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave on 22 October to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), the hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Hull (North) (Mr. McNamara) and the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) (Vol. 84, c. 140).

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Miss Sara Keays

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General why, on 8 October, a spokesman for the Director of Public Prosecutions announced that no legal action was being considered against the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) and Miss Sara Keays following publication of parts of her book; and for what reasons the Director of Public Prosecutions has now called in the police to investigate the matter.

The Solicitor-General: I am informed that no such announcement was made.

On 8 October the press officer for the Director of Public Prosecutions informed journalists in answer to a question put to him that a letter which was said to have been sent that day to the Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions by the hon. Member was not under consideration because it had not been received by the Director of Public Prosecutions. That information, which was correct, appears to have been misinterpreted.

The Director of Public Prosecutions, having been consulted on my behalf on 11 October, reported to me on 15 October that he considered that certain aspects of the extracts from Miss Keays's book which had been published in the Daily Mirror required investigation. I concurred.

ENERGY

Gas and Electricity Industries

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the Government's policy on the external financing limits for the gas and electricity industries; what consequences this will have for their future prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Government agree external financing limits with the industries. The setting of prices is a matter for the industries. They must take into account the cost of supply, as well as the financial framework agreed with the Government.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much his Department has spent on office furniture, curtains and carpets and office decorating in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 23]: Prior to 1983-84, these goods and services were provided to Departments on an allied services basis by the Property Services Agency.

Expenditure is not formally recorded by the classifications requested but was approximately:

	1983-84 £000	1984-85 £000
Furniture	9	38
Curtains and Carpets	2	11
Office Decorating	122	5

The 1983-84 figures included expenditure on the first major redecoration and refurbishing of the Department's headquarters building in 10 years.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Customs and Excise (Drugs Control)

Sir David Price asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent measures he has taken to ensure that Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have all the necessary staff and resources to prevent the illegal importation of drugs into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gow: Customs and Excise resources are being reviewed in the context of this year's PES round, but during my visit to Heathrow on 7 October I announced that a minimum of another 150 preventive staff would be recruited next year. This follows the announcement in June that a further 50 specialist drugs investigators would be appointed in the current year.

EC (Draft Budget)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what assumptions regarding the dollar/ecu exchange rate were made in the draft 1986 European Economic Community budget prepared by (a) the European Commission and (b) the Council of Ministers;

(2) if he will list all amendments to the Commission preliminary draft 1986 European Economic Community budget made by the Council of Ministers; and if he will place copies of both documents in the Library;

(3) what steps he has taken to ensure that European Economic Community spending on agriculture during 1986 does not exceed the budgetary discipline limit of 20·6 billion ecu.

Mr. Gow: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rating under the business expansion scheme for £1 invested for a person paying tax at a marginal rate of (a) 60 per cent. and (b) 30 per cent.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 7]: 60p and 30p respectively.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average amount of relief claimed by individuals making qualifying business expansion scheme investments; and what is the average rate of taxation so relieved.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 8]: The average investment in 1983-84 was about £5,000 and the average rate of tax relief was about 50 per cent. Figures are not yet available for 1984-85 investments.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide a breakdown between business expansion scheme relief allocated to individuals and to qualifying business expansion schemes funds, respectively.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 8]: Relief for investment under the business expansion scheme is given to individuals only. In 1983-84 just over 60 per cent. of the investments were made direct with the balance being made through approved funds. A comparable breakdown for 1984-85 is not yet available.

THE ARTS

Tourism

38. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the contribution of the arts to tourism.

Mr. Luce: Tourism is a growth industry to which the arts already make a significant contribution. The Government believe there is scope for further development and co-ordination between the interests concerned. I would refer the hon. Member to the report by the Cabinet Office Enterprise Unit, "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs: The Business of Tourism", published in July.

EMPLOYMENT

"Lifting the Burden"

Mr. Thurnham asked the Paymaster General what reactions he has received from small businesses following the publication of the White Paper, "Lifting the Burden".

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received on the White Paper, "Lifting the Burden".

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have received extensive representations from businesses following the publication of the White Paper "Lifting the Burden". These responses welcome the Government's commitment to the reduction of unnecessary administrative and legislative burdens on business which divert scarce resources from wealth and employment creating activities.

My right hon. and noble Friend and I propose to publish a further White Paper in the spring to describe progress on the proposals and reviews announced in "Lifting the Burden". Departments are now setting up their own mechanisms to review all new regulations for their costs to businesses. The enterprise and deregulation unit in my Department continues to act as the co-ordinating focus for this important work across Government. We shall continue to give priority to our work with our European partners in reducing EC burdens of regulation.

Tourism

Mr. Hicks asked the Paymaster General what account he takes, when fixing the annual grant-in-aid to the statutory tourist organisations, of the work they carry out to seek to persuade overseas visitors to visit United Kingdom regions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The British Tourist Authority is responsible for overseas promotion of tourism to Great Britain. Its marketing activities benefit all areas of the country and one of its objectives is to take all possible steps to spread overseas visitors to destinations throughout Britain, thus emphasising the attractions of Scotland, Wales and the English regions. However, it is not possible to isolate the benefit received by each region of BTA's expenditure directly.

Youth Training (Deaths and Injuries)

Mr. Skinner asked the Paymaster General how many young people have been (a) killed and (b) injured at work whilst participating in the youth opportunities programme or youth training scheme at the latest available date.

Mr. Trippier: The following are the numbers of fatalities and injuries on the youth opportunities programme and youth training scheme in the period 1 April 1980 to 30 June 1985—during this period there were some 1·5 million entrants to the youth opportunities programme and some 850,000 entrants to the youth training scheme.

Accidents on Youth Opportunities Programme and Youth Training Scheme: 1 April 1980—30 June 1985

Scheme	Period	Fatalities	*Accidents Injuries †Major Injuries	Minor Injuries	Total

Youth Training Scheme	1.4.83-30.6.85	9¶	318	2,989	3,316

Notes:

* Since 1 April 1983, the Manpower Services Commission's accident figures for the Youth Opportunities Programme and the Youth Training Scheme have been compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the Commission's figures will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

† Major injuries are classified according to severity criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations (NADOR) 1980.

‡ Statistical information on the number of accidents to trainees on the Youth Opportunities Programme prior to 1 April 1980 is not available.

‖ This figure includes 4 road traffic accidents and 3 lunchtime swimming accidents.

● Major injuries on the Youth Opportunities Programme during the period 1.4.82-31.3.83 have been reviewed by the MSC using the criteria laid down in NADOR. There were originally 311 recorded major injuries but, following the review, 123 of these have been reclassified as minor injuries, and the above table includes the revised figures.

Earnings Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Paymaster General what proportion of average weekly male earnings is attributable to overtime working.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is published in table 1 of new earnings survey, 1984, part A, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Job Release Scheme

Mr. Pawsey asked the Paymaster General how many men have taken advantage of the job release scheme since its inception and if any plans exist to extend its scope.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since its inception in January 1977, 293,000 people have taken advantage of the job release scheme. Figures are not available to show how many of these people were men. However, of the 57,000 participants in the scheme at the end of August 1985, 52,000 were men.

The scope of the job release scheme is kept under review.

Skill Shortages

Mr. Spearing asked the Paymaster General what estimates he has made of skill shortages both nationally and regionally and which skills are now in shortest supply.

Mr. Trippier: Evidence of skill shortages has emerged as the economic recovery has gathered pace. These shortages have been restricted mainly to the south east and are most prominent in high technology occupations, in particular, professional engineers and computer staff, but have also appared in traditional craft skills such as machinists, welders, and textiles-clothing occupations.

Redundancies

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General how many redundancies have been registered in Coventry, the west midlands and nationally in each year since 1974.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information is set out in the table below. Data on confirmed redundancies are not available for years before 1977. The hon. Member will wish to note that the figure shown for Coventry jobcentre areas for 1979 replaces that given in error in my reply to the hon. Member on 9 April 1984 at column 97.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General what are the unemployment figures for Coventry categorised by (a) sex, (b) age and (c) duration, for the latest month for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The figures relate to 11 July 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Stocks

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the stocks, and in each case the latest estimated value, of each food stock held in store in the United Kingdom and the European Economic Community and the estimated cost of storage.

Mr. Gummer: The United Kingdom intervention stocks of foodstuffs at 31 August 1985 and their estimated values based on the buying-in prices valid at that date were as follows:

	Tonnes	£
Breadwheat	58,975	7,005,000
Beef	64,742	164,324,000
Butter	198,022	374,340,000
Skimmed Milk Powder	40,801	43,931,000

The storage, handling and related costs of United Kingdom intervention products (including barley and feedwheat) in 1984 were £46·4 million.

EC stocks are only valued once a year, on 30 November. The volume of Community stocks of the same products at the latest available dates are as follows:

	Tonnes	Date
Breadwheat	4,197,000	27 September 1985
Beef	685,000	31 August 1985

	Tonnes	Date
Butter	994,025	26 September 1985
Skimmed Milk Powder	486,998	26 September 1985

Storage and handling costs for other member states' intervention stocks are not available.

Food Destruction

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of each kind of food were destroyed in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Economic Community in the latest year for which figures are available; and what, in each case, was the estimated value.

Mr. Gummer: The following quantities of foodstuffs were withdrawn from the market during the 1983-84 marketing year and are assumed to have been spoilt or wasted:

Product	Tonnes		Value of compensation paid by FEOGA £'000
	European Community	of which United Kingdom	European Community	of which United Kingdom
Cauliflowers	19,482	572	1,097	34
Tomatoes	4,115	181	229	11
Pears	12,530	262	921	19
Apples	32,076	3,641	2,327	219
Peaches	169,858	—	26,887	—
Apricots	49,642	—	6,782	—
Lemons	382,991	—	58,617	—
Mandarins	139,840	—	21,852	—
Oranges	477,207	—	64,903	—

In addition, 432 tonnes of fish were destroyed in the United Kingdom in 1984. Information on the value of this fish and of Community destruction of fish is not readily available.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting held in Luxembourg on 21 and 22 October 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Council heard a brief report from Commissioner Andriessen about his consultations with producer and other interests on the Commission's document entitled "Perspectives for the Common Agricultural Policy". The Commission intends to produce a further memorandum, relating particularly to cereals, in November and more specific proposals in December.

The Council agreed the rate of consumption aid for olive oil for the 1985-86 marketing year. There was a consensus in favour of the rate proposed by the Commission. I judged it right, exceptionally, to agree to the proposal in advance of its consideration by the Scrutiny Committee, bearing in mind that the new rate is required to apply from 1 November.

Similarly, I raised no objection to the formal adoption, in advance of consideration by the Scrutiny Committee, of two minor regulations relating to processed tomatoes and seed potatoes whose substance had been agreed during the recess.

The Council discussed further the Commission's proposals relating to the quota arrangements for sugar for the coming five years but reached no agreement.

The Council also considered a Commission proposal to alter the intervention price for raw sugar agreed earlier this year during the negotiations on farm prices. The Commission believed that tis might facilitate negotiations on the guaranteed price for raw sugar from the ACP countries. The proposal did not secure the Council's agreement.

Finally, the Council considered further the Commission's proposals on minimum welfare standards for battery cages for hens and on hormonal substances used as growth promoters. No agreement was reached. I stressed, in the former case, the urgency of both establishing and enforcing Community-wide standards and, in the latter case, the importance of taking decisions on the basis of scientific evidence and advice.

Common Agricultural Prices

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the effects on Supply Estimates of the decisions on common agricultural prices for 1985-86.

Mr. Jopling: Since the Supply Estimates of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce were prepared a number of changes have taken place in market prices, levels of production, exchange rates and trade volumes. Revised forecasts for 1985-86 have to take account of these changes (which gave rise to a Summer Supplementary Estimate) as well as the effects of the decisions taken on the common agricultural policy prices. Most of the relevant expenditure is funded from the Community budget although expenditure on intervention purchases is not recouped until the goods are sold. Expenditure net of Community receipts is therefore forecast to change as a result of the price fixing decisions only in the section relating to public intervention operations (A of Class III.I). There were no changes in schemes only partly funded by the Community (C of Class III.I). The common agricultural price decisions, including the price reductions for cereals and rapeseed imposed by the EC Commission, are estimated to reduce the net call on Exchequer funds by about £37 million, as indicated in the table below:

£ million

	Net Expenditure (before allowing for receipts from the Community)		Receipts from Community		Exchequer Expenditure
A. Supply and Summer Supplementary Estimates 1985-86	1,547		(1,134)		413
B. Forecast before price fixing (15 July 1985 for cereals and rapeseed; 15 May 1985 for other products)	1,856		(1,090)		766
C. Forecast after price fixing*	1,892		(1,163)		724
D. Effect of price fixing (C−B)	+36	−	(+73)	=	-37

*Includes payments under the fully-funded ewe premium brought forward from 1986-7 following a change in the Community marketing year.

SCOTLAND

Farm Animal Health

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farmers in central Scotland have reported to his officials unusual problems in the health of farm animals for the years 1974 to 1985 inclusive; and what action has subsequently been taken by them.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available. Animal health problems are primarily a matter for the farmer and his veterinary surgeon. As stated in the Lenihan report, records are not held centrally other than for notifiable diseases.

Milk

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has made to the Scottish Milk Marketing Board on the matter of testing milk samples from farms within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire for the presence of traces of diozins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls; and if he has offered any public funds to the Scottish Milk Marketing Board to assist with the purchase, calibration and operation of the appropriate scientific equipment to conduct such analyses at the level of parts per trillion.

Mr. John MacKay: None. Public health sampling and testing of milk is the responsibility of local authorities.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farms within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, are selling milk to the general public direct from the farm as well as or instead of through the Scottish Milk Marketing Board.

Mr. John MacKay: Fourteen.

Re-Chem Plants

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he proposes to ensure that the chimney stack of the former Re-Chem International incinerator plant at Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire is dismantled by the public authorities and subjected to exhaustive non-destructive testing to ascertain the nature and quantities of toxic materials deposited within the chimney; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Disposal of solid waste is regulated by the Control of Pollution Act 1974 part I, administered in Scotland by district and islands councils. The disposal of waste from the premises of Re-Chem International Ltd. is thus a matter for that company and Falkirk district council.

I understand that samples have been taken from the stack by officials of Falkirk district council and of my Department and are being analysed.

The Hazardous Waste Inspectorate, Scotland, is available to advise the Council on appropriate means of disposal.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that the chimney stack at the former Re-Chem International incineration plant at Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, was of suitable design for the functions it was required to perform; and whether he will publish the detailed reports made on this chimney by his officials at various times between 1974 and 1984 inclusive.

Mr. Michael Ancram: The Chief Industrial Pollution Inspector was required in 1974, before first registration of the Bonnybridge plant as a chemical incineration works under the Alkali etc. Works Regulation Act 1906, to satisfy himself that the stack height was sufficient to secure adequate dispersion of stack gases and particulate. Dispersion proved not wholly adequate and in 1976, in the light of advice from the Imperial College of Science and Technology and the Department of Aeronautics of the University of Bristol, ReChem International Ltd. increased the stack height from 120 to 200ft which the inspectorate considered adequate. The reports to ReChem International Ltd. by Imperial College and the University of Bristol are the property of that company. It is not the practice to make public the detailed reports prepared by inspectors in the course of their regular inspections of registered premises.

Water Supply (Pollution)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied that polychlorinated biphenyls, polybrominated biphenyls, dioxins or furans have not been inadvertently deposited into the public water supply of central Scotland, by aerial deposition, dumping or leaching from watercourses and groundwaters.

Mr. Ancram: It is the responsibility of the local water authority to ensure that water in its public supplies is wholesome. I understand that earlier this year Central Regional Council took special steps to satisfy itself that water supplies were not contaminated by individual PCBs or other unusual compounds.

Environmental Pollution

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many hours his officials have spent between 1982 and 1984, inclusive, interviewing (a) farmers in central Scotland who had reported suspicions that their livestock had been affected by environmental pollution, and (b) farmers whom his officials considered to be at risk from or affected by environmental pollution.

Mr. John MacKay: Officials of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and the State Veterinary Service spent approximately 130 hours during the period conducting interviews with farmers on this subject. This does not include any investigations conducted by the Agricultural College veterinary investigation services staff.

Toxic Emissions

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will publish, in detail and also in a form accessible and intelligible to the non-scientific general public, the results of investigations by his officials and others into the possible presence of dioxins, furans and other toxic compounds in emissions from municipal refuse incinerators in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: I understand that tests relating to their incinerators have been carried out on behalf of the City of Edinburgh district council and Falkirk district council, to whom the reports were submitted. A report on investigations by the Warren Spring laboratory into the possible presence of dioxins, furans and other toxic compounds in emissions from a number of municipal incinerators in Great Britain is expected to be published during the course of next year.

Waste Incinerators

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the procedure which should be followed during a test burn at a waste incinerator and the methods of sampling and analysis employed.

Mr. Ancram: Definition, in any particular case, of the procedure for a test burn is a matter for the supplier of an incinerator, for its purchaser or operator and for any relevant regulatory body. In general, the procedure should follow sound principles of experimental design:

1. The objectives of the test burn should be clearly defined and all operating parameters should be strictly controlled.
2. All samples taken must be analysed according to specified and proven techniques.
3. The test run should be reported in detail.

Hazardous Wastes

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice his officials have provided since October 1984 to local authorities regarding means other than incineration for dealing with hazardous wastes.

Mr. Ancram: My officials have provided advice to local authorities for dealing with hazardous waste on the basis of the best practical environmental option; this can involve incineration, processing, treatment or land filling. Advice has also been provided in a published series of Government waste management papers.

European Anti-poverty Programme

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland for which organisations in Scotland he received projects involving proposals for the European anti-poverty programme; why he declined to submit such proposals to the EEC Commission; and what was the estimate of the amount required by local authorities to match the EEC money.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland decided that participation in the second EC anti-poverty programme was not justified in the light of the potentially very limited benefits to Scotland when compared with offsetting considerations. Project proposals were not therefore invited. Three applications, from Age Concern (Scotland), the Easterhouse Festival Society and West Lothian Poverty Action Forum, were nevertheless received by the Scottish Office. Applicants were advised that their proposals could not be accepted.

Any funds received from the EC anti-poverty programme have to be matched by an equal local contribution from central or local government, voluntary or private sector resources. The amount would have depended on which, if any, projects were approved but our best estimate was that Scotland might have received about £95,000 a year from the programme.

Teachers' Superannuation Scheme (Report)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will lay before Parliament the Government Actuary's report on the actuarial inquiry into the Teachers' Superannuation Scheme (Scotland) for the quinquennium 1 April 1976 to 31 March 1981.

Mr. Younger: I have today laid this report before Parliament (House of Commons No. 582) and arrangements have been made for its publication tomorrow.

Boundary Commisson for Scotland (Deputy Chairman)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether any recent appointment has been made to the post of deputy chairman of the Boundary Commission for Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The Lord President of the Court of Session appointed the Honourable Lord Davidson as deputy chairman of the Boundary Commission for Scotland on 25 September 1985 to succeed the right Hon. Lord Ross, who has been appointed Lord Justice Clerk.

Lord Davidson's term of office expires on 31 December 1988.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Rockall

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's discussions with the Government of the Republic of Ireland about the sovereignty of Rockall.

Mr. Eggar: Discussions have taken place in the past about the delimitation of the continental shelf in the area of the Hatton Rockall plateau, but there have been no discussions about our sovereignty over the island of Rockall.

South Africa

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many citizens of South Africa are also United Kingdom nationals; and how many are eligible to claim United Kingdom citizenship.

Mr. Rifkind: Precise figures of British citizens and other British nationals in South Africa are not available. It is estimated that there are between 1 million and 2 million persons of British birth or descent in South Africa.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the number of people resident in South Africa with (a) potential or (b) actual rights of residence in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Rifkind: Precise information is not available. It is estimated that between 500,000 and 1 million residents in South Africa would be entitled to settle in the United Kingdom.

Drugs

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government through the United Nations and other international bodies to bring about the banning of all illicit international traffic in cocaine and opium based drugs.

Mr. Eggar: The illicit trafficking in drugs and psychotropic substances is banned by two existing United Nations conventions, namely the United Nations single convention on narcotic drugs 1961 and the United Nations convention on psychotropic substances 1971. The United Nations Commission on Narcotic Drugs is responsible for overseeing the effective application of these conventions. We play an active and constructive role in the work of the Commission. We also support efforts to draw up a third United Nations convention whose aim would be to improve controls on international drug trafficking, including measures to facilitate the extradition of drug traffickers and the tracing, freezing and forfeiture of the proceeds of drug trafficking, wherever in the world such trafficking occurred.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding negotiations to ban the use of chemical weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) yesterday at column 126.

Nuclear Weapons (Non-Proliferation)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the third review conference on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons in Geneva.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 21 October at column 65.

Czechoslovakia Compensation Fund

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the total sums to the latest convenient date paid to applicants, to the Inland Revenue in respect of taxation, and to the Exchequer in respect of the commission's expenses, respectively, as regards claims from the Czechoslovakian compensation fund under the Foreign Compensation Act 1950.

Mr. Eggar: Most of the Czechoslovakia compensation fund was invested by the Foreign Compensation Commission as soon as the commission received it. This investment produced an income of £1,074,367·95 for the fund up to 31 March 1985. The commission paid a total of £322,310·10 to the Inland Revenue in respect of taxation assessed on this investment income up to 31 March 1985. The commission also paid a total of £469,460 into the Exchequer in respect of expenses attributable to the Fund up to 30 September 1984. No sums have as yet been paid to claimants.

Treaty of Rome

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all proposals for amendments to the Treaty of Rome which have been tabled at the intergovernmental conference; and if he will place the texts of these proposals in the Library.

Mr. Rifkind: The Commission have transmitted their proposals to the European Parliament. I am arranging for copies of these to be placed in the Library of the House. Other member states have not made their proposals public while discussion of them continues in the IGC.

Soviet Personnel

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why six alleged Soviet intelligence agents were allowed to remain in the United Kingdom after the expulsion of 25 others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: There are degrees of involvement in intelligence activities. We initially expelled the 25 intelligence officers against whom we had incontrovertible evidence of the most unacceptable activities. We made clear to the Soviet authorities that if they retaliated through the wholly unjust expulsion of Britons in Moscow we would have to respond. We therefore decided to expel six other Soviet officials who had also been identified as working for Soviet intelligence, though of lesser importance.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will report on the results of the meetings of the Foreign Affairs Council on 1 October and 21 and 22 October.

Mr. Rifkind: The Foreign Affairs Council met on 1 October and 21-22 October.

On 1 October I represented the United Kingdom. On 21-22 October my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, (Mr. Channon) my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth affairs, (Mr. Eggar) and I represented the United Kingdom.

On 1 October the Council had a first discussion of the Commission's proposals for the adaptation of the Community's agreements with Mediterranean third countries to take account of enlargement.

The Council discussed the Community position in the United Nations Special programme of action for least developed countries to be held at Geneva including the offer of a new system of export earnings compensation for least developed countries not covered by the Lomé convention.

The Council held a general discussion on EC-US trade relations.

The President of the Commission introduced the Commission paper on measures to improve Europe's performance in high technology. The paper was referred to Ministers responsible for research for further consideration.

In political co-operation the Ministers of the Ten, Spain and Portugal issued a statement condemning the bombing of the PLO headquarters in Tunis. This statement has been placed in the Library of the House.

On 21-22 October the Council discussed adaptation of the Community's agreements with Mediterranean third countries to take account of enlargement.

The Council discussed bilateral trade relations between the Community and the United States, and agreed a declaration which stressed the importance of working for mutually acceptable solutions to outstanding problems and resisting protectionist pressures. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

The Council held a discussion of trade relations with Japan prior to the visit of several Commissioners to Tokyo in November.

The Council agreed in principle to a proposal by the Commission to accelerate tariff cuts agreed under the Tokyo round.

Agreement on a draft directive on frontier controls was blocked by the continuing opposition of Denmark.

An EC-Israel co-operation Council was held in the margins of the meeting.

Johnson Matthey

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will set up an inquiry to examine the evidence in the letter to him from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch and enclosures of 4 October together with subsequent evidence relating to the conduct of members of the Bank of England, Mahmud Sipra, his solicitors and others in matters arising out of the Johnson Matthey banking collapse;

(2) if he will set up an inquiry to examine the conduct of (a) the Governor of the Bank of England, (b) directors of Johnson Matthey bank appointed by the Bank and (c) David Curtis and Mr. Thomason of Hambros Bank in relation to their activities concerning Johnson Matthey bank.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Member's letter to me of 4 October, which was reported in the press, raised criminal and other allegations against the management of Johnson Matthey Bankers, their advisers Hambros Bank, and the Bank of England. The hon. Member also made the accusation that the police investigation of which I informed the House on 17 July, at column 320, was "a cover up". I referred the hon. Member's letter to the law officers and to the Governor of the Bank of England.

With the Governor's agreement the chairman of JMB has today sent the hon. Member a detailed letter denying the hon. Member's allegations in categorical terms. A copy is being placed in the Library of the House. As for the grave accusation of a "cover up", the hon. Member received earlier this week an equally categorical rebuttal from my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, and I am arranging for the text to be published in the Official Report. If there are any matters for the police to pursue I am confident they will do so. I see no need for an inquiry into any of the matters which the hon. Member has raised and I hope that, in the light of the very full replies which he has received, he will withdraw his allegations.

Following is the letter:

21 October 1985

Brian Sedgemore Esq MP
House of Commons
London SW1

Dear Brian,

Your letter of 4 October to the Chancellor of the Exchequer was copied to the Attorney-General and to the Governor of the Bank of England, because it raised matters falling within their respective responsibilities. In the continuing absence of the Attorney-General following his recent operation I am replying on his behalf.

I have of course taken serious note of your grave allegation that the preliminary police investigation into JMB is a cover-up, and that it is being constrained by less than full cooperation from JMB itself. The Controller of Fraud Investigation Groups within the DPP has discussed with Detective Chief Superintendent Squires (who is leading the investigation into JMB's affairs) your allegation that the Bank of England has "kept a lid" on the investigation by, in particular, restricting access to papers. I am informed that DCS Squires disagrees: he has no complaint to make of lack of cooperation from the present management of JMB. Up to now it has not been necessary for the police to seek access to the whole of JMB's papers, but whatever they have needed to see has in each instance been made freely available. I understand that Treasury officials have also been in touch with JMB, whose Chairman has reaffirmed JMB's full and willing cooperation with the police investigation.

I hope I do not need to assert to you that in the conduct of such an investigation the Police Service is wholly independent of the Executive, as is the DPP (who is subject only to the superintendence of the Attorney-General).

Your letter of 4 October also outlined allegations made by a Mr. Hussein that there had been an attempt on behalf of JMB to procure the execution of a back-dated agreement, which would have had the effect of giving JMB priority over other creditors of companies owned by Sipra, thereby defrauding them. I understand Mr. Hussein has been seen by the police who are looking into the matter.

I do not agree with your assertion that the criminal process is "wholly unsuited to find out what has happened". In the face of allegations that serious criminal offences have been committed I regard it as entirely appropriate.

I am copying this letter to the Chancellor.

Yours,
Patrick

Public Sector Pay

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage increase in pay for public sector workers has been allowed for in each financial year since 1980-81; and what was the actual percentage increase.

Mr. MacGregor: The percentage increases in pay rates for central Government groups allowed for in expenditure plans and Estimates (known as the pay assumption) are set out in the table below. The groups covered by these pay assumptions have included civil servants, the armed forces, and NHS employees. For the purposes of illustration, the table shows the actual percentage pay settlements for non-industrial civil servants.

These pay assumptions applied only to central Government. In the local authority sector, no specific provision was made for pay in determining the rate support grant and expenditure plans.

Table: Central Government Pay Settlements

Year	Pay Assumption (per cent.)	Pay Settlements (per cent.)*
1980-81 to 1981-82	6	7·50
1981-82 to 1982-83	4	5·90
1982-83 to 1983-84	3½	4·86
1983-84 to 1984-85	3	4·55
1984-85 to 1985-86	3	4·90

* These increases refer, for the purposes of illustration, only to non-industrial civil servants.

Tax Relief

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of tax relief on donations to charities, mortgage interest, life insurance premiums and pension contributions, respectively, as a proportion of gross domestic product (a) 10 years ago and (b) in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: Estimates are as follows:

Ratio (per cent.) of Direct Revenue Costs of Tax Relief to GDP

Relief for	1974-75	1984-85
Donations to charities*	0·06	0·06
Mortgage interest	0·78	†1·08
Life insurance premiums‡	0·17	0·22
Approved occupational pension schemes	0·38	0·54

Notes:

* The figures for charities consist of income tax repayments to charities in respect of deeds of covenant, higher rate relief on covenanted donations, and estate duty/capital transfer tax exemption of transfers to charities on death. No information is available on income which charities received without deduction of tax.

† Provisional.

‡ Life insurance premium relief was abolished for policies taken out after 13 March 1984, so the cost of relief for 1984-85 relates to policies taken out on or before that date.

‖ The estimates of tax relief for pension schemes depend on the basis used. The figures given use the basis set out in the Inland Revenue's note of February 1978 to the General Sub-Committee of the Expenditure Committee (Second Report, 1977-78, Appendix 15). This is the only basis for which comparable figures for 1974-75 and 1984-85 are available.

VAT

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement, pursuant to the answer on 1 February, Official Report, c 335, as to Her Majesty's Government's present position relating to the reasoned opinion under article 169 of the Treaty of Rome in the matter of value added tax on non-domestic construction work.

Mr. Gow: There was an inconclusive exchange of letters in the summer, but that apart the position is as stated in my predecessor's answer to my hon. Friend on 1 February [Official Report, c. 335.]

Sterling M3

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in sterling M3 from May 1979 to the latest available date together with the division of this increase in the money supply between the public and private sectors.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. The figures are published in tables 11.2 and 11.3 of "Financial Statistics". Sterling M3 is defined as notes and coin in circulation with the public, plus the United Kingdom private sector's holdings of sight and time deposits. Virtually the whole of £M3 is held by the private sector, by definition.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made as to which business sectors have benefited from the increase in the money supply, sterling M3, since May 1979; and whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, in each case, such information as is available to him as to the increase in their monetary assets since that date.

Mr. Ian Stewart: On the components side, figures for the United Kingdom monetary sector's liabilities to other financial institutions and to industrial and commercial companies are published in "Financial Statistics", table 6.2. As for the counterparts to £M3, a more detailed analysis of lending to United Kingdom residents is in table 6.6 of the same publication.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing to what extent the increase in the money supply, sterling M3, between May 1979 and the latest available date is due to spending by the public sector net of funding and assets realisation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Figures for the counterparts to £M3 are published in table 11.5 of "Financial Statistics". The PSBR is shown net of asset realisations.

EC (Draft Budget)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assumptions regarding the dollar/ecu exchange rate were made in the draft 1986 European Economic Community budget prepared by (a) the European Commission and (b) the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his reply, 23 October 1984, Vol. 84, c. 167]: In the 1986 preliminary draft budget the Commission has assumed a dollar/ecu exchange rate of $1=1·20ecu. The Council accepted this assumption in establishing its draft budget.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all amendments to the Commission preliminary draft 1986 European Economic Community budget made by the Council of Ministers, and if he will place copies of both documents in the Library.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his reply, 23 October 1985, Vol. 84, c. 167]: Copies of the 1986 preliminary draft budget and the 1986 draft budget as established by the Council have been deposited with the House authorities in the usual way.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to ensure that European Economic Community spending on agriculture during 1986 does not exceed the budgetary discipline limit of 20·6 billion ecu.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his reply, 23 October 1985, Vol. 84, c. 167]: The draft Community budget for 1986 agreed by the Council of Ministers includes provision for CAP market support expenditure in the 10 present member states which is consistent with the Council's budget discipline conclusions. It is the responsibility of the Commission to manage the CAP within the budgetary provision. In a declaration attached to the budget discipline agreement the Commission undertook not to introduce a supplementary budget until it has exhausted all the opportunities for savings afforded by management of the CAP and by any additional Council decisions.

TRANSPORT

Cross-Channel Link

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to a cross-channel link to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am happy that an exhibition on a channel fixed link should be arranged in the Upper Waiting Hall. I have agreed with the House authorities that this is without prejudice to similar exhibitions being arranged on other channel fixed link projects should other promoters wish to arrange them and the House timetable permit it.

Pedestrian Crossings

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his review of timings on pedestrian crossings which are heavily used by elderly people.

Mrs. Chalker: There are two changes to the timings which could be provided to assist elderly people at pelican crossings. The first is to delay the start of the flashing amber signal to traffic by two seconds. This requires a change to the Pelican Pedestrian Crossing Regulations and General Directions 1969 (as amended) which are currently being revised. The other change is to increase the green man time by two seconds. This change will be implemented nationally at the same time that the regulations are revised, but some local authorities have already increased this timing in advance.

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of the M25 are currently lit, whether he has any plans to light the remaining stages, and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: There is now approximately 40 miles of road lighting on the 100 miles of M25 motorway including an allowance for isolated lit junctions. I have no present plans to light the remaining stages, but will keep this under review.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many junctions on the M25 are lit, and whether he has any plans to light the remaining junctions.

Mrs. Chalker: The following junctions on the M25 are lit; junctions 2, 5, 7, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and 31.

In addition, I plan to light junctions 6 and 11. Junctions 21 and 21A will also be lit when this section of the motorway is opened.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what warning systems, lights and fog detection systems are in use on the M25, where not in use, what plans there are to bring them into use, and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Matrix speed warning signals are in use on the M25 at these locations: between junctions 9A and 10, on the northern approaches to the Dartford tunnel, and between junctions 25 and 27, which includes the Holmesdale and Bell Common tunnels. Elsewhere, flashing amber lights at the roadside are provided. These will be replaced by matrix signals.

A fog detection system is in use between junctions 9A and 10—the Mole Valley section of the motorway.

No other warning systems are in use although closed circuit television is used on sections of the motorway to monitor traffic.

Automatic incident detection is being provided during 1986-87 in the area of the Holmesdale and Bell Common tunnels. Thereafter, consideration will be given to extend this facility to the approaches to the Dartford tunnel.

I am considering what more may need to be done about fog.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans there are to light the remaining stages of the M1, and if he will make a statement on the anticipated cost in providing new lighting systems.

Mrs. Chalker: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend on 12 December 1984. [Official Report, Vol. 69, c. 526 and 527].

Motorway Construction

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to revise the arrangements for monitoring the construction of new motorways prior to completion by his Department and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We are considering the curtailment of some of the independent decision making powers of the engineer (our consultants) in future road construction contracts. We have recently invited comments on our proposals from the Institution of Civil Engineers, the Association of Consulting Engineers and the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all new motorways or extensions to existing motorways giving projected dates of completion and indicate in each case whether motorway lighting is to be provided.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

Motorway Service Stations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport when it is expected that all four motorway service stations on the M25 will be opened; and if he will give the anticipated dates of opening for each.

Mrs. Chalker: The motorway service area at South Mimms should, subject to final planning clearance, open towards the end of 1986 at about the time the M25 is completed. An MSA at Thurrock should be developed soon afterwards, but expected local planning inquiries into proposals for Clacket Lane and Iver are likely to delay these developments for about a further year.

Motorway (Road Works)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will detail the planned road works due to take place over the next six months on each motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: The following road works are planned to be in progress on the motorways for some or all of the period up to 31 March 1986:

Diesel Multiple Units

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, before a contract to build 23-metre diesel multiple units for British Rail is awarded, he will arrange an independent investigation of the tenders to see if any malpractice has occurred, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Decisions on contracts are entirely a matter for the British Railways Board, and I know of no reason why this case should be an exception.

Public Service Vehicles

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will seek to reduce the maximum permissible speed limit for road passenger service vehicles to 50 mph;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to ban coaches from the outside third lane of three-lane motorways;

(3) whether he is now proposing any new measures to seek to reduce coach accidents, and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I recognise the concerns reflected in my hon. Friend's questions. As I assured the House on 22 October, I am looking very carefully at every aspect of the speed and safety of coaches on motorways. I must consider all the evidence before making final decisions.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now seek to establish a system for monitoring coach crashes in separate accident statistics.

Mrs. Chalker: The existing reporting system, Stats 19, already identifies those accidents involving buses or coaches, and these statistics are published in "Road Accidents Great Britain."

It is, however, difficult for reporting officers to make a distinction between bus and coach involvements, although in most motorway accidents the statistics will refer to coaches.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce measures to make all double-decked coaches subject to the same laws as double-decked buses.

Mrs. Chalker: No distinction is drawn between double-decked coaches and double-decked buses in the application of construction and safety requirements.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Dispute

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further action he intends to take to seek to resove the teachers' dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made to the House on 22 October column 152.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of school teachers has participated in industrial action involving absence from their place of work since 1 January 1985.

Sir Keith Joseph: Of the six school teacher unions which represent a total of 442,000 teachers, only two—the National Union of Teachers and the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, with a combined membership of 332,000 — have engaged in strikes in pursuit of their pay claim this year. No figures are available in the Department of the proportion of members who have followed their unions' advice or instructions to join these strikes virtually all of which have been selective and of short duration and so designed as to cause maximum disruption to the schools at mimimum cost to the teacher unions involved. However, I understand that some members of these unions have not struck and I respect their decision to put their pupils' interests first.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science to what extent teachers are paid additional remuneration whilst attending courses not in term time.

Sir Keith Joseph: Salary scales for teachers in maintained schools in England and Wales are set out in the Burnham document in the form of annual salary rates applicable to full-time teachers. Overtime or any other payments are not available for work or training undertaken out of timetabled school hours. Allowances for expenses while attending courses may be paid at local education authority discretion, but information about this is not held centrally.

Polytechnics

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the criteria that he applies when deciding whether or not to grant polytechnic status to an existing institution of higher and further education.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has indicated that he would welcome advice from the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education whether and, if so, on what basis further institutions should be added to the original list designated as polytechnics following publication of the 1966 White Paper, "A Plan for Polytechnics and Other Colleges."

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the National Advisory Body for Further and Higher Education to make recommendations about future new polytechnics.

Mr. Brooke: No deadline has been set but I understand that the national advisory body hopes to offer advice by early 1986.

ENERGY

Miners (Unemployment Benefit)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the calculation of unemployment benefit for miners who were engaged in industrial action in 1984 and 1985 and who accept redundancy in the coming months.

Mr. David Hunt: I am advised that entitlement to unemployment benefit for claims commencing in the 1986 benefit year depends upon the claimants' national insurance contributions record during the 1984-85 tax year. This will apply to miners whose redundancy date falls on or after 3 January 1986. Subject to their otherwise satisfying the conditions for receipt of unemployment benefit, those men who paid national insurance contributions on earnings of 50 times the specified lower earnings limit (£1,700) or more will be entitled to payment at the standard rate of £30·45 pw, plus £18·80 pw dependant's allowance where applicable; those who paid contributions on between 37½ and 50 times the lower earnings limit (£1,275-£1,699) will receive reduced rates of £22·84 pw and £14·10 pw; those who paid contributions on between 25 and 37½ times the lower earnings limit (£850-£1,274) will receive reduced rates of £15·23 pw and £9·40 pw respectively; and those who paid contributions on earnings of less than £850 will have no entitlement.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General what was the cost of Detective Superintendent Hardy's visit to the West Indies with a colleague on the investigation relating to the loss of HMS Conqueror's log book.

The Solicitor-General: Six thousand nine hundred and forty pounds and eighty two pence.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General whether he has any conveniently available figures for the cost of the inquiry into the loss of HMS Conqueror's log book.

The Solicitor-General: So far as concerns the cost of the police investigation in the West Indies, I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I have just given to his question on that matter. I am not able to quantify the other costs of the police investigation. In so far as the question relates to the inquiry made by naval authorities, it is a matter for my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if the conclusion of the Director of Public Prosecutions that further police investigations were unlikely to produce any evidence of the commission of a criminal offence regarding the disappearance of the control room log of HMS Conqueror was based on information about the whereabouts at the time, or the current whereabouts, of the relevant portions of the log; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: The police investigations were unable to identify at what point of time or in what circumstances the control room logs in question were improperly handled with the result that they are now missing. Their present whereabouts are not known. The conclusion that further investigations are unlikely to provide evidence of the commission of a criminal offence is based on the inconclusiveness of the information so far obtained about the circumstances in which the logs disappeared and the absence of any leads to further avenues of inquiry which might throw light on those circumstances.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General pursuant to the answer of 21 October, Official Report, column 12, regarding the disappearance of the control room log of HMS Conqueror, whether the police inquiry revealed that a criminal offence had been committed; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 21 October. The conclusion of the Director of Public Prosecutions, in the light of the report of the police investigations, was that the evidence available did not establish that a criminal offence had been committed in connection with the disappearance of the logs. I concurred in that conclusion.

Prosecution Criteria

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General what criteria as regards the robustness of the evidence and the likelihood of securing a conviction the Director of Public Prosecutions employs in deciding whether to mount a prosecution; whether any special criteria apply in the case of alleged offences under the Official Secrets Acts; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: All cases referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions are considered in the light of the Attorney-General's "Guidelines on the Criteria for Prosecution" which were published in February 1983, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House. Prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act 1911 are treated no differently from any other case which the director has to consider.

PRIME MINISTER

Charities

Q14. Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister if the Government will now introduce legislation to provide financial incentives for private contributions for charitable purposes, including famine relief.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Tax relief is already given for payments made to a charity under a deed of covenant. The Government have introduced a number of measures to encourage charitable giving; for example, in this year's Budget the limit on covenanted donations qualifying for higher rate tax relief was increased from £5,000 to £10,000.

Mr. Shimon Peres

Q26. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether a date has yet been fixed for Mr. Shimon Peres to visit the United Kingdom.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The visit has been fixed for early 1986. Precise dates will be announced nearer the time.

Civil Servants

Q40. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) of 26 February, Official Report, column 132. about the letter from Sir Robert Armstrong about the duties and responsibilities of civil servants in relation to Ministers, over any convenient period, what was the number of occasions on which a senior civil servant has gone, in relation to a matter of conscience, to the head of the Home Civil Service; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Sir Robert Armstrong's note said:

"11. A civil servant who feels that to act or to abstain from acting in a particular way, or to acquiesce in a particular decision for course of action, would raise for him or her a fundamental issue of conscience, or is so profoundly opposed to a policy as to feel unable conscientiously to administer it in accordance with the standards described in this note, should consult a superior officer, or in the last resort the Permanent Head of the Department, who can and should if necessary consult the Head of the Home Civil Service."

The words "or in the last resort the Permanent Head of the Department" were inadvertently omitted from the text of the note printed in the Official Report for 26 February 1985, at columns 130-2].

The procedure envisaged is thus for the civil servant troubled by an issue of conscience in the manner described to consult in the first instance a superior officer, or in the last resort his permanent secretary. It is only after there has been consultation of the permanent secretary that there is any question of consulting the head of the Home Civil Service, and then it is for the permanent secretary and not for the individual concerned to initiate that consultation.

Such approaches to the head of the Home Civil Service are likely to be very rare. They would be treated as entirely confidential, and it would not be appropriate to disclose information about them. But I can say that there have been no such approaches since Sir Robert Armstrong's note was issued on 26 February 1985.

European Council

Q71. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister, if she is satisfied with the preparations made for the next meeting of the European Council in December, and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

It is for the Luxembourg Presidency to make arrangements for the European Council in December. I expect the work of the inter-governmental conference, now in progress, to be one of the main topics at that meeting.

Engagements

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 24 October.

Mrs. Peacock asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 October.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is in New York to address the 40th anniversary meeting of the United Nations General Assembly, and to have meetings with President Reagan and others.

Personal Data

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister when Her Majesty's Government will ratify the Council of Europe convention for the protection of individuals with regard to the automatic processing of personal data.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

We expect to ratify the convention in August 1987. It will then come into force in respect of the United Kingdom on 1 December 1987, at which time all the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 will be fully enforceable.

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister what steps Her Majesty's Government will take to ensure access by individuals to personal data files held by Government Departments and state agencies.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The Data Protection Act 1984 applies to all those, including Government Departments and state agencies, who control the contents and use of personal information which is processed automatically. Except where one of the limited exemptions provided in the Act applies, any person who is the subject of information held on computer will, from November 1987, have a right to know what information about him is held and to have a copy of it. The Government have no present proposals to grant a similar general right of access to personal records held on paper files.

Public Money (Allocation)

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister what is the total overall identifiable allocation of public money made by the Government since 1979 to (a) Edinburgh, (b) Bristol, (c) Lambeth, (d) Newcastle, (e) Hammersmith, (f) Cardiff, (g) Haringey, (h) Southampton, (i) Leicester and (j) Leeds (i) in total, (ii) per person and (iii) per unemployed person aged under 21 years.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The readily available information covers grants and subsidies paid to local authorities. These include rate support grant, housing subsidies, housing benefit, specific revenue grants and capital grants.

Table 1 shows the totals for each of the authorities concerned from 1979-80 to 1985-86 and the amounts per person. Information on unemployed persons under 21 by local authority area is not readily available.

The totals for the English authorities for 1984-85 and 1985-86 do not include capital grants, for which figures are not yet available. The capital grants figures included in the totals for these authorities from 1979-80 to 1983-84 are shown in table 2.

1. The figures included for rate support grant are affected by the change which occurred in 1981-82 when block grant and domestic rate relief grant superseded the needs, resources and domestic elements. The figures prior to 1981-82 are not on a comparable basis.

2. Up to 1982-83 the figures include rent and rate rebates grants paid by the DOE. The 1982-83 figures also include some housing benefits paid by the DHSS. Thereafter, all housing benefits were paid by the DHSS.

3. Capital grants are not available for English authorities for 1984-85 and 1985-86 and they are excluded from the totals for these years. Table 2 shows the amounts included for capital grants in the totals for the English authorities up to 1983-84.

4. Population figures provided by OCPS for the years up to 1984-85 have been used to calculate the figures per person. The 1984-85 figures have been used as estimates for 1985-86.

GCHQ

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will now list the dates on which industrial action has taken place at Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham, since May 1979.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs told the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on 30 January 1984:

—There was a one-day strike on 23 February 1979 followed by selective active continuing until 2 April 1979.
—On 22 June 1979 there was another one-day strike followed by selective action up to and including 25 July.
—In September 1979 there was a work to rule and overtime ban by industrial staff.
—Between 20 December 1979 and 13 February 1980 there was industrial action in support of a pay dispute by station radio officers.
—On 14 May 1980, GCHQ staff were involved in the TUC day of action.
—On 27 November 1980 there was a protest meeting against the cancellation of the pay research unit.
—On 9 March 1981 there was a one-day strike followed by various forms of industrial action until 14 April 1981.
—Between 10 June 1982 and 26 October 1982 there was an overtime ban by staff at an overseas station.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Credit Guarantees

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the current limit for export credit guarantees available for each country in Latin America and the Caribbean and the extent of take-up in each case.

Mr. Channon: No. It has been the policy of successive Administrations not to disclose details of the Export Credits Guarantee Department's individual country limits or exposure.

Audio and Video Tape Recording

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide details of the current extent of home taping of copyright pre-recorded music in millions of hours per year and the proportion of television programmes seen more than once through the use of video recording machines.

Mr. Butcher: The Government do not compile statistics on either of these activities, but respondents to the recent Green Paper "The Recording and Rental of Audio and Video Copyright Material" (Cmnd. 9445) have submitted the results of commissioned market research. These give estimates of the extent of home taping of copyright music varying from 312 to 466 million hours a year. One survey estimates that 7 per cent. of viewed programmes are recorded and watched, with 1 per cent. being seen more than once.

Comprehensive Bankers' Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether a decision has been taken on the future of the comprehensive bankers' guarantee scheme operated by the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Channon: This scheme has been under review because demand for it has been falling and it has been losing money. I have decided, after consultation with existing users and the banks, that the scheme should be phased out over a period of two years. It is no longer fulfilling its original purpose and the banks and other financial institutions are well able to provide alternative forms of short term export trade finance to viable companies. The Export Credits Guarantee Department will be advising all current users of the detailed arrangements.

WALES

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions over the past six years he has met the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality and if he will make a statement on his working relationship with the commission.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has had no meetings with the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality. A Welsh Office official attends meetings of the commission's Welsh Consultative Committee, and in addition there is contact from time to time between officials of the Department and the commission's Birmingham office.

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the cash available to combat acquired immune deficiency syndrome in Wales, where treatment for acquired immune deficiency syndrome in Wales will be located, how much cash each centre will receive, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Health recently announced that the Government were making £912,000 available in 1985-86 to combat AIDS, in addition to the £978,000 that had previously been announced. These funding measures, from which Wales will benefit, provide for the development of a training programme for counsellors, and testing of blood samples at Public Health Laboratory Service laboratories, assistance for voluntary organisations, and public health education work. In addition, the Government have channelled £376,000 for research into AIDS through the Medical Research Council.

In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has made available £335,000 this year to provide facilities for the screening of blood donations at the Welsh regional blood transfusion centre, Rhydlafar. Testing began earlier this month. The Welsh Office has issued advice to health professional groups which might come into contact with people carrying the virus.

District health authorities are providing facilities, including counselling, for people who wish to be tested for antibodies to the AIDS-associated virus. Testing of these samples is being carried out at the public health laboratories at Ysbyty Glan Clwyd, Bodelwyddan and the University hospital of Wales, Cardiff.

So far, four people have been diagnosed in Wales as having AIDS, of whom three have died. Treatment has been given at district general hospitals.

I shall be representing Welsh interests on the ministerial group recently announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health. Its task will be to ensure co-ordination and co-operation between all Departments concerned with AIDS matters, and the Welsh Office will be playing a full and active part in its deliberations. We are keeping the situation under continual review and will be issuing further advice.

Royal National Eisteddfod

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to grant additional cash to the Royal National Eisteddfod authorities for 1986 and 1987; what cash he has granted for each of the years since 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Grants to the Royal National Eisteddfod of Wales are allocated on an annual basis following discussions between our Department and Eisteddfod officials. We are not in a position to anticipate the likely level of grant for 1986-87 or 1987-88 before such discussions have taken place.

The grants awarded since 1983 are as follows:

1982-83	170,000
1983-84	180,200
1984-85	150,000
1985-86	232,000

Welsh Arts Council

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much cash has been allocated to the Welsh Arts Council in the last financial year; how many staff are currently employed by the Welsh Arts Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

1984-85	7,033,320
1985-86	7,258,450

Staff in post on 1 April 1985 numbered 63.

Private Investment

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to seek to attract private funds for investment in industrial ventures in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have met and continue to meet a wide range of representatives of financial institutions, during which I take every opportunity to impress on them the advantages of investment in Wales. In addition, the Welsh Development Agency attempts to lever a maximum of private sector funds alongside its own investments, and has entered into partnership directly with the private sector through the Welsh venture capital fund.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the annual long-term unemployment rate in Wales for each of the years from 1981 up to the latest quarter, April 1985; what efforts his Department is making to seek to lower the long-term unemployment rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Latest quarterly figures relate to July 1985. Figures for July in each year from 1983 are as follows:

	Per cent.
1983	38·8
1984	41·4
1985	43·0

Figures prior to 6 October 1982 which are registrant based are not comparable. The rates are:

	Per cent.
1981	24·5
1982	35·5

The only effective way to reduce unemployment, including long-term unemployment, is by continuing with the Government's policies to revitalise the economy and promote the basis for sustained growth. In addition, the community programme is specifically designed to help the long-term unemployed and at the end of August over 10,000 people were engaged on community programme projects in Wales. As a result of the planned expansion of the programme this number will more than double by June 1986.

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the latest available estimate of the number of people who are self-employed in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The latest available estimate relates to June 1984, when the figure was 142,00.

Association of Welsh Youth

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much cash has been allocated to the Urdd for each of the last five financial years, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Grants made to Urdd Gobaith Cymru

	Capital £	Revenue £
1981-82	140,000	53,260
1982-83	145,230	55,497
1983-84	80,000	56,496
1984-85	180,000	60,296
1985-86	196,000	62,236

I very much regret the serious position in which the Urdd has been placed as a result of the present industrial action by teachers.

Workers' Education Association

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to meet officials of the Workers' Educational Association in Wales, by how much the Workers' Educational Association budget in Wales is to be cut in the next two financial years, what was the Workers' Educational Association's grant for the current financial year and for 1985-87 in (a) the northern district and (b) the southern district; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have no plans to meet officials of the Workers Educational Association. The association has been notified that its grant from the Welsh Office, before adjustment for inflation, is to be reduced by 3·5 per cent. for the academic year 1985-86 and by four per cent. for 1986-87. No reduction in grant has been notified for 1987-88. Grants of £110,041 for the north Wales district and £159,780 for the south Wales district are being made available in the current year. No decision has been made about the division of grant between the two districts for 1986-87.

Agricultural Produce (Storage)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the location of all the EEC warehouses and private stores used in the storage of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in Wales at the latest available date, and what amount of each product is being stored in each place.

Liquid Skimmed Milk (Subsidies)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in each of the last five years and 1985 to date in Wales, and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Separate figures for Wales are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Agricultural Produce (Storage)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will provide a complete list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in Wales, the amount held and values at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 7,091 applications have been approved in Wales in the period up to 30 September 1985.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Nuclear Electromagnetic Pulse

4. Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will amend his civil defence planning assumptions to take into account the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse on all Government resources including electricity, communications, transport and computers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Some guidance is already available. Further work is in hand and when this is complete the planning assumptions will, if necessary, be extended.

Racial Attacks

12. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what talks he has had with chief constables and community leaders on the prevalence of racist attacks.

Mr. Hurd: I discussed racial attacks with chief officers of police and community leaders at the meeting of my Advisory Council on Race Relations on 1 October. The Association of Chief Police Officers, whose president was present, presented a statement of guiding principles for police action on racial attacks which has now been sent to all chief constables. I very much welcome the police's renewed commitment to tackling this serious issue.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State has had a number of meetings with ethnic minority organisations in recent months at which racial attacks have been discussed, and earlier this year he visited Tower Hamlets to discuss this problem with local organisations and community leaders.

55. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to discuss the number of racial attacks against coloured people with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Racial attacks were discussed at my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's first meeting with the commissioner on 11 September. The commissioner has action against racial attacks as a priority in his force goals for this year. Much police effort is devoted both to preventing such incidents and to apprehending those responsible when attacks occur.

The Home Secretary supports the high priority the commissioner is giving to this problem and his attempts to secure the co-operation of other agencies in tackling its roots.

Repatriation

13. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last issued a circular to local authorities concerning the Government's repatriation scheme under section 29 of the Immigration Act 1971; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Such a circular was issued on 12 June 1984.

Voluntary Services Unit

Mr. Waddington: The unit has 15 staff, including clerical and secretarial support.

Licence Fee Evasion (Detector Vans)

15. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with the number of detector vans used by the Post Office to deter the evasion of the television licence fee.

Mr. Giles: We have now received a report from independent consultants appointed to examine the television licence collection and enforcement procedures employed by the Post Office. We shall be considering the number of detector vans in use, and their cost-effectiveness, in the light of the consultants' recommendations and of the comments of the Public Accounts Committee.

Football Grounds (Safety)

17. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on action he has taken to improve safety at football grounds.

Mr. Hurd: A detailed account was given to the House by my predecessor on 24 July [Vol. 83; c. 1045-1048] of actions taken or about to be taken in response to the findings of the interim report from the committee of inquiry into crowd safety and control at sports grounds. I am arranging for details of further action taken since then to be circulated in the Official Report. We now await the inquiry's final report, which we shall consider carefully when it becomes available.

Following is the information:

Since the detailed account given on 24 July of actions taken or about to be taken in response to the findings of the interim report from the committee of inquiry into crowd safety and control at sports grounds, the Government have written to local authorities, chief officers of police, chief fire officers and the main sporting bodies urging constructive responses to the interim report to achieve improvement in safety. Action has also been set in hand to improve liaison arrangements between authorities and the Health and Safety Executive and consideration is being given to the setting up of a local register of sports grounds.

The Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol etc) Act was passed in July. Three photographic vans — hoolivans — are now available for taking high quality video and still photographs outside grounds and the police have introduced a new system of exchanging information about supporters who have misbehaved or are likely to misbehave. The Football Trust has provided funds for the installation of closed circuit television in the grounds of first and second division clubs in the Football League and the premier division in Scotland. The Football League is introducing a partial supporter membership scheme for division 1 and 2 clubs. The working group chaired by my hon. Friend the Minister of Sport continues to discuss the implementation of particular measures to combat hooliganism and to review any new proposals that come forward.

In August, designation orders came into effect requiring all previously non-designated grounds of football clubs in the 3rd and 4th divisions of the Football League with capacity for more than 10,000 spectators and all grounds of clubs in divisions 1 and 2 of the Rugby League with capacity for more than 10,000 spectators to apply for certification under the provisions of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975.

Business and Industrial Premises (Fires)

18. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fires at business or industrial premises have been reported to him in each of the last three years; and how many deaths or injuries occurred.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of fires attended by local authority fire brigades at business or industrial premises in England and Wales were 19,599 in 1981, 19,779 in 1982, and 19,223 in 1983. The number of deaths resulting from these fires were 29 in 1981, 38 in 1982 and 52 in 1983. The number of non-fatal casualties were 1,085 in 1981, 1,060 in 1982 and 1,124 in 1983.

British Broadcasting Corporation

19. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions during the last six months he has had discussions with the governors of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and what was discussed.

Mr. Hurd: I met the Chairman of the BBC on 30 September, and my predecessor attended a lunch with the Board of Governors on 18 July. On both occasions a wide variety of matters were discussed including the establishment of the committee of inquiry into the financing of the BBC. On 7 August my predecessor also had discussions with the Chairman, Deputy Chairman and Director-General of the BBC about the issues arising from the BBC programme 'Real Lives'.

Police Officers (Injuries)

20. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers retired as a result of occupational injury in 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoners (Transport)

21. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to change the arrangements and manning of the transport of prisoners from prisons to courts in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to do so.

25. Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will conduct a series of regional civil defence exercises based on a scenario of an attack with chemical weapons on ports, airfields and military installations in the United Kingdom.

37. Mr. Stefan Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any research has been carried out on the numbers of civilian casualties which may result from an attack on United Kingdom targets with chemical weapons.

46. Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue instructions on the signals to be used over the existing warning system to indicate a chemical attack.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave earlier today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn).

27. Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will require local authorities to include tuition about the properties of, and protection against, chemical and bacteriological weapons in all civil defence volunteer training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn). The Government do not regard the use of biological weapons in an attack against this country as likely.

40. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will direct local authorities to provide for the protection of the civilian population against the effects of chemical and biological weapons in their emergency planning.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is the duty of local authorities under the 1983 regulations to make plans to protect the population in their area against all forms of hostile attack. When the work on public protection against chemical attack is complete guidance will be issued to local authorities. The Government do not consider an attack using biological weapons is likely.

42. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether civil defence volunteers will receive training in protective measures against chemical/biological weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn). The Government do not regard the use of biological weapons in an attack against this country as likely.

48. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation civil defence committee is doing any work on protective measures for the civilian population against chemical weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Civil Defence Committee is developing guidelines on protection against the effects of chemical weapons.

Immigration

24. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the operation of the immigration rules.

Mr. Waddington: We believe that the operation of the immigration rules, which have themselves been approved by Parliament, properly reflects this Government's commitment to immigration control which is firm but fair.

26. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on changes he has introduced regarding representations by hon. Members on immigration cases.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question earlier today from the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney).

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in view of low staff morale, increasing delays in interview casework and lengthening queues of incoming visitors from abroad, he will increase the resources devoted to the immigration service generally and at Heathrow airport in particular; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many Bangladeshi nationals, applying for visits to the United Kingdom, have been detained prior to a decision being made whether to admit or refuse, for July, August and September, broken down on a monthly basis, compared with the same period in 1984;

(2) how many Bangladeshis have genuinely absconded from temporary admission during the period July to September, compared with the same period in 1984;

(3) how many Bangladeshi visit refusals have resulted in representations from Members of Parliament for July, August and September, broken down on a monthly basis, compared with the same period in 1984;

(5) how many Bangladeshis have married while on temporary admission after claiming to be here for short visits during the period July to September 1985;

(6) how many Bangladeshi nationals were refused entry for visits at Heathrow in July, August and September, broken down on a monthly basis, compared with the same period in 1984;

(7) how many Bengali interpreters were employed by the immigration service at Heathrow for the period July to October;

(8) what is his policy concerning detaining passengers awaiting decisions on applications for entry or results of representations by Members of Parliament in prison accommodation;

(9) if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a large number of visitors were detained on the night of 4 October in the Queens building, Heathrow, Harmondsworth detention centre and Ashford remand centre and, in the case of at least one visitor from Bangladesh, in a cell at the Northside police station.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

hon. Member's secretary by telephone and (b) the approach is made by a lawyer stating that he has the agreement of an hon. Member.

(2) how many visitors left the United Kingdom to a new Commonwealth with Pakistan destination in the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Waddington: During the 12 months ending May 1985, citizens of new Commonwealth countries or ofPakistan were admitted as visitors, including business visitors, on 684,000 occasions. This figure is based on information submitted by passengers on landing cards at immigration control. Corresponding information on departures from the United Kingdom is not available.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used for computer recording visitors from the new Commonwealth with Pakistan.

Mr. Waddington: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) on 24 July, column 620. The same criteria are applied to visitors from other countries as to those from the new Commonwealth and Pakistan.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of computer recorded visitors from the new Commonwealth with Pakistan do not leave within the period allocated for the visit.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that the available information does not permit a reliable estimate to be made of this proportion.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now grant exemption from the primary purpose rule to the husbands of women settled in the United Kingdom before 1973, equivalent to that given to the wives of men settled in the United Kingdom before 1973.

Mr. Waddington: No.

Emergency Planning Staff

28. Mr. Fox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce 100 per cent. grant aid outside the rate support grant for the salaries of local authority emergency planning staff.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The items eligible for 100 per cent. grant aid were extended by the 1983 regulations to communications equipment and training, travelling and volunteers' expenses. We are assessing the effects of this and the implications of a further extension. My right hon. Friend will keep the House informed of progress.

Extradition Law

29. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be in a position to propose changes in extradition law.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary hopes to do so very shortly.

33. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the sentencing powers available to magistrates.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has under consideration several possibilities for specific changes in magistrates' sentencing powers, but has no plans for a general review.

Civil Defence Volunteers

34. Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local authorities do not have any civil defence volunteers in training other than scientific advisers and VAS.

35. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will enumerate all the representations he has so far received in respect of the recommendations of the Auld report on shop hours, detailing those in favour and those opposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Since the publication of the Auld report we have received 26 letters in favour of the committee's recommendations and 3,762 letters opposed. We do not consider that this at all reflects the considerable strength of feeling in the country at large that the restrictions on retail trading hours should be abolished.

Shop Thefts

36. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of shop thefts reported in England for the first six months of 1984 and 1985, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Civil Defence (Symbol)

44. Mr. Martin Stevens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will advise local authorities to adopt the equilateral blue triangle on an orange background as the identifying symbol for civil defence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Adoption of this symbol is one of the requirements of the protocols added in 1977 to the 1949 Geneva convention. Although these have not yet been ratified by Her Majesty's Government the Home Secretary agreed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that the Government should nevertheless adopt the symbol. Appropriate guidance will be issued accordingly.

Civil Defence Plans

45. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with progress in developing civil defence plans.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is satisfied that good progress is being made. Local authorities have been asked to complete the plans required by the 1983 regulations by the end of this year, and we shall then review the position.

Animals (Experiments)

47. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to further reduce the number of animals used in experiments.

Mr. Mellor: We intend to introduce as soon as parliamentary time permits legislation to provide for stricter controls on scientific procedures on living animals, with the declared object of ensuring that the number of animals used and the severity of procedures are kept to the absolute minimum necessary. Details of the Government's proposals were published in the two White Papers "Scientific Procedures on Living Animals", Cmnd. 8883 and Cmnd. 9521. In addition we shall continue to encourage the development of alternatives to the use of live animals in scientific research; and to play an active role in the exploration of possible changes in international regulatory requirements which would further reduce the experimental use of live animals.

Teenage Crime

49. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to curb teenage crime.

Mr. Mellor: It is the Home Secretary's aim to ensure that the police and the courts have adequate powers for dealing with crime, including crime committed by young people. The local crime prevention initiatives supported by the Home Office, and the inclusion of crime prevention projects in the Manpower Services Commission's expanded community programme — both of which my right hon. Friend has recently announced — will be particularly relevant to crimes which tend to be committed by the young.

Licensing Laws

50. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further representations he has received concerning reform of the licensing laws.

Mr. Mellor: Since 4 July, we have received 20 letters from hon. Members on behalf of constituents, four letters from organisations and 39 letters from members of the public about permitted opening hours for on-licensed premises. Of the 63, 44 supported relaxations in the law and 19 were opposed.

Civil Emergencies (Provision)

51. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has had on provision for civil emergencies.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend has received representations on the implementation of the Government's manifesto commitment to amend the Civil Defence Act 1948 to allow civil defence resources to be used in peacetime emergencies. We remain firmly committed to this, and to an all hazards approach to emergency planning, and we continue to look for an early opportunity to promote suitable amending legislation.

Juvenile Offenders (Yorkshire)

52. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what effect the changes in prison structure in Yorkshire will have on the housing of juvenile offenders.

Mr. Mellor: The juveniles who would previously have been held in HM remand centre, Thorp Arch will in future be held in the discrete post-war wing of HM prison, Hull.

Local Government Reform

53. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase funds available to voluntary service units following the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Waddington: There are no plans to provide Home Office funding in direct substitution for any grants currently made by the Greater London council or the metropolitan counties. Voluntary bodies in receipt of such grants will be eligible for funding by the authorities which will remain. The Department of the Environment has agreed to pay grants under the Local Government Grants (Social Needs) Act 1969 for a transitional four-year period after abolition on £20 millon worth of expenditure by borough or district councils on local projects previously supported by the GLC or a metropolitan county.

European Court of Human Rights

54. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the renewal in January 1986 of the right of United Kingdom individuals to pursue claims to the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Hurd: The Government have decided to renew, for a period of five years from January 1986, their acceptance of the right of individual petition to the European Commission of Human Rights and the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights.

Licensing Laws (Reform)

56. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on reform of the licensing laws in England and Wales following completion of the investigation by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys into drinking habits in Scotland.

Mr. Mellor: None. The full results of the survey carried out by the OPCS into extended drinking hours in Scotland have not yet been published.

Cable Television

57. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress being made in the development of the cable television industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The operators of the interim cable franchises awarded in November 1983 have faced a number of difficulties associated with developing a new industry. The Government have, however, been pleased to note the substantial progress made this autumn as five more of the systems become operational, making seven of the eleven who have reached this stage. This will be important in enlarging the market for cable programme services, in terms of both the size of the potential audience and the capacity for more channels. As a result, a number of new programme channels have already been created and wider experience is being developed of the new generation of cable systems which will help investment decisions in relation to future systems. The Cable Authority has embarked on a franchising programme designed to encourage the installation of more systems as quickly as possible; it awarded its first five franchises in August and is now considering applications for another five.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology has recently announced that his Department will be making £5 million support available over the next five years to promote the increased use of advanced interactive services over wideband cable systems. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary shares his hope that this will provide a significant boost to this important sector of the cable industry.

Sri Lankan Citizens

58. Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will explain the basis upon which he has imposed a requirement upon Sri Lankan citizens resident in the United Kingdom to obtain re-entry visas before travelling abroad for any period of time; an if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: It is a normal consequence of existing visa requirements that they should apply to all nationals of the country concerned, including those resident here. In Sri Lanka's case an exception was made in respect of Sri Lankan citizens settled in the United Kingdom on 1 January 1973 who qualify for readmission as returning residents, since paragraph 77*(a)* of the immigration rules requires Commonwealth citizens to be admitted in these circumstances unless they are subject to a deportation order.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department has had any discussions with the chief constable of the Merseyside police concerning policing in the inner city areas of Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are in regular contact with chief officers of police, including the chief constable of Merseyside, in connection with matters relating to the policing of their areas.

Prisoners (Accommodation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the location in London in which prisoners have been detained in police cells in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The Metropolitan police support headquarters at Lambeth, the Highbury Corner, Camberwell Green and Horseferry Road and South Western magistrates' courts and, occasionally, a number of police stations.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of (a) men, (b) women and (c) juveniles in police cells at the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: On 17-18 October there was one male adult and six male young offenders aged 17 to 21 held in police cells.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the longest period of time a prisoner has been detained in police cells in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: Twenty-nine nights.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men, (b) women and (c) juveniles in custody in police cells on each day in 1985 by location.

Mr. Mellor: Between 1 April and 18 October the available information is as follows: figures are not separately recorded for juveniles but I am not aware that there were any such cases.

British Prisoners (Repatriation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of British prisoners held in custody abroad who have been repatriated to Britain.

Mr. Mellor: None as yet.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has refused any request of a British citizen serving a sentence abroad to be repatriated to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Re-entry Visas

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the amount of revenue received from fees for re-entry visas imposed on Sri Lankan residents in the United Kingdom from 30 May to the latest available date.

Mr. Waddington: Receipts from fees in respect of re-entry visas issued to Sri Lankan citizens in the United Kingdom during the period from 30 May 1985 to 30 September 1985 inclusive amounted to about £35,000.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a list, by country, of foreign nationals resident in the United Kingdom who require re-entry visas before travelling overseas.

Mr. Waddington: The foreign nationals who are subject to a visa requirement are specified in the immigration rules (and set out below). Any such national who is resident here requires a visa to re-enter but he may apply for a re-entry visa before travelling if that is more convenient than applying for a visa while abroad. So may a Sri Lankan citizen who will, except in certain specified circumstances, require a visa to re-enter the country.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information is given in the following table; the information for prisoners received after 30 June is not yet complete.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convicted and remand prisoners at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, are sharing the same facilities.

Mr. Mellor: Other than prisoners who are category A, held under prison rule 43, or accommodated in the hospital, convicted and remand prisoners at Birmingham prison are, so far as is possible, kept separate at all times.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, are being given education packs for use in their cells;

(2) what use is made of educational facilities by prisoners at Winson Green prison, Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 14 October 1985, 51 inmates were supplied with open learning packs and a further 30 with other forms of cell study; 21 inmates attended daytime classes; and an average of 59 inmates attended on each of the three evenings on which evening classes were held. In addition the prison library was open each day for inmates' use.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, are locked in cells for 23 hours per day in an average week.

Mr. Mellor: Other than prisoners under punishment, the number of whom varies, the number of prisoners in Birmingham prison who are locked in their cells for 23 hours a day in an average week is about 10 category A prisoners and about 30 prisoners held under prison rule 43.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how long each week the workshops at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, are in operation; and what percentage of prisoners are able to use them.

Mr. Mellor: In the 1984-85 year the industrial workshops were open 17 hours a week on average, employing about 10 per cent. of the inmate population. In the most recent period for which figures are available, the five weeks ended 30 September 1985, the industrial workshops were open on average for 8·6 hours a week employing some eight per cent. of the average daily inmate population of 1,029. Prison Department is examining ways in which the problems which have led to the recent reduction in working hours can be overcome.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the current frequency of cell searches at Winson Green prison, Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have served prison sentences of less than one week at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, since 31 May.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, about 15 persons were initially received into Birminghamn prison in the period 1 June to 31 August 1985 to serve sentences of less than one week.

Disabled People

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations his Department has received from organisations representing disabled people concerning the draft Cinemas (Safety) Regulations 1985.

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations his Department has received from organisations representing disabled people concerning the draft Cinemas (Safety) Regulations 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department has received 36 representations from organisations and individuals about the matters contained in the proposed guidance to the draft Cinemas (Safety) Regulations 1985.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of representations received from organisations representing people who are disabled, he will amend the draft Cinemas (Safety) Regulations 1985.

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of representations received from organisations representing people who are disabled, he will amend the draft Cinemas (Safety) Regulations 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The draft regulations are the same as the existing regulations, insofar as they affect disabled persons. We shall be taking account of the comments of interested bodies on the draft guidance associated with the regulations before issuing it in final form.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on access to places of entertainment for people who are disabled.

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on access to places of entertainment for people who are disabled.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Our policy for those licensed places of public entertainment for which my right hon. Friend is responsible is to encourage licensing authorities and management to provide the greatest possible access for disabled people consistent with the safety of all members of the public using such places.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report progress on inititives taken for the prevention of drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: The measures we have taken are now being reflected in increases in the seizures of drugs and the number of drug traffickers prosecuted, in the current prevention campaigns and in the development of local schemes for the treatment of drug misusers. In addition, we have announced a series of new measures including more financial support towards programmes for reducing the production of drugs abroad; the appointment next year of 150 more preventive customs officers; more resources for the police at national and regional levels; and legislation to allow for the tracing, freezing and confiscation of the proceeds of drug traficking.

Pakistan (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent visit of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) to Pakistan to review the drug market in that country and the lessons learnt.

Mr. Mellor: I visited Pakistan from 12 to 20 October. I had a series of meetings in Islamabad, Karachi and Peshawar with the President, Provincial Governors, Government Ministers, representatives of a number of law enforcement and development agencies and other individuals concerned with drug misuse. The visit was most valuable in strengthening cooperation between the United Kingdom and Pakistan and in encouraging the Pakistan authorities in their efforts to combat drug trafficking. The commitment of both governments to further action is set out in a document signed in Islamabad, the text of which is reproduced below. We are most grateful to the Pakistan authorities for the cooperation in arranging this important and successful visit.

Memorandum of understanding between the Government of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland on control of narcotics

I. The misuse of drugs is one of the most serious problems faced by the international community. The Governments of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland declare their total opposition to all forms of unlawful production and trafficking in narcotics. The two Governments jointly declared their determination to do everything in their power to tackle the problem and to bring such unlawful production and trafficking to an end. With this aim they will engage in full and close cooperation to tackle the problem jointly.

II. The Government of the United Kingdom welcome the measures taken by the Government of Pakistan to suppress the unlawful cultivation, production, distribution and use of drugs and to prevent the unlawful transit of drugs into international markets. They note with satisfaction the determination of the Government of Pakistan to maximise the effectiveness of prosecution and sentencing practices.

III. The Government of Pakistan welcome the contributions which the Government of the United Kingdom have made to the effective cooperation which has developed between them. They note with satisfaction that these measures have included a contribution to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC) opium poppy eradication and rural development project in the Dir region, the provision through UNFDAC of Landrovers for enforcement work in the field and the provision of training courses for Pakistan Customs officers in the United Kingdom.

IV. The two Governments declare their intention to strengthen cooperative measures in this field. With this in mind the Government of the United Kingdom will build upon the assistance already provided to the Government of Pakistan in the following ways:

A. They will increase their contribution, via UNFDAC, to the combined crop substitution, rural development and enforcement project designed to eradicate opium poppy cultivation in the Dir District of the North West Frontier Province;

B. They will provide to the Government of Pakistan technical equipment for the detection of drugs smuggled in the mails;

C. They will continue to provide training, in the areas to be jointly decided between the two Governments, of Customs officers engaged in the fight against drug trafficking;

D. They will continue to assist the Government of Pakistan to breed and train drug detecting dogs;

E. They will con the Government of Pakistan any further measures of assistance which may be identified;

F. They will consider, with the Government of Pakistan, how operational liaison between the two countries can be further improved.

V. For their part, the Government of Pakistan reaffirm their determination to take effective measures to combat the drugs problem. With this in mind, they will ensure the effective and expeditious investigation, arrest and prosecution of persons who violate their laws on the cultivation, production, trading or use of drugs. The Government of Pakistan welcome the measures taken by the Government of the United Kingdom to strengthen their existing cooperation and to fight the threat posed to both countries by this major social evil.

VI. The two Governments declare their intention to lend support to proposals for a new United Nations Convention against drug trafficking. Such a Convention should, in their view, include provision to enable all states to prosecute drug traffickers for offences wherever committed or to extradite them.

VII. The foregoing record represents the understandings reached by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan upon the matters referred to therein.

Signed in duplicate at Islamabad on 19 October 1985.

David Mellor,
For the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Shah Mohammad Khoro
For the Government of Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

Police

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police authorities have requested an increase in their establishment levels; and if he will detail them and the exact numbers requested.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following eight police authorities in England and Wales have applied for increases totalling 112 posts in their police establishments for the current financial year 1985-86 or later. My right hon. Friend will shortly be considering these applications in the light of advice from Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary.

Police authority/force	Number of posts applied for
City of London	6
Cumbria	14
Hertfordshire	33*
Northamptonshire	23†
North Yorkshire	1
Staffordshire	2
Warwickshire	29‡
Wiltshire	4

* For October 1986.
† For 1986-87.
‡ For 1986.

In addition, as my right hon. Friend indicated to the House on 21 October [c. 31], he has set urgent work in hand to assess where there are specific needs for increases in the Metropolitan police establishment.

Birmingham (Riot Damage Claims)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many claims have been made under the Riot Damages Act 1886 in respect of the riots in Birmingham on 9 and 10 September; when he expects the first payments to be made; and what will be the proportion of payments met from his Department's Votes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The compensation authority under the Riot (Damages) Act 1886 for the west midlands police area is the county council, which is responsible for receiving and considering claims arising from the Handsworth riot and for paying compensation. Such payments do not attract any form of Home Office grant but the county council has asked my right hon. Friend to make a contribution from central funds to the cost arising from the riot which may fall on the council and he is considering this request.

Dog Fighting (Prohibition)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to seek to amend section 1(1)(c) of the Protection of Animals Act 1911 to prohibit dog fighting.

Mr. Meller: The promotion of dog fighting is already prohibited in section 1(1)(c) of the Act.

Peacock Committee (Report)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the proposed timetable for the Peacock committee to report to him.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is expected that the committee will report by July 1986.

Community Radio

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations were received from Northern Ireland regarding the granting of licences for community radio stations;

(2) what considerations influenced his decision not to include Northern Ireland as one of the potential areas for applications for community radio and to refuse a licence in respect of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In considering the locations for the 21 experimental community radio stations, my right hon. Friend took account of a range of factors, including the availability of frequencies, and the local radio services already in existence. He also had regard to the substantial number of groups expressing an interest in setting up community radio stations. Six representations were received from Northern Ireland before the announcement of the experimental locations; three have been received since then.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the application from Mr. W. J. Ryan, 26 Tern Crescent, Carrickfergus BT38 7RY, on behalf of a group of constituents of the right hon. Member for Antrim, East for a licence to operate a community radio station was considered by the community radio advisory panel.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. As explained in the reply given to a question from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on 25 July at columns 670-71, it will not be possible during the experimental phase to consider applications from community radio stations in locations other than those specified.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dental Estimates Board

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the numbers of estimates scheduled for payment by the Dental Estimates Board in each of the months April to September inclusive; and what were the corresponding figures for the years 1981 to 1984 inclusive.

Mr. Hayhoe: The following table shows the number of estimates scheduled by the Dental Estimates Board for payment to dentists in England in the periods requested. All figures are in thousands.

Month	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
April	2,464	2,630	2,505	2,367	2,386
May	2,432	2,522	2,567	2,569	2,666
June	2,460	2,562	2,596	2,755	2,549
July	2,477	2,436	2,566	2,689	2,716
August	2,122	2,416	2,472	2,445	2,841
September	2,298	2,391	2,482	2,509	2,568
Total	14,251	14,956	15,187	15,334	15,726

Dental Costs

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average fee for oral surgical procedures under item 12 of the NHS (General Dental Service) fee scale, as authorised by the Dental Estimates Board under the October 1984 fee scale.

Mr. Hayhoe: Available information relates only to those courses of treatment completed between October 1984 and March 1985. During that period the average fee in England and Wales was £17·60.

Contraceptives (Children)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to amend guidelines on the prescription of contraceptives for under age children following the House of Lords ruling in the Gillick case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make a statement on his Department's policy on the prescribing of contraceptives to girls under 16 years of age.

Mr. Hayhoe: The House of Lords has decided by three to two that our Department's guidance on contraceptive services for young people under 16 is lawful, and it has now been reinstated. It will be fully reviewed, taking into account the detail of the House of Lords' judgment and the wide range of views expressed on this issue.

The Department's guidance states that special care is needed not to undermine parental responsibility and family stability and stresses the importance of involving parents in decisions about contraception for young people under 16, and the House of Lords' judgment made it clear that it should be exceptional for a doctor to prescribe contraception for a young person under 16 without the knowledge and control of a parent.

Radiation (Medical Aspects Committee)

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, further to the reply given by his right hon. Friend on 25 July, Official Report, column 771, he is now in a position to give details of the chairman and members of the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government's Chief Medical Officer has appointed Professor Martin Bobrow as chairman of the committee. He is the Prince Philip Professor of Paediatric Research at Guys hospital medical school.

The 17 members are:

Professor Eva Alberman — Department of Clinical Epidemiology, The London Hospital Medical College.

Dr. Valerie Beral — Epidemiological Monitoring Unit, London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine.

Professor R. J. Berry — Department of Oncology, The Middlesex Hospital Medical School.

Professor K. M. Clayton — School of Environmental Sciences, University of East Anglia.

Professor A. D. Dayan — Professor of Toxicology and Director DHSS Department of Toxicology, St. Bartholomew's Hospital Medical College.

Dr. G. J. Draper — Childhood Cancer Research Group, Department of Paediatrics.

Professor H. J. Evans — MRC Clinical and Population Cytogenetics Unit, Western General Hospital, Edinburgh.

Professor M. J. Gardner—Professor of Medical Statistics, MRC Environmental Epidemiology Unit, University of Southampton.

Dr. D. T. Goodhead—MRC Radiobiology Unit, Harwell.

Professor D. G. Harnden—Director, Paterson Laboratories, Christie Hospital and Holt Radium Institute, Manchester.

Professor W. Jarrett—The Veterinary School, University of Glasgow.

Professor E. G. Knox—Health Services Research Centre, Department of Social Medicine, The Medical School, University of Birmingham.

Dr. Jillian R. Mann — Consultant Paediatric Oncologist, The Childrens Hospital, Ladywood, Birmingham.

Professor J. S. Orr — Professor and Director of Medical Physics, Royal Postgraduate Medical School, University of London.

Professor J. Peto — Cancer Research Campaign Chair of Epidemiology, Institute of Cancer Research, Royal Cancer Hospital, Sutton.

Dr. T. E. Wheldon — Glasgow Institute of Radiotherapeutics and Oncology, Belvidere Hospital, Glasgow.

Professor D. R. Williams — Department of Applied Chemistry, University of Wales Institute of Science and Technology.

The chairman and members have been appointed to serve until April 1989. The committee will hold its first meeting in November.

Pound Lodge Resettlement Unit

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that the Pound Lodge resettlement unit in Willesden remains open and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 5 February at c. 548-49. The future of Pound Lodge resettlement unit and the six other London resettlement units will be reviewed when the replacement scheme for the Camberwell unit is further advanced, and no action will be taken until then.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when health authorities completed their administrative reviews of hospital waiting lists; what is the average estimated reduction which will result from this review, and when the first half yearly figures published by his Department will reflect the effects of the review.

Mr. Whitney: The effective validation of waiting lists is a difficult management task calling for a sensitive approach to many patients, following consultation with and the full co-operation of the medical profession at local level. Many health authorities were unable to complete the exercise to an adequate standard by the original deadline of 30 March 1985. They were, therefore, asked to ensure that this was done by 30 September 1985 and to prepare plans for the regular validation of waiting lists in future. The extent of changes due to validation depends upon previous local arrangements for maintaining lists and upon how particular authorities chose to carry through the exercise, and cannot be identified separately from changes that would have occurred in any case. It is not possible, therefore, to estimate reliably the effects nationally. The effect of the full exercise will be reflected in the figures for waiting lists at 30 September 1985 which will be published in the spring of 1986.

Housing (Single Payments)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what circumstances single payments are being refused to single persons or married couples who take on the lease of a council house.

Mr. Major: It is assumed that the question refers to claims for single payments of supplementary benefit for essential furniture and household equipment. Such claims may be refused for a number of reasons: for example, there is no entitlement to supplementary benefit; there is no need for the item(s) claimed; the claimant's capital in excess of £500 is sufficient to meet the cost of the item(s); the claimant has not been in receipt of benefit for a continuous period of six months or, where he has, there is suitable, alternative furnished accommodation available in the area.

Debt Collection Agencies

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what circumstances his Department makes arrangements with debt-collection agencies for direct debit of outstanding debts; how many claimants are now covered by this procedure; whether money-lending agencies can benefit from this procedure; what check is made of the debt-collection agencies who benefit; and whether any charge is made on the debt-collection agencies for the service provided.

Mr. Major: The Department does not under any circumstances make arrangements for money to be deducted from any claimant's benefit for payment direct to a debt collection agency or a money lending agency.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for each month since January 1985, the total value of supplementary benefit payments made to persons of no fixed abode in (a) each of the local Department of Health and Social Security offices located in the inner London area, covered by the Inner London Education Authority, (b) the London north region and (c) the London south region.

Mr. Major: The Department's local offices do not keep separate statistics on payments made to persons of no fixed abode. The information is therefore not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Public Health Laboratory Service

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of the public health laboratory service.

Mr. Hayhoe: A review of the public health laboratory service (PHLS) was undertaken by our Department as part of its normal accountability responsibilities towards non-departmental public bodies. The report's main proposal, that management responsibility for the 52 peripheral laboratories should transfer to the National Health Service, has been the subject of wide consultation. It was right to question the managerial and financial relationships between the peripheral laboratories and the district health authorities they serve, and our Department will continue to discuss these issues with the PHLS board. However, we have given careful consideration to the responses to consultation and to the board's own views. Guiding this consideration was the need to ensure that any change would be beneficial and not prejudice the service's contribution to public health and control of infectious disease. It was decided that management responsibilty should not be transferred and an announcement was made to that effect on 27 September.

The report made a number of other recommendations which were both useful and acceptable and which are being implemented by the board.

Social Services Review

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will publish his review of social services.

Mr. Whitney: No date has yet been fixed.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he now has any proposals to extend the categories of medicines covered by the limited list.

Mr. Hayhoe: No.

Low-Income Families (Maternity Grant)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special arrangements he has in mind for low-income families in the light of the proposals to limit the maternity grant to £75, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We are considering the comments that have been made on the Green Paper's proposals on maternity payments and will announce our final conclusions in the forthcoming White Paper.

Social Fund (Community Care Needs)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how he envisages that the scope of the proposed social fund in meeting community care needs will be widened in the longer term and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" indicates our longer term aim of promoting a more satisfactory mix of cash and services. I outlined some possibilities for future development in my speech to the joint social services annual conference on 27 September. I am placing a copy of the press release that was issued on that occasion in the Library.

Immigration Statistics

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his current estimate of those of new Commonwealth with Pakistan ethnic origin currently (a) with United Kingdom citizenship and (b) resident in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Whitney: Results from the 1983 labour force survey indicate that of some 2,300,000 persons usually resident in Great Britain who stated that their ethnic origin was other than white, some 1,600,000 were British nationals.

Persons born in NCWP countries, and their United Kingdom-born descendants, form the vast majority among those who stated that their ethnic origin was other than white.

Oral Mucolytics

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the recommendations of the advisory committee on National Health Service drugs in its review of oral mucolytics.

Mr. Hayhoe: The advisory committee on NHS drugs completed its review of oral mucolytics at its meeting on 23 October. The advice of the committee was that, whilst oral mucolytics are of no proven therapeutic value in the treatment of chest conditions or "glue ear", an oral mucolytic agent could be a useful adjunct in the management of the very small number of children with a tracheostomy. The committee has made an additional recommendation to cover those patients with abdominal complications associated with cystic fibrosis and this will require consideration by the licensing authority. I have accepted the committee's advice and will be laying regulations in due course.

SCOTLAND

Aerial Deposition, Bonnybridge

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which experts in meteorology, cartography and geography his officials have consulted to establish the likely areas of aerial deposition, under varying local meteorological and micro-climatic conditions, of substances suspended or dissolved in smoke plumes from tall chimneys in the area within a radius of five miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire; and what steps he has taken to test theoretical models against recorded phenomena in the area.

Mr. Ancram: Warren Spring laboratory of the Department of Trade and Industry has, at the instance of my Department, studied atmospheric dispersion in central Scotland. The work, which was carried out over a four-year period, included mathematical modelling of dispersion in the atmosphere, and comparison of values of smoke and sulphur dioxide concentrations predicted by the model with measured values. The work which is relevent to pollutants other than smoke and sulphur dioxide has been reported: Warren Spring laboratory LR279(AP) "The Measurement, Assessment and Prediction of Air Pollution in the Forth Valley of Scotland — Final Report", published in 1978.

Environmental Pollution

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has, in view of the refusal of certain insurance companies to insure farmers in parts of central Scotland against livestock losses caused by environmental pollution, for the compensation at the public expense of farmers who have suffered financial loss because of atmospheric and other environmental pollution.

Mr. John MacKay: We have no such proposals.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which scientific experts he and his officials have consulted, on the basis of best knowledge worldwide, to ascertain the likely effects on human and animal health of the aerial deposition on inhabited areas and on farmland of quantities of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls; and if he will publish a bibliography of the references consulted by his officials when investigating this problem.

Mr. John MacKay: The independent review group chaired by Professor Lenihan undertook an expert and detailed examination of the Bonnybridge-Denny area with these concerns in mind. The group's report was published in February 1985. Analytical results have been sent to expert committees for toxicological assessment.

Cancer (Falkirk)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the cancer figures in the Falkirk area for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: I wrote to the hon. Member on 27 June 1985 providing information about the incidence of cancer in the postal code areas FK5, FK6 and FK7 for the years 1982 and 1983. The 1984 figures are not yet available. I would repeat the assurance given in that letter that the available figures give no cause for alarm, but will continue to be carefully watched.

Human and Animal Health

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland in view of his statement of 30 April 1984, in a letter to the Society for the Control of Toxic and Troublesome Industrial Emissions, that there was an absence of fully informed toxicological advice on the results of the various reports on human and animal health problems in central Scotland, whether he will publish, in detail and also in a form accessible and intelligible to the non-scientific public, the evidence to be made available to him by the Department of Health and Social Security's independent committees, comprising experts in the field of toxicology and related disciplines, on the toxicological significance of the data on human and animal health in central Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: These committees exist principally to provide advice to Departments. When they have completed their work the Government will examine this advice and consider what further action is required, bearing in mind public concern for well-presented information on this subject.

Farm Animals (Analysis)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take to ensure that random samples of fat from beef on sale to the public in central Scotland are analysed for traces of chlorinated halogens, dioxins and furans, in parts per trillion; and whether he will publish the results of such analyses in detail and also in a form accessible and intelligible to the non-scientific general public.

Mr. John MacKay: The question of the need for analytical surveys of organic compounds which might pose a hazard to health has been referred to the working party on organic environmental contaminants in food. Such compounds would include halogenated compounds, dioxins and furans. Once I have received the working party's advice I shall consider the need for further action.

Human Morbidity Data

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will arrange for a fresh analysis of the human morbidity data seen by the Lenihan Review Group, together with more recent data not seen by that group, on the basis of the place of residence (and therefore exposure) of patients rather than their place of treatment.

Mr. John MacKay: The information on human morbidity provided to the independent review group chaired by Professor Lenihan was prepared on the basis of place of residence of patients and not place of treatment. My right hon. Friend has no plans to undertake fresh analyses of this information.

Neo-natal Statistics (Stirling and Falkirk)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish statistics showing the number of miscarriages and terminations of pregnancies in the Stirling and Falkirk areas for the years 1982 to 1984, inclusive, analysed by mothers' place of residence, and a comparison with the numbers for previous years and an indication of the reasons for any variation from the expected normal annual number of such cases.

Mr. John MacKay: Information for Forth Valley health board's area in 1982-84 is as follows:

Year	Miscarriages	Terminations
1982	361	387
1983	320	392
1984	*	433

* Not yet available.

Details of terminations for other years may be obtained from the annual publication "Scottish Health Statistics" published by HMSO. Any information about numbers of miscarriages in previous years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Figures for terminations in the board's area in 1982-84 are generally in line with the national trend. Comparable information about miscarriages is not available.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish statistics, analysed by categories of medical defects and by place of residence of the mother, for the number of malformed and stillborn births in the Falkirk and Stirling areas for 1974 to 1984, inclusive, together with a comparison with the numbers for previous years and an indication of the reasons for any variation from the expected normal annual number of such cases.

Mr. John MacKay: Information about stillbirths in Forth Valley health board's area is as follows:

	Total still births	Still births with congenital anomalies
1974	49	17
1975	41	14
1976	33	12
1977	19	10
1978	19	5
1979	26	4
1980	22	2
1981	26	2
1982	23	5

Details of categories of medical defects and by place of residence of the mother are not available. Comparable figures for years prior to 1974 cannot be provided on the same geographical basis.

Any information about the number of malformed live births in the area could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Hodgkins Disease (Bonnybridge)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what investigations he has made of the incidence of Hodgkins's disease in the area within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, for the period 1964 to 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The information sought is not available in the form in which it has been requested. Information with regard to the incidence of Hodgkin's disease in postcode ares FK4, FK5 and FK6, and for Falkirk local government district, was set out in my letter of 27 June to the hon. Member.

Polychlorinated Biphenyls

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish detailed records of the import through Scottish airports and seaports, for the period 1982 to 1984 inclusive, of transformers, capacitors and other equipment containing polychlorinated biphenyls and destined for disposal in Scotland by incineration or dumping.

Mr. John MacKay: Importations into the United Kingdom are classified by reference to the Customs and Excise tariff. This has many separate headings for transformers, capacitors and similar electronic or electrical components. None of the headings however make specific reference to components containing polychlorinated biphenyls. Accordingly it is not possible to supply the information sought.

Soil Analysis

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all those institutions in Scotland known to him which are both competent and properly equipped to analyse samples of soil, vegetation and animal tissue for the presence in parts per trillion, of polychlorinated biphenyls, polychlorinated terphenyls, polybrominated byphenyls, dioxins and furans.

Mr. Ancram: Records are not held centrally of laboratories equipped to undertake the analyses in question. Strathclyde regional chemist is know to undertake analyses for polychlorinated biphenyls, PCTs, PBBs, dioxins and furans. Other laboratories in Scotland may well be capable of carrying out those analyses but they have not, to my knowledge, been active in the field.

Reye's Syndrome

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the incidence of Reye's syndrome per head of population for the last 10 years in the postal code districts FK4, FK5 and FK6 of Central Region; and how these figures compare with those for the rest of Scotland and for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. John MacKay: There has been one case of Reye's syndrome reported to the Reye's syndrome surveillance scheme in the postcode districts FK4, FK5 and FK6, of Central Region since surveillance began on 1 August 1981. This case was in the period 1 August 1984 to 31 July 1985. Below are given figures from the surveillance scheme for the United Kingdom including Scotland, Northern Ireland, and the Republic of Ireland.

	United Kingdom	Scotland
1981-82	30	1
1982-83	52	5
1983-84	79	4
1984-85	*52	*4

* Provisional.

The rate for Scotland in 1983-84 was 0·36 per 100,000 children under 16 years of age compared to 0·7 per 100,000 children under 16 years of age in the United Kingdom as a whole.

Milk

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the maximum allowable content of polychlorinated biphenyls, polychlorinated dibenzodioxins (especially 2,3,7,-8TCDD), and polychlorinated dibenzofurans in milk for human consumption; and what are the limits of detection for these various compounds.

Mr. John MacKay: There are no statutory levels laid down in respect of these substances. The limits of detection possible with equipment currently in use in this country, for these classes of compounds are as follows:

Compound	Limits of Detection
Polychlorinated Biphenyls	0·05 microgrammes per gramme
Polychlorinated Dibenzodioxins (including 2,3,7,8,-D TCD)	0·02 nanogrammes per gramme
Polychlorinated Dibenzofurans	0·02 nanogrammes per gramme

Waste Incinerators

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those agencies engaged in analysis of dioxin content of the flue gases from domestic refuse incinerators involved in test burns and the isomers for which samples were analysed.

Mr. Ancram: Agencies engaged in analysis of dioxin content of the flue gases from domestic refuse incinerators involved in test burns are Warren Spring laboratory, the laboratory of the Government Chemist and Harwell laboratory. The isomers for which samples have been analysed are:

2, 3, 7, 8-tetrachloro dibenzodioxin total tetrachloro dibenzodioxins octachlorinated dibenzodioxin tetra-chlorinated dibenzofurans

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish, for the years 1982 to 1984, inclusive, the total number of unexplained deaths or deaths in unusual circumstances of cattle, sheep, horses, farm cats and dogs within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire; and what research he is conducting into the possibility that such deaths were caused by poisoning.

Mr. John MacKay: During the three years a total of 511 reports were made to the State Veterinary Service about sudden unexplained deaths in Central Region amongst cattle, sheep and horses. As it customary with these cases, tests were carried out to eliminate anthrax. Unless suspected, tests for poisoning are not conducted.

Reports on farm cats and dogs are not notified to the State Veterinary Service.

Chapelcross Nuclear Power Station

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had regarding the application by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd to provide additional water supplies for Chapelcross nuclear power station; how much (a) plutonium and (b) tritir j 6-7um have been generated and manufactured at Chapelcross; and what proportion of these have been acquired by Government Departments.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am not aware of any proposal to increase water supplies to the Chapelcross station.

The hon. Member will be aware that the nuclear reactors at Chapelcross are available to meet defence requirements for nuclear materials. It would not, therefore, be in the national interest to reveal details of their production.

Farming Industry (Bad Weather Aid)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the value and the method of distribution in Scotland of the aid which has been announced for sectors of the farming industry which have been affected by bad weather.

Mr. John MacKay: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Stock Rearing Farmers

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he proposes to assist those stock rearing farmers who do not qualify for hill livestock compensation allowances.

Mr. John MacKay: The Government are pledged to provide help where it is most needed. Details of the assistance to be provided will be announced as soon as possible.

Hill Livestock Compensation Allowances

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will increase the amount and ensure prompt payment of hill livestock compensation allowances in the light of this season's harvest outturn.

Mr. John MacKay: This year's annual review of farming in the hills and uplands is in progress. Rates of HLCA will be determined in the light of the review, which will take all relevent factors into account. The allowances will be paid as speedily as circumstances allow.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what volume of (a) high-level radioactive waste, (b) intermediate-level radioactive waste and (c) low-level solid waste would be expected to be generated annually if the proposed European fast reactor demonstration reprocessing plant becomes operational.

Mr. Ancram: In their document, "Supplementary information (including certain environmental issues) relating to the outline planning application to construct a European Demonstration Reprocessing Plant at Dounreay", the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and British Nuclear Fuels plc. indicated that they would expect the volumes of high-level and intermediate-level radioactive waste arisings to be 85m^3 per annum in liquid form (12m^3 per annum after solidification) and 170m^3 per annum in solid form respectively. The applicants have not indicated the expected volume of low-level solid waste arisings.

PAYMASTER GENERAL

Employment and Training (Swindon)

Mr. Coombs asked the Paymaster General what was the total number of people benefiting from special employment and training measures at the latest available date in the Swindon constituency; and if he will list the measures and the numbers affected in each case.

Mr. Alan Clark: Some 3,600; although because of the various bases on which local information is collated, an unknown proportion are in areas outside my hon. Friend's constituency. The estimates for the individual measures are set out in the table:

	Number
Community Industry	90
Community Programme	1,530
Enterprise Allowance Scheme	760
Job Release Scheme	150
Job Splitting Scheme	1
Young Workers Scheme	130
Youth Training Scheme	950

Factory Inspectors

Mr. Golding asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of Her Majesty's inspectors of factories engaged on duties in north Staffordshire for each year since 1978.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Factory inspectors based at the Marches area office of the Health and Safety Executive are responsible for the counties of Staffordshire, Salop and Hereford and Worcester. Separate figures for north Staffordshire are not available. The numbers of factory inspectors in the Marches area at 1 October each year were:

	Number
1978	27
1979	28
1980	27
1981	25
1982	24
1983	23
1984	24
1985	24

Ionising Radiation

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Paymaster General when he plans to lay new regulations governing legally permissible doses of ionising radiation; and in what procedural form the introduction of such regulations will be made.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985 were laid on 4 September 1985. They are subject to negative resolution.

International Labour Organisation (Conventions)

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General if he will list the International Labour Organisation conventions, indicating to which ones the United Kingdom is a signatory.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The International Labour Organisation has adopted 161 conventions, of which the United Kingdom has ratified, and is currently bound by 70. A list of the conventions follows in which those currently in force for the United Kingdom are indicated by an asterisk.

* Conventions which the United Kingdom has ratified and by which it is currently bound.

Mr. Bellingham asked the Paymaster General what action the Government have taken with regard to the ratification of International Labour Organisation Convention No. 23 (Repatriation of Seamen) and No. 126 (Accommodation of Crews (Fishermen)).

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government's ratification of convention No. 23 was registered with the Director General of the International Labour Office on 3 June 1985 and that of convention No. 126 on 13 August 1985.

GEC (Redundancies)

Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General if he plans to meet representatives of either management or trade unions from the General Electric company to discuss the unemployment implications of the recently announced 1,000 redundancies in Coventry and Kirkcaldy.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have no plans to do so.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list the most recent figures for the numbers of jobs created since January 1983 after taking account of second jobs.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employment at different dates.

Between December 1982 (figures are not available for January 1983) and June 1985 (the latest date for which comprehensive quarterly figures are available) the Great Britain employed labour force increased by 610,000. The employed labour force is the sum of employees in employment, the self employed and Her Majesty's Forces.

The second jobs included in the employees in employment estimates are not separately identified, but estimates from the labour force surveys suggest an increase of 60,000 between spring 1983 and spring 1984 (the latest date for which estimates are available) in the number of people with a second job as an employee.

The employment estimates do not include second jobs when they are held as self employed.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Paymaster General what is his latest estimate of the number of long-term unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 11 July 1985, the latest date for which analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over one year was 1,326,884.

Community Programme

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Paymaster General how many places are available on the community programme during the current year.

Mr. Alan Clark: The community programme is being expanded to 230,000 filled places by the end of May 1986. At the end of September (the latest date for which statistics are available) there were 151,000 filled places on the programme.

Dockworkers (Severance Payments)

Mr. Bellingham asked the Paymaster General what new arrangements have been made for the financing of severances among registered dockworkers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As a result of discussion with the National Association of Port Employers new arrangements for the funding of severance payments to registered dockworkers in all ports have now been agreed on the following basis:

1. The Government will pay 100 per cent. of the future severance costs until end March 1986, 75 per cent. until end March 1987 and 50 per cent. until end March 1988, all payments related to a maximum of £25,000 per registered dockworker severed. The balance will be paid by the employer concerned.
2. Where an employer de-registers in any port the Government will examine the circumstances with a view to grant-aiding 100 per cent. of the registered dockworker severance costs up to the £25,000 maximum.
3. Interest and capital repayments on the outstanding Government loans to the National Dock Labour Board of £44·5 million will not be sought pending an opportunity to seek Parliamentary approval for the write-off of the loans.

As a condition of this assistance the board has undertaken with the agreement of the employers to service and repay its commercial debt to Barclays Bank (currently about £11.5 million) to a point where by end-March 1990 the Bank releases the Government from its existing contingent liability for this debt.

For this purpose the employers have undertaken to raise £1 million over the rest of the present financial year and £2 million a year thereafter. Separately, the industry has agreed to use a substantial surplus in its pension fund to provide improved pension arrangements with enhancements for early retirement.

Legislative authority for this Government expenditure in ports other than Liverpool and London is provided by section 1 of the Ports (Finance) Act 1985. Financial provision will be sought in a Supplementary Supply Estimate for the labour market services Vote (Class IV, Vote 12). Pending Parliament's approval, the urgent expenditure, estimated at £5 million, will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will continue to contribute, but on the same basis as for other ports, to the cost of severances in Liverpool and London.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Famine Relief (Ethiopia)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement updating the information contained in his reply to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish, Official Report, 24 July, c. 542, concerning grain supplies and supplementary food and edible oil requirements in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: The estimated total cereal requirement for famine relief in Ethiopia in 1985 remains at 1·5 million tonnes. So far some 934,000 tonnes have been delivered.

Supplementary food needs (skimmed milk powder and high protein biscuits) are now estimated at about 130,000 tonnes; substantially more than this has been delivered or is being shipped.

Edible oil requirements are not known. 41,000 tonnes have been pledged of which 33,000 tonnes have been delivered.

Tropical Development and Research Institute

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to fill the post of Director of the Tropical Development and Research Institute; what minimum qualifications he expects of candidates in (a) science and (b) tropical experience; and what advertisement has been, or is being, given to the vacancy.

Mr. Raison: An open competition was held earlier this year to try and identify a suitable successor to the present Director of the Tropical Development and Research Institute who is approaching retirement. The vacancy was widely advertised in the appropriate journals. The competition unfortunately failed to produce anyone who was judged to have the necessary scientific and administrative qualities for the post. Since the new director will face the major task of managing the relocation of the component parts of the institute on a new site at Chatham in 1987-88 an assistant secretary, Mr. G. A. Beattie, in the Overseas Development Administration has been appointed, on temporary promotion, to the post for the next two to three years. The aim will be for this officer to be succeeded in due course by an officer with a scientific background.

Latin America (Aid)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the bilateral and multilateral aid given to each country in Latin America in each of the last three years, stating in each case (a) the conditions attached to such aid and (b) the institutions through which the multilateral aid was co-ordinated.

Mr. Raison: The following is gross United Kingdom bilateral and multilateral aid to Latin America for the period 1982 to 1984. Multilateral aid figures for 1984 are not yet available.

The content of country bilateral programmes is decided in consultation with recipient governments and various conditions apply. It is our normal practice to tie bilateral aid to the purchase of British goods and services although this does not apply to loans from the Commonwealth Development Corporation. Grants from the aid and trade provision are provided in association with commercial credits and further and specific conditions apply. Britain does not normally attach specific conditions to aid made available through multilateral institutions.

Figures for multilateral aid attributable to Britain reflect the proportion of the British contribution to the general resources of the organisations concerned and not for use in individual countries.

The principal institutions through which multilateral aid was channelled are the World Bank Group, the Inter-American Development Bank, the European Community, the United Nations and its agencies and the Caribbean Development Bank.

Aid and Trade Provision

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there has been any revision in the aid and trade provision budget for the current financial year.

Mr. Raison: No. The level of the aid and trade provision budget remains at £66 million for the current financial year.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the review of the aid and trade provision is now complete.

Mr. Raison: Consideration of the various issues relating to ATP is well advanced, and a statement will be made shortly.

Famine (Aid)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a response to the representations made to Her Majesty's Government by the World Development Movement regarding aid to overcome famine.

Mr. Raison: As I announced on 22 October to the mass lobby of Parliament organised by the World Development Movement and the churches, we spent over £89 million on famine relief for Africa in 1984-85 from the aid programme; this year we will provide at least a further £75 million.

The Government will continue to play their part, alongside our European Community partners and the multilateral and voluntary agencies, in the essential international relief efforts as they continue next year.

Cereals Research

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the amount of money allocated from the aid budget for research and development of new and more prolific strains of wheat, maize and other cereals suitable for growing in underdeveloped countries, for each of the last five years.

Mr. Raison: Britain contributes, as follows, to the annual budgets of a number of international agricultural research centres (IARCs) whose work is devoted wholly or partly to research on cereals for use in developing countries. In the case of centres whose mandate includes crops or topics other than cereals it is not possible to identify the budget for, and British contribution to, cereals alone.

We also finance research projects in many agricultural sectors both through our research and development programme and through our country programmes. Some of these projects are concerned solely with one or more aspects of cereal crop improvement but many tackle this within a wider ranging project, dealing with eg farming systems or embracing other non-cereal crops. It is not possible to separate the costs of the components of these projects. Expenditure on projects concerned wholly or in part with cereal improvement has been:

1980-81	592,000
1981-82	667,600
1982-83	1,041,800
1983-84	1,473,800
1984-85	1,402,000

A copy of the report on research and development is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the amount allocated from the aid budget for research and development at Kew Gardens of new cereal crops suitable for growing in harsh conditions in Africa for each of the last five years.

Mr. Raison: We have not financed research projects carried out by the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew in the field of cereal crops.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sri Lankan Citizens

59. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people in Sri Lanka have applied for a visa to enter the United Kingdom; and how many such applications have been granted.

Mr. Eggar: The visa requirement for Sri Lankan nationals was introduced on 30 May. From that date until 30 September the High Commission in Colombo received 4,774 visa applications from Sri Lankans and issued 4,156 visas.

Elena Gurevich

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report as much information as is in his possession about Elena Gurevich of the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The case of Elena Gurevich and her family is known to us, although our information is somewhat incomplete. Miss Gurevich, who is now 21, and her parents have been trying to leave the Soviet Union for Israel since 1974. Their applications have, however, been consistently refused on the grounds that Mrs. Gurevich has had access to classified information as a messenger in an institute which tracked sputniks. We are not aware of any recent reapplication by the family.

Contadora Treaty

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with other European Economic Community countries concerning the revised draft Contadora treaty; what recommendations he will be making in this respect to the meeting of Foreign Ministers in Luxembourg; and if he will place a copy of the revised draft in the Library.

Mr. Rifkind: Our position is as stated in the declaration made by Community Foreign Ministers on 10 September in Luxembourg which called on the States of Central America to come to an agreement that allows for a peaceful, global and verifiable solution. I am arranging for a copy of the revised draft Contadora Act to be placed in the Library of the House.

Guatemala

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to send observers to the forthcoming elections in Guatemala.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent exchanges have been held with Guatemala, directly and indirectly, concerning (a) the situation of Belize, (b) the re-establishment of consular relations and (c) the refusal to allow United Kingdom Members of Parliament to visit Guatemala.

Mr. Eggar: There have been no direct or indirect exchanges on (a) or (b) since last February when British officials attended talks between Belize and Guatemala as observers. In the absence of diplomatic or consular relations with Guatemala representations on (c) were made in the summer at the request of the hon. Members concerned via other Governments with good relations with both the United Kingdom and Guatemala.

Business Activities (Deregulation)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all proposals made by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community for the deregulation of business activities; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the document submitted by the United Kingdom to European Economic Community directorates concerning the modification of existing directorates in the areas of health and safety, employment protection, consumer protection, environmental protection and transport.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom has made no formal proposals. The document referred to was a working paper designed to help the Commission in its work on deregulation. Our approach was set out in the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571) laid before Parliament in July 1985.

Mr. Raoul Wallenberg

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any further representations to the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics concerning Mr. Raoul Wallenberg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I last raised the case of Raoul Wallenberg during my meeting with Soviet First Deputy Foreign Minister Kornienko in Moscow at the end of July. This was the third occasion on which I have done as in so many years. Regrettably, Mr. Kornienko chose not to comment on the matter. Nevertheless, we will continue to assist the Swedish Government in seeking to establish more clearly what happened to Mr. Wallenberg.

South Africa

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he intends to make to the Government of South Africa about progress towards the achievement of human rights for blacks in South Africa and progress towards the dismantlement of apartheid.

Mr. Rifkind: We take every opportunity to impress upon the South African Government our deep concern about human rights questions and the urgent need to dismantle apartheid. This concern was clearly reflected in the important statements by EC Ministers at Luxembourg on 10 September and the accord reached by Commonwealth Heads of Government in Nassau on 20 October.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people currently residing in South Africa, as South African citizens, are entitled to British passports under United Kingdom immigration rules.

Mr. Rifkind: Eligibility for a British passport is determined by the British Nationality Act not by the immigration rules.

It is estimated that there are between one and two million persons of British birth or descent resident in South Africa. It is not known how many are dual South African-British nationals.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those Governments which expressed (a) pleasure and (b) disappointment at the cancellation of the recent meeting between him and the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

Mr. Renton: There is widespread disappointment that the opportunity presented by the proposed meeting between my right hon. and learned Friend and a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation has been missed.

Tristan da Cunha

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes and developments have been decided upon and are being considered in Tristan da Cunha as a result of the recent visit by His Excellency the Governor of St. Helena and dependents.

Mr. Eggar: The Governor's visit to Tristan da Cunha in April 1985 was for routine familiarisation and liaison with the territory for which he is responsible.

Pakistan

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) on what occasions Ministers or officials of his Department have visited Pakistan since 1977;

(2) for what purposes Ministers or officials of his Department have visited Pakistan since 1979.

Mr. Eggar: In recent years Foreign and Commonwealth Ministers and officials have visited Pakistan on a number of occasions for the purpose of fostering various aspects of our bilateral relationships. Visits have been made by the then Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, Lord Carrington in March 1981; the then Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), in November 1982; the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), in January 1983; the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, Baroness Young, in March 1984; the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and Minister for Overseas Development; my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), in July 1984; and the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), in January 1985. I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible with details of visits prior to 1981.

Middle East

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the statement on the middle east which one of the members of the proposed Palestine Liberation Organisation delegation, Mr. Milhen, declined to sign.

Mr. Renton: The agreed statement which we expected the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation would issue stated that

"the members of the joint delegation reiterated their personal support for a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute on the basis of the relevant United Nations resolutions, including Resolutions 242 and 338 of the Security Council. They stated that in accordance with these resolutions a settlement should recognise the rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination within the context of a Jordanian-Palestinian confederation, as well as the right to secure existence of all states in the area, including Israel within its 1967 borders. They confirmed their opposition to all forms of terrorism and violence from whatever source."

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what stage and in what circumstances he expects to meet with representatives of the Palestinian people.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present for meetings with Palestinians. We shall continue to encourage the leaders of moderate Palestinian opinion to work for a just and lasting settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute through negotiation.

Territorial Integrity (Government Policy)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the acquisition of territory by force.

Mr. Eggar: The United Nations Charter commits member states to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state (article 2.4). We believe all states should abide by that commitment.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Projects (Urban Development Grant)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all housing projects which have received an offer of urban development grant since the scheme began; and, for each project, what is the amount of public sector financial support and the total private sector investment involved.

Sir George Young: Forty three housing schemes have been approved for urban development grant since 1982. These would entail public expenditure of £18·5 million and private sector investment of £58·9 million. A further eight offers of grant have not been taken up. A full list of approved schemes is regularly placed in the Library of the House and I am sending a copy to the hon. Member.

Planning Applications

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will introduce legislation to require all planning application decisions in local government to be subject to elected member control and determination and to prohibit planning applications being decided by paid officials acting alone under delegated powers;

(2) if he will introduce legislation declaring null and void local government planning application decisions which have been determined by paid officials acting alone under delegated powers;

(3) what information he has as to how many local authorities delegate the power to decide planning applications to one or more officials of the authorities; and if he will identify the local authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department has no information on the number of local authorities which delegate to officers the power to decide planning applications.

Delegation to officers has advantages for the speedy handling of applications; the extent and circumstances of deregulation are, however, matters for each authority to decide for itself.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to require local government planning authorities to publish in the minutes of relevent meetings the reasons for their refusal of individual planning applications.

Mrs. Rumbold: Local planning authorities are already required by article 7 of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977 to state reasons for their decision in the notice to the applicant of their decision on a planning application.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation requiring local government planning authorities to circulate to members of the appropriate committees full details of all objections lodged to individual planning applications and to prohibit the practice of officials being allowed to summarise objections at their discretion.

Mrs. Rumbold: No. Whether or not an officer summarises objections for the benefit of members is a question of the internal management of the council's business which members must decide.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will introduce legislation requiring minutes of planning committees and sub-committees of planning committees to be available for public inspection within seven days of the relevant meeting;

(2) if he will introduce legislation allowing applicants and objectors to planning applications the right to be present at relevant meetings where their applications or objections are being considered;

(3) if he will introduce legislation requiring all planning application decisions to be made in public, with the Press and the public able to attend the relevant meetings;

(4) what information he has as to how many local authorities exclude the press and public from meetings when planning application decisions are made; and if he will identify such local authorities;

(5) what information he has as to how many local government planning authorities delegate planning applications to sub-committees which meet with the press and public excluded; and if he will identify such authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is not available. The Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985 which comes into force on 1 April 1986 provides, subject only to specific statutory exceptions, for access by both the public and the press to council, committee and sub-committee meetings and for the minutes of such meetings to be open to public inspection.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation allowing objectors to planning applications which are granted to make representations to him within 28 days of the planning permission being granted and providing for planning permissions not to be operative during this 28 day period or until he has considered any such representations, whichever is the later.

Mrs. Rumbold: No. Such legislation would conflict with the presumption, reiterated in circular 14/85, in favour of allowing development unless it would cause demonstrable harm to interests of acknowledged importance; and, in making the Secretary of State the ultimate arbiter of the 86 per cent. of planning applications which are approved by local planning authorities, it would greatly increase costs and delay.

Planning Appeals (South Lakeland District Council)

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals he has considered in respect of planning decisions of the South Lakeland district council for each of the years 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985; and how many of these appeals were upheld after a public inquiry.

Mrs. Rumbold: The statistics requested are being collated and I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as they are available.

Local Councillors (Misconduct)

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many local authorities have a special standing committee whose principal term of reference is to deal with the misconduct of elected members; and if he will identify such local authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for each local authority to determine the nature and terms of reference of its committees. My Department does not collect information of the nature to which my hon. Friend refers.

Local Authorities (Discrimination)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer of 19 November 1984, Official Report, column 3, he will make a further statement on any proposals that he is considering to prevent local authorities from discriminating against private companies for reasons which have nothing to do with the quality of their work.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Thameside Planning Consultative Committee

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been made to him concerning the retention of the Thameside planning consultative committee under the aegis of the London Planning Commission.

Mr. Tracey: None. The question would be for the joint planning committee for Greater London itself to decide.

Ministry of Defence Houses

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the reply of 17 September by his Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the right hon. Member for Brent East concerning empty Ministry of Defence houses.

Sir George Young: Yes, the text of my letter is as follows:—

EMPTY HOUSES

You sent Ian Gow a copy of your letter of 30 August to Michael Heseltine about empty MOD housing. Most of the points you raise are for MOD to answer but I thought I should reply as well.

I am, of course extremely concerned to see that the number of empty Government houses is kept to a minimum. A certain degree of vacancy is necessary for operational flexibility but my officials, both in PSA and in DOE, are in very frequent contact with their counterparts in MOD (and in other Government Departments with a housing stock) to see that all reasonable steps are taken to put any surplus to an alternative use as quickly as possible. My predecessor here also had frequent exchanges with Ministerial colleagues, both in the Ministry of Defence and other Departments with housing stocks, on this very point.

One recent improvement which we have persuaded MOD to introduce is to consider houses which are likely to be temporarily empty for 6 months or more to local authorities on lease. The previous minimum qualifying period was 18 months. Currently there are about 400 such houses let for various periods to several different local authorities. It is reasonable to expect that more temporarily empty MOD houses may well be offered to local authorities as a result of the recent change in the minimum qualifying period.

Acting for MOD, PSA sold 346 MOD houses in the 4 months from the end of March to the end of July this year. In the 4 months before that, PSA sold another 351 MOD houses. I can assure you that every effort is devoted to the disposal of surplus property and that a very high degree of priority is accorded to the sale of empty houses. In the last 3 years of so, over 200 surplus MOD houses have been sold to 8 different local authorities. In the same period, almost 4,000 surplus MOD houses have been sold altogether by PSA.

I hope you will find these statistics encouraging. Selling surplus MOD houses or allowing local authorities to lease temporarily surplus MOD houses is a task which will continue for some time yet but it is one which is being accorded great priority.

I am sending a copy of this letter to John Stanley at the Ministry of Defence."

Rosehill Estate, Willenhall

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when a Minister from his Department intends to visit the Rosehill estate, Willenhall, west midlands; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 26 July at column 886. The estate has already been visited by the Department's regional housing controller. I hope to be able to do so myself at some future date.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library the report proposed by the west midlands regional controller of his Department on the state of the properties in Rosehill estate, Willenhall, west midlands, arising from the visit made on 6 August;

(2) if he will now state the recommendations made by the regional controller of his Department regarding the Rosehill estate, Willenhall, arising from his visit on 6 August.

Sir George Young: The regional controller's report was in the form of advice to Ministers. It was not intended for publication and it would not be appropriate to do so. Among his recommendations, the regional controller advised that the Department's urban housing renewal unit should visit the estate in order to assess the problems and suggest measures for dealing with them. A visit by UHRU has now been arranged.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations were made on 6 August by the Walsall metropolitan borough council to the west midlands regional controller of his Department regarding finance in 1986-87 to undertake the modernisation of properties on the Rosehill estate, Willenhall.

Sir George Young: At the meeting on 6 August and at a subsequent meeting with officials to discuss its housing investment programme for 1986-87, Walsall borough council described the resources it feels it needs to undertake the range of its housing responsibilities: this included, as a major priority identified by the council, the modernisation of all its inter-war properties.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the main defects in the properties in the Rosehill estate, Willenhall; what is the likely cost of the work needed to be undertaken; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The main defects affecting the properties are damp and condensation and a general lack of repair and modernisation. The council has estimated the total cost of repairing and modernising the estate to be about £3 million.

Housing Modernisation (Walsall)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take to seek to ensure that the Walsall metropolitan borough council has sufficient funding in 1986-87 to modernise its pre-war properties.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 21 October at column 87. The condition of the council's housing stock will be fully taken into account when decisions are taken about the allocation of housing resources for 1986-87.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of properties owned by the Walsall metropolitan borough council awaiting modernisation or major repair work.

Sir George Young: This information is contained in Walsall borough council's bid for housing investment programme resources and its housing strategy statement 1986-87, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Housing Investment (Walsall)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the criteria used in determining the current housing investment programme allocation for Walsall metropolitan borough council.

Sir George Young: Housing investment programme allocations are made in two stages: first to the regional level and then to individual local authorities. Distribution to the regional level is based on the generalised needs index, made up of 12 indicators of housing need. Allocations of the regional total to individual authorities are made partly using the GNI and partly through the local discretionary element, which enables the Secretary of State to take into account any special local factors which are brought to his attention.

Greater London Enterprise Board

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will approve any further grants from the Greater London council to the Greater London enterprise board under the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mrs. Rumbold: Before considering any proposals for further GLC grant aid to the Greater London enterprise board my right hon. Friend has asked the GLC to provide firm evidence of commitments to future funding by London borough councils, information about the board's future requirements for financial support and an independent assessment of the board's ability to continue as a going concern. These have not yet been provided.

My right hon. Friend would of course have to be satisfied that further expenditure by the GLC would be both expedient and in the interests of the Greater London area or its inhabitants.

Nuclear Waste (Disposal)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when, and by what means, he intends to announce the proposed sites which the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive wish to investigate as possibly suitable for the disposal of short-lived and medium-term nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Canning Street, Liverpool (Conservation)

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what extra resources will be available to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission during 1985-86 to carry out their programme of conservation in Canning street, Liverpool; and what cash limit changes he proposes to make.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has decided that it would be appropriate to make extra provision to the HBMC in order to complete phase 1 out of the resources allocated to the Merseyside task force for inner city initiatives on Merseyside. Subject, therefore, to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the cash limit for class VIII, vote 4 will be increased by £930,000 from £69,490,000 to £70,420,000. The non-voted urban block cash limit will be reduced by the same amount ie by £930,000 from £377,645,000 to £376,715,000. There is therefore no net increase in public expenditure.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Egg Marketing Regulations (Farm Inspectors)

Mr. Corbett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library a copy of the guidance given to inspectors concerned with assessing farms under European Economic Community egg marketing regulations.

Mr. Gummer: I do not think it would be appropriate for such documents to be made generally available, but if the hon. Gentleman wishes to pursue a particular point I shall be happy to try to help him.

European Community (Israeli Access)

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is intended, following the entry of Spain and Portugal into the European Community, that Israel should have access to the Community for her agricultural products in any way different from that enjoyed by other Mediterranean non-European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Gummer: There are a series of agreements with Mediterranean third countries under which the Community allows tariff and other concessions on a wide range of products, including some in the agricultural sector. The differing concessions in these agreements are tailored to the traditional patterns of trade between the Community and each third country. All the agreements are currently being revised. For Israel as for other Mediterranean third countries the intention is to maintain the traditional pattern of trade after enlargement.

Agricultural Subsidies

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will take action to reduce combined United Kingdom and European Economic Community agricultural subsidies payable in the United Kingdom to a level less than the value of the product.

Mr. Gummer: The support arrangements for all the major agricultural products are applied according to measures laid down in regulations agreed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers. This enables the countries of the European Community to make joint decisions on these important matters. We have consistently argued and continue to argue that in order to reduce the cost of this support and to control the growth of surplus production the Council should adopt a more restrictive price policy.

Intervention and Assisted Private Storage (Stocks)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a complete list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in England and the United Kingdom, respectively, the amount held and values at the latest available date.

Mr. Gummer: For details of the amount of foodstuffs held in UK public intervention and its values, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on Wednesday 23 October 1985 [col. 171] to the question by the hon. Member for Knowsley North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk). I will provide the remaining information requested as soon as possible.

Liquid Skimmed Milk

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in each of the last five years and 1985 to date in the United Kingdom; and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested is as follows:—

Year	Quantity (million litres)	Subsidy (£ million)
1980	657·394	32·842
1981	628·466	29·775
1982	643·404	32·453
1983	1,066·577	64·684
1984	1,002·362	76·668
*1985	354·912	27·050

* To August

Commodity Regradation

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which commodities, other than liquid skimmed milk, held in European Community intervention stores, have been rendered unfit for human consumption.

Mr. Gummer: Liquid skimmed milk is not held in intervention stores. Skimmed milk powder has been sold with the addition of other animal feed components which make it suitable only for animal feed. Breadmaking wheat has been denatured by the addition of a dye and sold for animal feed.

Icelandic Salted Cod

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why he has agreed to a tariff being reimposed on the import of Icelandic salted cod.

Mr. Gummer: The Council of Fisheries Ministers agreed in December 1984 to restore the full rate of duty set out in the Common Custom Tariff on imports of dried and salted cod in the context of the expected acession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community. Existing trade patterns have been safeguarded by the Community opening a number of tariff free quotas for dried and salted cod following the restoration of the full rate of duty.

Farming Industry (Bad Weather Aid)

Mr. Home asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the value and the method of distribution of the aid which he has announced for sectors of the farming industry which have been affected by bad weather.

Mr. Jopling: I am considering the most appropriate ways of helping livestock farmers some of whom face enormous difficulties this winter because of the effect of the adverse weather on the availability of winter feed. We intend to provide help—extra money—where it is most needed as soon as possible.

WALES

Home-start Schemes

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many home-start schemes exist in Wales; and how many are receiving financial assistance through central Government funds;

(2) what is the level of central Government assistance to the Rhymney Valley home-start scheme; and what estimates exist for funding up to 1988, in cash and constant terms;

(3) what has been the annual level of funding, in constant terms, for the home-start consultancy in Wales since 1981; and what estimates are availabe up to 1988;

(4) what local or central Government funding is available to home-start schemes in Wales other than central funding of the home-start consultancy.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The home-start service is not extensive in Wales and there is no consultancy here. There are two projects under way in Aberconwy and Rhymney Valley which have received £2,000 and £11,900, respectively, under the opportunities for volunteering scheme. The latter project also received £2,500 from Mid-Glamorgan county council, and the council has recently submitted an application for urban programme assistance on behalf of Rhymney Valley home-start for funding in 1986-87.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia (Famine Relief)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of work undertaken by RAF Hercules on famine relief in Ethiopia; and for how long that work will continue.

Mr. Raison: Two RAF Hercules and their detachment, including a team from the Royal Corps of Transport, have been operating in Ethiopia since November 1984. Up to 22 October they had airlifted 15,934 tonnes of relief supplies and dropped a further 11,704 tonnes. The operation is much appreciated in Ethiopia. As I announced on 22 July at column 723, we have offered to keep the British detachment in Ethiopia until the latter part of December.

Songea-Makambako Road, Tanzania

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the original estimate of the cost of the Songea-Makambako road, Tanzania.

Mr. Raison: The original estimate of the cost of upgrading the Songea-Makambako road to all-weather standard was the equivalent of £41·8 million, of which Her Majesty's Government agreed in October 1978 to provide £39 million.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what tendering procedure was used for the second phase of the Songea-Makambako road, Tanzania.

Mr. Raison: Following satisfactory performance on the first phase of the project, the same contractor was offered a negotiated supplementary contract for work overlapping that in the first phase. The fender was examined both by the British consulting engineers supervising the project and by a firm of specialist estimators before the contract was awarded.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total cost so far of the two phases of the Songea-Makambako road, Tanzania.

Mr. Raison: Of the £84 million capital aid that ODA has approved for the Songea-Makambako road, £47·14 million was spent on phase I and £33·35 million has so far been spent on phase II. A further £5·6 million has been approved for associated technical co-operation, including consultancies. Most of this has been spent.

Mbeya Southern Highlands Hospital Project

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much has been spent on the Mbeya southern highlands health project in the last financial year.

Mr. Raison: In the financial year 1984-85, capital aid expenditure on the Mbeya southern regions health project was £699,000.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much has so far been spent on the Mbeya southern highlands hospital project.

Mr. Raison: Capital aid expenditure on the Mbeya southern regions hospital project to date has been £5·17 million.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the original estimate of the cost of Mbeya southern highlands hospital project.

Mr. Raison: The original estimated cost to ODA of the Mbeya southern regions hospital project in Tanzania was £6·85 million; a further £500,000 was agreed earlier this year.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the progress to date of the outreach programme in the Mbeya southern highlands health project of Tanzania.

Mr. Raison: Through the outreach programme regular visits are mde by specialists from the referral hospital in Mbeya to 15 district hospitals and 25 health centres in the Mbeya, Rukwa and Iringa regions. These visits provide valuable training and health care on the spot.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Open University

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his recent visits to the Open University.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend visited the Open University on 17 and 20 July, when he discussed with the university its undergraduate work and continuing education programme. The purpose of the visits was to familiarise himself with the university, and he obtained a valuable picture of its activities and operations.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been (i) the total cost of the assisted places scheme, at 1984-85 prices, in each year for which figures are available, (ii) the numbers participating in the scheme, (iii) the average annual increase in fees in those schools participating in the scheme since its inception and (iv) the average increase in fees of independent schools not participating, over the same period.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

	Financial year Expenditure £ million at 1984-85 prices	School year Number of assisted pupils	School year Average fee increase percentage over preceding year
1981-82	3·531	4,185	—
1982-83	9·489	8,616	10·9
1983-84	15·672	13,102	11·6
1984-85	22·152	17,386	6·8
1985-86	—	—	6·6

Information on the average fee increases at non-participating schools is not available.

University Degrees (Costs)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average cost of an Open University degree in comparison with the average cost of a conventional university degree in each of the last five years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Brooke: The information is not available. At the request of the Open University, discussions will be held at official level about comparative costs.

Students (Statistics)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the number of nursery class and nursery school places per 1,000 children aged three and four years in each London education authority, in the metropolitan and non-metropolitan authorities and in Greater London, respectively.

School Admissions

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will make a statement on the progress of the provisions of the Education Act 1980 dealing with school admissions;

(2) for each local authority, how many admission appeals have been made to education appeals committees for the (a) voluntary and (b) state sectors under the provisions of the Education Act 1980; how many applicants have been successful in their appeals; and how many cases have subsequently been referred to the Commission for Local Administration on grounds of maladministration by the local education authority involved, in each year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is satisfied with the implementation of the school admission provisions of the Education Act 1980. The information requested regarding admission appeals is not available centrally.

REPLAN Scheme

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to make a decision on the future of the REPLAN scheme.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce his decision by the end of the year.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what changes in membership have been reported to his Department by the teachers' unions represented on the Burnham committee since 31 December; and what is the latest total membership of each union provided to him.

Sir Keith Joseph: Teacher unions were asked for and provided numbers of fully paid-up members as at 31 December 1984 who were statutorily entitled to salaries determined by the Burnham primary and secondary committee and paid accordingly by avant LEA in England and Wales — that is "Burnham-relevant" figures — as follows:

	Numbers
Assistant Masters' and Mistresses' Association (AMMA)	64,636
National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers (NAS UWT)	115,611
National Union of Teachers (NUT)	216,138
Professional Association of Teachers (PAT)	21,260
National Association of Head Teachers (NAHT)	19,952
Secondary Heads' Association (SHA)	3,939

Two associations have provided later figures. AMMA has indicated that its Burnham-relevant membership had increased to 73,654 by July 1985. PAT has not provided a later Burnham-relevant figure but has said that total membership increased from 27,902 on 31 December 1984 to 35,832 in October.

PRIME MINISTER

South Africa (Trade Delegations)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister whether the agreement reached at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting to cease to make public funds available to trade delegations to South Africa includes delegations already planned.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The agreement is not specific on this point.

We shall interpret the provisions regarding Government funding for trade missions to South Africa with due regard for the circumstances of individual cases.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for each class of local authority and for local authorities in total, the percentage of increase in current expenditure in cash between (a) 1978-79 and 1985-86 and (b) 1981-82 and 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information for English local authorities is as follows:

Percentage increase in net current expenditure in cash terms

Class of authority	(a) 1978-79 to 1985-86	(b) 1981-82 to 1985-86
Shire counties	97	27
Shire districts	86	30
Metropolitan counties	126	26
Metropolitan districts	91	24
Inner London boroughs	118	37
Outer London boroughs	89	23
GLC	119	35
ILEA	119	35
City of London	294	97
Isles of Scilly	101	34
Total all England	98	27

Local Authority Associations (Consultation)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the ground rules circulated within his Department to ensure adequate consultation with the local authority associations in the light of the judgment in R v. Secretary of State for Social Services ex parte the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

Dog Wardens

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities in the last three years have ceased to employ dog wardens.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department does not have this information.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities currently have dog wardens.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not collected by my Department, but I understand that the joint advisory committee on pets in society is aware of some 190 local authorities in Great Britain which currently operate dog warden services.

Council House Sales

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide for higher discounts to be given to tenants or third parties purchasing the freehold or long leaseholds of individual properties in hard-to-let urban estates; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Many of the properties in the estates to which my hon. Friend refers are flats. We are considering what further encouragement can be given to tenants of flats to buy their homes. We have also recently announced proposals for legislation to give purchasers of flats under the right to buy better protection against high service charges.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment upon which matters relating to the London residuary body he is prepared to answer questions.

Mrs. Rumbold: Matters over which the Local Government Act 1985 gives my right hon. Friend specific control.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the minutes of meetings of the London residuary body will be made available to hon. Members.

Mrs. Rumbold: This is a matter for the London residuary body.

Spray Irrigation Licences

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many spray irrigation licences have been issued in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years; and if he will undertake to review the duration of such licences.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is not held centrally since licences are granted by water authorities. I am unaware of any problem arising from their duration.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has received for joint agreements on waste disposal in the metropolitan counties and Greater London after abolition; and what response he has made.

Mrs. Rumbold: In four of the six metropolitan counties — Tyne and Wear, South Yorkshire, West Yorkshire and West Midlands—we have received joint proposals from all the district councils. If these can be put into effect by means of binding agreements between the districts it appears that they will make satisfactory joint arrangements for the discharge of waste disposal functions. In London, proposals put forward by Bromley, Croydon, Kingston upon Thames, Merton and Sutton (London boroughs ""Group 1") and by the Cities of London and Westminster (Group 6") for the operational aspects of waste disposal, if carried into effect, would also appear to make satisfactory joint arrangements for these purposes. Also in London, the London boroughs of Ealing, Harrow, Hillingdon, and Richmond upon Thames ("Group 3") have invited the Secretary of State to exercise his powers under section 10 of the Local Government Act 1985 in due course to set up a single authority for the operational aspects of waste disposal to cover their areas and adjoining boroughs in west London.

In Greater London, we have received no agreed proposals for joint arrangements for the regulations of hazardous waste, where we have indicated that we see advantages in such arrangements. However, a number of London boroughs have put forward proposals, or have indicated that they would welcome the Secretary of State using his powers under section 10 to set up a single authority for this purpose. Nor have we received proposals in respect of the operational aspects in the London boroughs—other than those I have already mentioned—adequate to rule out the need to fulfil the duty to set up single authorities laid upon the Secretary of State by section 10.

None of the various proposals received from district councils in Greater Manchester or Merseyside appears in current circumstances to represent satisfactory arrangements for either the regulatory or the operational aspects of waste disposal. Four district councils, Wigan and Bolton in Greater Manchester and Wirral and Sefton in Merseyside, proposed that they should be allowed to operate independently for at least the operational aspects of waste disposal. There is such a community of interest between each of these four authorities and their neighbouring districts that there would appear to be clear advantage in joint arrangements. If proposals which include these authorities are not made by 15 November, it therefore seems likely that the Secretary of State would have to use his powers under section 10 to set up single authorities. However, the establishment of such authorities in Greater Manchester and Merseyside would not preclude other arrangements being substituted at some future date if the situation were to change.

Those councils whose proposed arrangements appear satisfactory have now been invited to prepare formal documentation for these arrangements. A further announcement will be made after 15 November on the proposed use of the powers under section 10 to set up single authorities for areas where joint arrangements would be advantageous, but no such satisfactory arrangements have been made by the due date.

English Estates

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the amount of industrial floor space owned or managed by English Estates on a region-by-region basis, indicating which region/regions enjoys special development area status and (b) the amount of industrial floor space currently unlet within the ownership of English Estates on a region-by-region basis.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have been asked to reply.

The table gives the position at the end of March 1985. A revised table showing the position at the end of September is being prepared and I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library.

Industrial floorspace owned or managed by English Estates at 31 March 1985 (by Standard Region)

Region	Total stock units	Sq. metres	Total vacant units	Sq. metres
NE	1,542	1,166,763	419	214,329
NW	1,070	556,527	331	146,224
Y & H	626	164,408	231	42,926
EM	204	48,080	38	8,939
WM	176	38,416	33	6,464
SW	528	121,248	155	36,029
SE	146	21,390	30	3,395

Under current assisted area designations, introduced in November 1984, all regions now contain both development and intermediate areas as well as non-assisted areas, except that the south-east is entirely non-assisted and the west midlands contains only intermediate and non-assisted areas.

ENERGY

Wiltshire (Oil Exploration)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of exploration for oil in Wiltshire.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: One exploration well has been drilled in Wiltshire in each of the years 1936, 1972, 1975, 1976 and 1980, and two in 1985. No commercial discoveries have been made.

Electricity Boards (Meter Reading)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will introduce legislation to remove the right of electricity boards to enter consumers' homes for the purpose of reading their meters without their prior consent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: No. Electricity boards must have the right to inspect meters at reasonable intervals to ensure that estimated readings are in line with actual consumption and that the equipment is in good condition. Boards exercise their right of entry for this purpose as infrequently as possible. In all cases of entry, boards are required to apply for a warrant of entry from a justice of the peace who needs to be satisfied that the application is justified.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Foreign Prisoners (Repatriation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the number and nationality of foreign prisoners who have been repatriated since the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984 was implemented;

(2) how many foreign prisoners are currently in staging establishments awaiting repatriation.

Mr. Mellor: Applications for repatriation have been received from 19 prisoners in England and Wales. These will be transmitted to the other Governments concerned for consideration, in accordance with the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons. One of the prisoners concerned is located in Wandsworth prison, which is a "staging establishment" for the purpose of repatriation, but in no case have the transfer arrangements yet been set in train.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of foreign prisoners, by nationality, who are eligible for repatriation under the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984 currently in prison.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information relates to prisoners held in prison department establishments on 30 June. Prisoners are eligible for repatriation if they are nationals of one of the countries which has ratified the Council of Europe convention of the transfer of sentenced persons, and have at least six months of their sentences excluding remission still to serve on the date the convention came into force between the United Kingdom and their country. From central records, which are approximate, it is estimated that on 30 June 1985 the numbers of eligible prisoners were: Sweden 1, France 11, USA 33, Spain 16, Canada 16.

Prison Work

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the underlying reasons why prison workshops have been under-utilised, and whether these reasons are being considered by the prison industries review teams.

Mr. Mellor: The reasons for under-utilisation of prison workshops are many and often interrelated. Among the main causes are changes in the population and regime at some establishments, including local prisons and youth custody centres, together with competing pressures on the staff resources available. In addition, a number of workshops in the engineering, plastic, woodwork and concrete industries are competing for a supply of work which is inadequate to justify the level of manufacturing capacity in these industries. The prison industries review teams are taking detailed account of these aspects.

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what acceptable alternatives to useful employment in prison are being considered and what are the likely manpower and cost implications.

Mr. Mellor: The review of prison industries announced on 12 July 1985 is charged with examining how the present network of industrial workshops could be rationalised, while retaining the existing level of work and related activity for inmates. A primary aim is to increase the utilisation of remaining workshops. Alternatives to industrial work will vary from establishment to establishment, but include such activities as construction industry and vocational training and education, including physical education. The main objective of the review is to deploy the present considerable resources to better effect, but until the review is completed it is not possible to assess the likely manpower and cost implications. My right hon. Friend will announce the outcome of the review in due course.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of prison workshops at each London prison now closed due to a lack of workshop instructors.

Mr. Mellor: No precise figures can be given. Prison workshops may be closed for a day or part of a day because of the redeployment of uniformed staff, including instructors, to other duties, often arising from court commitments. These vary from day to day.

Prison Rule 43

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which prisons in the United Kingdom take only prisoners on rule 43.

Mr. Mellor: There is no establishment which accommodates only prisoners subject to rule 43 of the prison rules for England and Wales.

Prisons (Property Purchases)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of properties purchased by his Department in each of the last five years for use by prison officers working in each of the London prisons.

Mr. Mellor: Ten properties were purchased in 1980-81. No properties have been purchased in subsequent years.

Prison Officers (Removal Expenses)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the financial allowances paid to prison officers towards removal expenses when being transferred to another prisom.

Mr. Mellor: A prison officer who is compulsorily transferred from one prison to another beyond daily travelling distance is entiteld to claim reimbursement of all costs necessarily incurred in moving his home.

Gareth Wheelon

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why 15-year-old Gareth Wheelon of Castle Bromwich, who was sentenced to six months youth custody by the Solihull court on 6 August, was detained initially for eight days in Her Majesty's prison, Winson Green.

Mr. Mellor: Under the terms of the Criminal Justice Act 1982 a juvenile sentenced to youth custody may be detained for a temporary purpose in a prison. This includes allocation, which was the purpose in this case.

Metropolitan Police (BBC Broadcasts)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how many times, in the last six years, the Metropolitan police have asked the British Broadcasting Corporation to withdraw or amend a broadcast.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the Metropolitan police provide frequent advice and assistance to broadcasters on matters with which the force is concerned. A specific request to withdraw or amend a programme would be made only if the Metropolitan police had reason to believe that the programme would be prejudicial to the course of justice or to police operations, or was factually inaccurate. No central record is kept of such requests. Final decisions on programme content are a matter for the broadcasting authorities alone.

Leonie Price (Murder)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the arrangements for liaison between the various police forces engaged in the investigations into the murder of Leonie Price.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. Full liaison exists between Suffolk, Norfolk and Essex police with additional assistance from other forces to computerise the investigation incident room. Detective Chief Superintendent Shields of Suffolk constabulary, who is in overall command of the inquiry, has received training in the handling of investigations of this kind, developed following the Byford review of the Yorkshire ripper investigation.

Italian Terrorists (Deportation)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to his answer of 25 July, Official Report, column 663, he now intends to take any action to deport Roberte Fiore and four other Italians who have been convicted of terrorist offences in Italy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have nothing at present to add to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Home Secretary at column 663 on 25 July, but I am keeping these cases under review.

Immigration

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of arrivals in the United Kingdom from (a) Bangladesh, (b) India, (c) Pakistan and (d) Sri Lanka detained by the immigration authorities in each week during the past three months.

Mr. David Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Metropolitan Police (CS Gas and Plastic Bullets)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many and which occasions in the last 12 months CS gas and plastic bullets have been drawn for use by the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 44]: I regret that my earlier reply was inaccurate in stating that authority for the operational use of CS gas for public order purposes had never yet been given in the Metropolitan police district. In fact, as my reply to the immediately following question made clear, the commissioner gave authority for both CS and baton rounds to be used in Tottenham on 6 October.

TRANSPORT

Motorways (Safety Fencing)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the types of safety fencing currently used on motorways, particularly on central reservations; and if he has any plans to improve them.

Mrs. Chalker: I am generally satisfied with the types of safety fences used on motorways, including central reservations, and have no immediate plans to change them. As with many aspects of roads and road safety, the Department has a programme of research and development on safety fences that may lead to changes in the future.

EC (Driving Licence)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the implementation of the European Communities' directive of 4 December 1980 on the introduction of a Community driving licence (80/1263/EEC).

Mr. Michael Spicer: In compliance with the requirements of directive 80/1263/EEC, since 1 January 1983 we have been issuing equivalent exchange licences to EC licence holders becoming resident here. Britain already complied at that date with the directive's requirements on minimum driving test and medical standards.

The directive also requires member states to issue their national driving licences in a Community model format from the start of next year. Accordingly, Community-style British licences are being issued to run from 1 January 1986. But they are only to be issued to those applying for a new full licence or those whose existing licences need to be replaced. Existing green licences will continue to be valid both here and in other countrieds which recognise British licences.

The new licences are pink and carry on the front the internationally recognised "GB" symbol. Beneath the symbol the words "driving licence" appear in the various Community languages and also the words "EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES Model".

The driver and vehicle licensing centre at Swansea will continue to be responsible for issuing licences. Driving licence vehicle groups remain unchanged and provisional (learner) licences will still be green. Supplementary licences will still be needed to drive heavy goods and public service vehicles.

Apart from these specific requirements, the directive looks towards the further harmonisation of driver licensing within the European Community, and the United Kingdom is currently involved in discussions in Brussels on this subject.

Roads

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport by how much capital expenditure on roads exceeded or fell short of planned levels in each of the past five years.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are as follows:

	£ million		Variation
	plan	outturn	£ million	per cent.
Trunk Roads Capital Expenditure
1980-81	487	473	−14	3

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport by how much current expenditure on roads exceeded or fell short of planned levels in each of the past five years.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are as follows:

Vehicle Registration

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make a statement over the future of the vehicle registration number prefix system.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are currently carrying out a review of the impact of the August change in the year identification letter on the driver and vehicle licensing centre's system. If the review indicates that an alternative would enable us to make savings and improvements, we shall then consult all the main interests concerned.

Tachographs

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many visits have been made by representatives of the traffic commissioners or his Department to local long distance coach operators to check bus tachographs; and what action has been subsequently taken.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Airports (Duty-free Sales)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will undertake a study of the safety implications of providing duty-free sales at airports of arrival rather than airports of departure.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Civil aviation safety matters are the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. My chief inspector of accidents has advised there is no evidence that the carriage of alcohol in aircraft passenger cabins has jeopardised survival in any survivable aircraft accident. However, this aspect will be considered in the investigation into the Manchester tragedy.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if any assessment has been made of the effect on the revenue of the British Airports Authority of providing duty-free sales at airports of arrival rather than departure;

(2) if any assessment has been made of the effect on the income of the British Airports Authority of offering duty-free goods in both departure and arrival lounges.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The restrictions of duty-free sales to departing passengers reflects an international Customs convention. The effect on the British Airports Authority's income of offering duty-free goods to arriving passengers would depend on the extent to which other international airports made such a change.

Road Accidents (Public Inquiries)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to introduce a system of public inquiries when public service vehicles are involved in serious accidents similar to that which occured on the M6 on Monday 21 October.

Mrs. Chalker: Serious road accidents — including those involving public service vehicles — are already subject to thorough investigation by the police and, as necessary, by vehicle examiners from my Department. I am satisfied that present procedures are sufficient to establish the factors involved and any lessons which can be learnt.

Taxis and Hire Cars

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to seek powers to regulate drivers' hours of work in respect of taxis and hire cars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have no such plans, as there is no evidence of safety problems caused by taxi or hire car drivers' hours of work. Although many taxi drivers work quite long hours, their working day, unlike that of a bus driver, is generally interspersed with long periods of rest.

Clause 12 of the Transport Bill allows licensed taxi operators to obtain PSV operators' licences and to register local services under the new system the Bill is to introduce. In such cases, taxi drivers would be subject to public service vehicle drivers' hours rules. But for normal taxi or hire car services, or for the shared use of taxis or hire cars under clause 10 or 11 of the Transport Bill, we see no need for such control.

Motor Cycles (Noise)

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to seek to limit noisy motor cycles.

Mr. Ridley: We are pressing in the Community for stricter standards of permitted noise from new motor cycles. Regulations introduced last year require replacement silencers for motor cycles first registered from the start of this year to be marked to show compliance with a British standard. This will apply progressively to an increasing number of motor cycles in use, and should help enforcement against noisy motor cycles.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon Fisheries

Mr. Onslow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he has made into his study into the economic evaluation of salmon fisheries in England and Wales.

Mr. Gummer: Work has commenced on the study referred to in my predecessor's reply to my hon. Friend of 20 July 1984, which has been commissioned from Exeter university. It will consider evidence from the whole of Great Britain, and a report is expected in about two years.

Lead Core Lines

Mr. Onslow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is his intention that the draft model water authority byelaws, to be made under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975, should apply to lead core lines.

Mr. Gummer: It is our intention to include within the scope of the draft model byelaw all forms of lead weights used in fishing for salmon, trout, freshwater fish or eels which could cause harm to swans if ingested by them. We are examining the question of lead core lines raised by my hon. Friend, and I will reply to his recent letter as soon as we have completed our examination.

DEFENCE

Territorial Army

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those Territorial Army exercises in which members of the United States National Guard have been involved.

Mr. Stanley: Members of the United States National Guard exercise regularly with the Territorial Army as part of the routine exchange training programme.

In 1984 United States National Guardsmen were attached to Territorial Army units who participated in exercise Lionheart.

This year some National Guardsmen took up attachments with individual Territorial Army units for their annual camp.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of Defence if he will list those Territorial Army exercises in which members of the Bermuda armed forces have been engaged.

Mr. Stanley: None, so far as our records show.

Ministry Houses

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the letter of 30 August from the right hon. Member for Brent, East and the reply of 30 September from the Minister of State for Defence concerning empty Ministry of Defence houses.

Mr. Stanley: I have placed copies of the correspondence in the Library.

Salvadorean Officers (Training)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of Defence what training facilities are being provided for Salvadorean army officers at Sandhurst.

Mr. Stanley: There are no members of the Salvadorean armed forces currently under training in the United Kingdom.

HMS Redpole

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the defects apparent in HMS Redpole after its refit in Lowestoft; how many weeks the refit took; and what is the cost of the refit.

Mr. Norman Lamont: HMS Redpole was converted from RAF to RN use at Lowestoft. The conversion took 31 weeks, including sea trials. The cost of this work is commercially confidential. Following sea trials it was decided that the propellors—which had not formed part of the conversion package — should be replaced at Rosyth dockyard. In addition, some 29 defects were reported, some of them very minor. It would not be appropriate to disclose details of defects in an operational ship. The responsibility for rectifying these defects is a matter for negotiation.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will explain why royal dockyard employees were not given full information on the reasons why they were required to do extra work on HMS Redpole.

Mr. Norman Lamont: During sea trials of HMS Redpole, following conversion at a commercial yard, a problem with its propellers—which had not formed part of the contractor's work package—came to light. It was decided that this should be rectified at Rosyth dockyard and dockyard employees were informed through a standing dockyard committee of the work that they would be required to undertake. Although there is work to be done on other operational defects, this will be carried out by the Royal Naval Fleet maintenance group at Rosyth and will not involve the dockyard.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the cost of additional work on HMS Redpole at Rosyth naval dockyard; and to whom it will be charged.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Rosyth dockyard is carrying out work on the propellers of HMS Redpole. This work was not part of the contract specification in the ship's recent conversion and the costs will fall to my Department in the usual way.

Royal Dockyards

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what basis private contractors are visiting the royal dockyards.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In his statement on 23 July, at columns 867-68, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that he intended to seek competitive tenders from competent British companies to manage the royal dockyards. Representatives of most of the companies which have expressed interest in tendering have now visited one or both of the royal dockyards and have received detailed briefings on their operations; further such visits will be arranged.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence under what authority, prior to the passage of any legislation, he is incurring expenditure in the valuation of dockyard assets, the preparation of prospectuses for private companies, and visits by private companies to the dockyards.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Provision to cover necessary expenditure involved in consideration of changes to the future operation of the royal dockyards was included in the defence Supply Estimates.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will deposit in the Library part two of the prospectus for private contractors interested in winning a possible franchise for the management of Rosyth and Plymouth dockyards.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Touche Ross, a firm of management consultants, was commissioned by the Ministry of Defence to produce descriptive reports on each of the royal dockyards to assist companies in forming a commercial judgment on whether to bid for the future management of the dockyards. Phase I of the Touche Ross report, which gives a preliminary view of the facilities and operations in the dockyards, has recently been completed; copies have been made available to all companies concerned and to the trades unions, and I am placing a copy in the Library of the House. Phase II of the report has not yet been completed. It is, however, the intention that it should provide a more comprehensive description of the facilities and it will, therefore, be classified. Copies will, of course, be made available to the Select Committee on Defence.

Airspace Violations

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Soviet penetrations of United Kingdom airspace there were in 1984; and how many so far in 1985.

Mr. Stanley: There have been no penetrations of United Kingdom territorial airspace by Soviet military aircraft in 1984 and 1985. If my hon. Friend is concerned with the United Kingdom air defence region, which principally comprises international airspace out to a considerable distance from the United Kingdom mainland, the detailed figures on penetrations are classified. In general terms they average approximately three to four a week, but rise significantly during periods of major Soviet exercise activity.

Reserve Army

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will consider plans for further expanding the role of the Reserve Army in such a way that regular strength can be replaced.

Mr. Stanley: I presume my hon. Friend is referring to Regular Reserves, that is, those individuals who, having left the Regular Forces, retain a Reserve commitment. Their numbers are not therefore subject to direct Ministry of Defence control. However, we are anxious to achieve the most effective use of these personnel and have therefore recently introduced various measures to that end.

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the police inquiry into the disappearance of the control room log of HMS Conqueror revealed the commission of any disciplinary offences by any member of the crew; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Police reports submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions are confidential to him and are not disclosed to other Government Departments. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) on 30 November 1984, at columns 593-94, the board of inquiry convened by the Commander-in-Chief Fleet on 25 October showed that the proper procedures for the custody and disposal of confidential control room logs had not been followed in HMS Conqueror for many months, including the period from April to September (inclusive) covered by the missing logs. Disciplinary action against those responsible for breaches of the regulations will now be considered.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any part of the control room log of HMS Conqueror is still missing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Neither the Metropolitan police nor naval inquiries were able to locate the missing documents. The control room logs for HMS Conqueror for the period April to September 1982 are still missing.

Marchwood Military Port

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any discussions have taken place with civilian ports authorities to consider the option of contracting for existing civilian berth spaces rather than deepening the facilities at Marchwood military port.

Mr. Stanley: Other United Kingdom ports, both naval and civil, have been considered over the years as possible substitutes for Marchwood; but all have fallen unacceptably short of our requirements in one or more ways.

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any contract has been placed to deepen and improve facilities at the Marchwood military port near Southampton.

Mr. Stanley: Tenders have been invited in respect of certain work, including dredging the waterfront, but no contract has yet been let.

Personnel (Benefits)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the armed forces are at present in receipt of (a) housing benefit and (b) free school meals for their children.

Mr. Stanley: The service rent and rates rebate scheme, which is analogous to local authority housing benefit, is available to eligible personnel living in service married quarters or official hirings. Currently some 1,450 personnel are claiming rebates under this scheme. The Ministry of Defence holds no information on personnel accommodated other than in married quarters or official hirings and claiming housing benefit through their local authority scheme.

Information on the provision of free meals to children attending service schools is not held centrally, but the number is not thought to be great. The Ministry of Defence holds no information on the provision of free meals to those children of personnel who attend local education authority or other non-service schools and who represent the great majority.

Service Men (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of non-commissioned rank in each of the armed services over the past three years who, on completing 12 years' service, have left the service; how many applied to do a further 10 years; and how many were refused re-engagement.

Mr. Stanley: The information requested is set out in the following table:

		1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
	Royal Navy†
a.	Number eligible to terminate service at 12 year point	156	163	240

* No information is centrally available on numbers of applications and refusals for the Royal Navy

† No 12 year engagement exists in the Royal Marines.

‡ No formal 12 year engagement exists in the Army.

Servicemen enlisted since May 1972 do not have to apply to continue their service to the 22 year point.

Those enlisted prior to May 1972 who did not change to the new terms may exit at the 12 year point but otherwise are committed to a further 3 years service.

However, the Army may terminate a man's service under QR 9.413 at the 12 year point.

The details cover artificers (excluding old style "mechanicians"), communications technicians and medical technicians at Servicemen on 12 year engagements only.

Devonport Dockyard

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much capital investment has been made in the Devonport royal naval dockyard over the last 10 years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Capital investment, in terms of plant and machinery and buildings, has been about £119 million at Devonport royal naval dockyard over the last 10 years.

Rosyth Dockyard

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much capital investment has been made in the Rosyth royal naval dockyard over the last 10 years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Capital investment, in terms of plant and machinery and buildings, has been about £44 million at Rosyth royal naval dockyard over the last 10 years.

HMS Otter and Euryalus

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what parts of the refit programme for HMS Otter and HMS Euryalus which were originally to be carried out by the contractor have been subsequently carried out by naval personnel.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No part of the refit of HMS Otter, originally to be carried out by the contractor, has subsequently been carried out by naval personnel. Only two small items of the refit programme for HMS Euryalus forming part of the original contract—repacking a valve and cleaning a gauge glass—have been carried out by naval personnel. Appropriate adjustments will be made for payments for this work.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was the original cost of the refit contract to HMS Euryalus;

(2) what was the original cost of the refit contract to HMS Otter;

(3) what is the latest estimated cost of the refit contracts for HMS Otter and HMS Euryalus.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This information is commercially confidential.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the original dates for the completion of the refit contracts for HMS Otter and HMS Euryalus; and what are now the expected completion dates.

Mr. Norman Lamont: HMS Euryalus is shortly to complete her refit, which will have taken 48 weeks. This is seven weeks more than the original planned time, but includes four weeks addition for further work added after planning. Work on HMS Otter started in December 1984 with a planned duration of about two years. This remains the case.

PAYMASTER GENERAL

Youth Training

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how many representations he has received concerning the combining of mode A and B youth training schemes.

Mr. Trippier: By the end of September 1985 over 500 replies had been received to the paper "Development of the Youth Training Scheme — Some Issues for Consideration," which was issued by the Manpower Services Commission in April. The responses showed overwhelming support for the unification of funding and administration in the new two-year scheme.

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how many people entered youth training schemes in each of the local authority districts in Hampshire; and how many completed the scheme in both modes A and B for the last two years.

Mr. Trippier: The table gives details by mode of young people entering and completing the youth training scheme in each local authority district of Hampshire during 1983-84 and 1984-85. The figures for completions in 1984-85 include a number of young people who started training in 1983-84 and finished their course in 1984-85. Similarly, many young people entering schemes in 1984-85 will not complete their training programme until 1985-86.

† The figures quoted for completions exclude young peole who left schemes before completing their full entitlement to training.

Small Firms (Loans)

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General (1) what was the number of small firm loans applied for and granted in (a) Hampshire and (b) Portsmouth for each year from 1979 to the present;

(2) what was the number of small firm loans applied for and granted in England and Wales, respectively, for each year from 1979 to the present.

Mr. Trippier: The loan guarantee scheme for small firms was introduced in 1981. I have listed the number of guarantees applied for and granted under the scheme from 1981 to the present.

Hampshire and Portsmouth are included in the south-east region for statistical purposes. A further geographical breakdown is not available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General what was the percentage of married women in work (a) full-time and (b) part-time in each year since 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is available from the census of population and labour force surveys and is therefore restricted to the years shown in the following table:

‡ Source: 1981 Census of Population.

§ Source: Labour Force Surveys.

Mr. Wareing asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures for Merseyside.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As we all know, the level of unemployment in Merseyside is much too high. That is why there is an extensive range of Government assistance to attract new investment and new jobs. The area will also benefit from the current expansion of our special employment and training measures. But the creation of jobs in Merseyside will depend primarily on the overall attractiveness of the area to potential investors and the competitiveness of local industry.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Harland and Wolff

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is, in money terms and as a percentage of the Northern Ireland Office's budget, the amount of support given to Harland and Wolff for each year since 1979.

Dr. Boyson: The following table sets out the payments made to Harland and Wolff plc under the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries (Northern Ireland) Order 1979 each year since 1979-80 and the percentage which that assistance represents of the total Northern Ireland public expenditure programme for those years:

	£ million	Percentage

1980-81	41·2	1·4
1981-82	40·1	1·3

Security Forces (Co-operation)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) whether, in the light of the recent statement of the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, that the Gardai in the Republic of Ireland had to reduce their resources for the penetration and monitoring of terrorist groups, he remains satisfied with the co-operation between the security forces of the Irish Republic and the Royal Ulster Constabulary in the apprehension and conviction of members of the Irish Republican Army and the Irish National Liberation Army; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether the recent statement by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary on security accurately represents (a) Her Majesty's Government's policy towards cross-border co-operation between the British and Irish security forces and (b) Her Majesty's Government's assessment of the effectiveness of that co-operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Armagh Prison (Strip Searches)

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, in view of the removal, in the near future, of all the high security women prisoners in Armagh prison to Maghaberry prison, he will make it his policy to discontinue strip searching in Armagh prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: No. The search procedures used at Armagh are similar to those used in comparable prisons throughout the United Kingdom and, to the best of our knowledge, in most western European countries and in north America.

Women Prisoners

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland where women prisoners on remand and short sentence women prisoners will be held following the closing down of Armagh prison.

Mr. Scott: When Armagh prison closes, all women prisoners in Northern Ireland will be held in the new women's prison at Maghaberry.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dentists

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of dentists holding National Health Service contracts in each region in England.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of general dental practitioners in contract with family practitioner committees in each region in England on 30 September 1984—the latest date for which figures are available—are set out in the following table:

Regional Health Authority	No. of GDPs
Northern	705
Yorkshire	954
Trent	1,054
East Anglian	518
North West Thames	1,507
North East Thames	1,199
South East Thames	1,231
South West Thames	1,191
Wessex	843
Oxford	747
South Western	1,112
West Midlands	1,270
Mersey	657
North Western	1,078

Note

A dentist practising in more than one FPC area has been included in the area in which the major part of his or her work (in the quarter ended 30 September 1984) was carried out.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many full and part-time dentists have been in practice in each year since 1955; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Dental Treatment

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many courses of treatment where full dentures were needed were given to patients over the age of 65 years in the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available;

(2) how many patients over the age of 65 years received National Health Service dental treatment in the last year to a convenient date.

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of courses of treatment provided to patients aged 65 and over in England in 1984 was 1,782,510. Of these, the number of treatments involving the provision of full or partial dentures was 341,640; the number of courses involving provision of full dentures is not known. Information on the number of patients involved in these courses of treatment is not available.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the percentage of treatment costs borne by the average patient in the general dental service since April, excluding examinations and other exempt items of treatment.

Mr. Hayhoe: This information is not yet available.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients received dental treatment in each year since 1955; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Gas and Electricity (Disconnections)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that his Department extends to all cases its current practice of informing local authority social services departments about gas or electricity disconnections only where young children are involved.

Mr. Major: Where a fuel board has notified the DHSS local office of its intention to disconnect a supplementary benefit claimant's fuel supply, and this cannot be avoided by paying part of the claimant's supplementary benefit direct to the fuel board, staff are instructed to inform the local authority social services department. This applies to all such cases and not just those involving young children.

Toxocara Canis

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of toxocara canis have been recorded in the last three years.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mammography Tests

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to provide through the National Health Service regular X-ray mammography tests for all women over 35 years.

Mr. Hayhoe: My right hon. and learned Friend the then Minister for Health announced on 2 July that the Government were establishing an expert working group to consider the information now available on breast cancer screening by mammography and advise on policy options. The chairman has been asked to report as soon as possible.

Cervical Cancer Screening

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he proposes to seek to persuade more women in high risk categories to obtain cervical cancer screening.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish his guidance to doctors on severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased to say that we have published a handbook of guidance for adjudicating medical practitioners on severe disablement allowance. The handbook was issued last year in draft form to various voluntary organisations representing disabled people, and has been revised in the light of the many helpful and constructive comments they have made. I have arranged for copies of the handbook to be placed in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Rates

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend the Rating and Valuation (Scotland) Act 1956;

(2) if he has any plans to review the system of rating of sporting land.

Mr. Ancram: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Re-Chem Plants

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what efforts have been made by his officials and by the various investigations into the operation of Re-Chem plants to seek to acquire, from ornithological and wildlife societies and their members resident in central Scotland, any evidence of unusual or unexplained morbidity and mortality among wild birds and animals within a radius of 20 miles from Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, for the period 1975 to the present.

Mr. John MacKay: When the group chaired by Professor Lenihan was set up, it advertised its formation and invited interested persons and groups to submit evidence. The group's report did not draw attention to any unusual or unexplained morbidity or mortality among wild birds and animals. Moreover, since 1973 the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has undertaken investigations of animal mortality through the operation of its wildlife incident investigation service at agricultural scientific services, East Craigs. This service has actively sought and received the co-operation of many public and private organisations concerned with animal welfare and wildlife conservation throughout Scotland.

Toxic Wastes

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to seek to establish that no river, burn or subterranean water-course in central Scotland has been polluted by toxic wastes.

Mr. Ancram: The necessary provisions already exist. River purification boards have a statutory duty to exercise functions for the prevention of pollution of surface and underground waters, including control of the discharge of toxic wastes.

NATIONAL FINANCE

PAYE

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any variations from normal national instructions on assessing of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers have been authorised or condoned in any of the Inland Revenue tax offices working to set up the computerised COP system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Districts working to set up the computerised COP system follow the normal national instructions on assessing of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers. However, the period during which assessing work is normally carried out may be varied in particular tax offices to fit in with the setting up timetable. No other variations have been centrally authorised.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a list of the Inland Revenue regions in which any variation from normal national instructions on assessing of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers has been authorised or conducted in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Temporary local variations in practice may occur from time to time in tax districts, but except in relation to the setting up of the COP system no variation from normal national instructions on assessing of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers has been authorised centrally in the past three years.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a list showing, for each Inland Revenue region, the number of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers not assessed or otherwise cleared for (a) the most recent year ended 5 April and (b) all earlier years, in October of each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The following table shows details of the number of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers in each Inland Revenue region not assessed or otherwise cleared for (a) the most recent 5 April and (b) earlier years, in October of each of the last three years. The Inland Revenue is concerned at the present level of these arrears and is taking all possible steps to improve the position.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a list showing, for each Inland Revenue region, the total number of items of post in tax offices (a) over 14 days old and (b) over two months old, in October of each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The following table shows details of unworked papers in each Inland Revenue region for the last there years. The Inland Revenue is concerned at the present level of these arrears and is taking all possible steps to improve the position.

Inland Revenue (Staff)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will describe the duration and cost of training (a) a tax officer and (b) a tax officer higher grade.

Mr. Moore: A tax officer undergoes an initial course of training lasting about 11 months. The cost of this training — including salary and overhead costs — is estimated at about £3,000.

A tax officer (higher grade) undergoes a course of training lasting about 23 months. The cost of this training —including salary and overhead costs—is estimated at about £7,500. A tax officer (higher grade) employed on management duties can be nominated for a one-week management course costing about £500.

VAT

Mr. Dykes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount of value added tax in money terms collected by United Kingdom authorities in 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. Gow: The figures are as follows:

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Liquidations

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms have gone into receivership or liquidation in each year since 1979 and in 1985 to the latest available month, in Coventry, the west midlands and nationally.

Mr. Howard: The information relating to insolvencies that is available is given in the table:

	Bankruptcies			Company Liquidations
	Coventry County Court	County Courts in West Midlands Region	Total England and Wales	England and Wales
1979	18	264	3,500	4,537
1980	27	325	4,038	6,890
1981	28	370	5,151	8,596
1982	43	492	5,700	12,067
1983	60	619	7,032	13,406
1984	68	700	8,229	13,721
1985*	47	450	5,033	10,753

* To September.

The bankruptcy figures cover all individuals and partnerships; receiving orders, administration orders and deeds of arrangement are included. Approximately three quarters of all bankruptcies relate to unincorporated businesses. Figures for bankruptcies after 1 October 1984 are not comparable with earlier periods because of changes in monetary limits on bankruptcy proceedings and deposits on petitions. Company liquidations include both compulsory and creditors' voluntary liquidations. Figures of company liquidations are not analysed by area.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will update the figure for the United Kingdom share of trade in manufactured goods in 1984 and give the figure for 1985 in the table set out in his written answer to the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Arnold) on 15 November 1984, Official Report, column 304.

Mr. Channon: The figures are 7·6 per cent. for 1984 and a provisional estimate of 7·7 per cent. for the first half of 1985.

Car Imports

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he estimates that a United Kingdom market of around 1·8 million vehicle sales per year is sufficient to sustain the growth in car imports, principally from Spain and Comecon countries, together with the growth of Nissan's United Kingdom produced product line and the expanding production of other United Kingdom car manufacturing companies.

Mr. Butcher: We consider that there is plenty of room both for fully competitive existing United Kingdom manufacturers to increase their market share and for a Nissan plant producing British cars with a high level of local content.

Allied Lyons

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the proposed takeover of Allied Lyons by Elders IXL; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The proposed merger is currently being considered by the Office of Fair Trading. My right hon. Friend will announce his decision as soon as practicable.

Companies (Foreign Subsidiaries)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many subsidiaries of British companies have been set up abroad for the periods 1974 to 1979 and 1979 to 1984, respectively.

Mr. Howard: The information is not available.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why three under-secretary posts at the Export Credits Guarantee Department are occupied by non-career civil servants from the private sector; and if he will state their previous experience.

Mr. Channon: This is not the case. There are no non-career civil servants at under-secretary level in ECGD. But I intend that some appointments by secondment from the private sector should be made in due course, as I told my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) on 24 July 1985 at column 570. An advertisement for one under-secretary post has appeared recently.

Overseas Trade (Support and Promotion)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the sums spent by his Department at constant prices on overseas trade support and promotion for each of the past seven years.

Mr. Channon: The following figures show gross and net expenditure by the British Overseas Trade Board in constant price terms:

	£ million (September 1979)
	Gross expenditure	Net expenditure
1979-80	25·7	21·2
1980-81	19·8	16·1
1981-82	19·2	15·2
1982-83	20·8	16·3
1983-84	20·5	15·3
1984-85	*24·5	*18·7
1985-86 (Budget)	24·0	16·9

* Expenditure on publicity and promotion was transferred to the BOTB budget from the CoI with effect from 1984-85. On a constant price basis the expenditure amounted to £1·5 million in 1984-85.

British Telecom

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will institute a departmental inquiry into all the aspects of the circumstances of the British Telecom share flotation, with particular reference to the extent to which members of underwriting firms were able to avoid the rules limiting the number of shares available to any individual by dealing in the shares in their own names once the shares had been issued to their firms.

Mr. Pattie: No.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what basis members of Kleinwort Benson dealt in British Telecommunication shares on their own account at the time of the flotation; and to what limit of total shareholding they were each restricted.

Mr. Pattie: I refer to the answer my hon. Friend gave on 22 March at column 641. Kleinwort Benson employees participated through the public application and allocation arrangements.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a list of the firms with which British Telecom shares were placed at the beginning of the offer period; and if he will specify how many shares each firm underwrote.

Mr. Pattie: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

PCW Syndicates

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to seek to bring about a resolution of the difficulties at Lloyd's arising from the losses recorded by the PCW syndicates and their successors.

Mr. Howard: This is a matter for the numerous parties involved. However, I am keeping in touch with the Lloyd's authorities about any developments.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to seek to ensure adequate provision in the accounts of firms at Lloyd's which may have contingent financial obligations arising from a settlement of the dispute arising out of the losses sustained by the PCW syndicates and their successors.

Mr. Howard: None. In so far as any such provision may be found necessary, the amount to be provided is a matter to be determined by those concerned in conjunction with their auditors.

Directors (Prosecutions)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in how many cases the official receiver acting as liquidator has recommended that charges be brought against directors for either (a) criminal offences and (b) misfeasance and breach of trust in each of the years since 1979 to the latest date available.

Mr. Howard: Details of reports submitted by official receivers alleging criminal offences and of prosecutions undertaken are given in the annual reports laid before both Houses of Parliament under section 451 of the Companies Act 1948 (now section 729 of the Companies Act 1985) and which are available in the Library of the House. No record is maintained of actions for misfeasance or breach of trust brought against directors by the official receiver when acting as liquidator nor by other liquidators.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in how many cases in each of the years since 1979 to the latest date available charges have been brought by his Department against directors for (a) criminal offences and (b) misfeasance and breach of duty.

Mr. Howard: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Companies (Legal Proceedings)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in how many cases his Department has funded litigation under section 37 of the Companies Act 1967, in each of the years since 1975 to the latest available date.

Mr. Howard: In respect of one company, in 1978.

Companies (Records)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessments he has made of the implications for the discharge of his statutory obligations regarding the regulation of companies and the conduct of company directors of the policy of joint stock banks of destroying records three years after the transactions concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The expression joint stock banks usually means the clearing banks. They are public companies and required to keep their records for six years under section 222 of the Companies Act 1985. There is no reason to assume any widespread disregard of the Companies Act requirements as to the preservation of accounting records.

Leeds Chamber of Commerce (Trade Delegation)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will now instruct the British Overseas Trade Board to withdraw its financial contribution to the Leeds chamber of commerce trade delegation to South Africa.

Mr. Channon: No. I intend to honour the specific commitment we have already entered into in respect of this outward mission, which is due to set out within the next month. But, in line with the agreement reached by Commonwealth leaders in Nassau, the BOTB will not be providing financial support for trade missions to South Africa thereafter.

British Steel Corporation

Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is his intention to invite the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to examine the British Steel Corporation.

Mr. Howard: The British Steel Corporation is in the 1985 programme of investigations by te Monopolies and Mergers Commission under section 11 of the Competition Act 1980.

Citizens Band Radio

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to deal with abuse and unlicensed use of citizens band radio.

Mr. Butcher: In May this year my Department's radio investigation service (RIS) carried out concerted campaigns to counter CB licence evasion and abuse in the Cumbria, Chester, Southampton, Portsmouth, Swindon, Cardiff and Glasgow areas. In 1,200 visits the RIS found widespread abuse and licence evasion and took appropriate action ranging from warnings to seizing equipment with a view to court proceedings.

In the areas in which the campaigns took place there has been a noticeable drop in the level of licence abuse. The number of CB licences issued has since increased by 7 per cent. compared with a decline of 6 per cent. in the country as a whole. I am greatly encouraged by these results and have instructed the RIS to carry out similar campaigns throughout the country.

In 1985 to the end of September 714 offenders were prosecuted and convicted for CB related offences. The average level of fine was £73 with average costs of £30 awarded against offenders. In 462 cases, the courts ordered forfeiture of the equipment.

Serious degradation of the CB service is caused by the use of offensive and threatening language and the jamming of channels by the playing of music. In the heavy penalties awarded the courts have recognised the serious nature of such conduct. On the most recent cases in which offensive language or playing music was the initial reason for the RIS taking enforcement action, the level of fines has been some 50 per cent. higher than for other cases. Individual fines have ranged up to £200 and in one case a persistent offender received a nine months' suspended prison sentence.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Assembly (Consultations)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why he agreed at the intergovernmental EEC conference to consultation with the European Assembly before any proposals were finalised for the EEC summit meeting in December.

Mr. Rifkind: The European Parliament was consulted about convening the intergovernmental conference in accordance with article 236 of the EEC treaty. We have agreed to keep the Parliament informed of progress in the conference and to report to it the outcome.

Elena Gurevich

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make further representations to the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics about Elena Gurevich; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We have made clear on numerous occasions our concern at the refusal of the Soviet authorities to allow Jewish and other Soviet citizens who wish to leave the Soviet Union to do so. I raised this question most recently with Soviet First Deputy Foreign Minister Kornienko during my visit to Moscow in July. We shall continue to press the Soviet authorities to adopt a more reasonable attitude to the question of emigration and family reunification, and shall seek to ensure that the many individual cases involved, including that of Miss Gurevich, are not lost from view.

Rainbow Warrior

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how long after the sinking of the Rainbow Warrior Her Majesty's Government made representations to the French Government on the matter.

Mr. Eggar: The Rainbow Warrior was sunk on 10 July. The French Prime Minister admitted French agents carried out the operation on Sunday 22 September. On 24 September, the British ambassador in Paris delivered a Note to the French Foreign Ministry drawing attention to the fact that the Rainbow Warrior was a British ship and urging swift compensation. A similar Note was handed to the French ambassador in London on 25 September. Representations to the French Government would not have been justified while the facts were unclear and the matter was still under investigation.

Foreign States (Recognition)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria regarding the use of violence in the pursuit of political objectives Her Majesty's Government apply in deciding whether to recognise foreign states.

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend may wish to refer to a written answer of 25 April 1980, at column 277, which confirms that we recognise states in accordance with common international doctrine. In considering whether to recognise states we take into account all available information and all relevant factors.

Visas

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans within the European Economic Community to harmonise approaches to the need for and the issuing of visas to other countries.

Mr. Rifkind: The report of the People's Europe Committee to the European Council in March 1985 called for work to be put in hand on the definition and gradual application of a common visa policy. The matter is also referred to in the Commission's White Paper on the internal market and is now under discussion.

Northern Ireland (Border Security)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Government of the Republic of Ireland following the recent statement of the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary alleging that the lack of priority given by the Dublin Government to security enabled terrorists to organise, plan and stage attacks on Northern Ireland from just across the border; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: On 21 October the Secretary of the Irish Department of Foreign Affairs conveyed to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Dublin the Irish Government's serious concern at press reports of a lecture given by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Houston, Texas. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was able to assure the Irish Government after investigation of the matter that the Chief Constable had been seriously misrepresented.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 28th October 1985

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Private Prosecutions

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General if he will list all instances of private prosecutions taken over by the Director of Public Prosecutions in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement on general policy followed in taking over such prosecutions.

The Solicitor-General: In deciding whether to exercise his powers under section 4 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1979 in relation to a prosecution instituted by a person in a private capacity, the Director of Public Prosecutions first considers whether the evidence is sufficient to justify continuation of those proceedings. Where the evidence is sufficient in this respect, he considers whether the continuation of the prosecution would be in the public interest and whether that same public interest requires him to intervene and assume responsibility for it. In exceptional circumstances he will intervene to discontinue proceedings which appear to be vexatious or constitute an abuse of process.

The director adopts the same approach when considering a request for intervention made after a conviction has resulted (that is to conduct any appeal) but in such circumstances he takes into account that the public interest requires that ordinarily convictions properly recorded by the criminal courts should not be allowed bo be quashed simply for want of prosecution.

The director does not keep statistics specifically relating to interventions under section 4 of the 1979 Act but there have been at leust three such cases in the last three years. The defendants were:

Gary Austin (St. Albans Crown Court)
Eric Miller (Maidstone Crown Court)
Royal College of Surgeons (Croydon Crown Court on appeal from Bromley Magistrates Court).

Duty Solicitor Scheme

Mr. Dobson asked the Attorney-General what plans he has to implement the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 with regard to the creation of a Londonwide duty solicitor scheme.

The Solicitor-General: We intend that a duty solicitor scheme covering the whole of England and Wales should come into force on 1 January 1986, at the same time as the relevant provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The Lord Chancellor has invited the Law Society to proceed with the arrangements to make the scheme uniformly effective as soon as possible.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Mason asked the Attorney-General if he will list the trade union consultative meetings that have taken place with the Council of Civil Service Unions and others on the proposals to establish an independent Crown prosecution service; if he is satisfied that all consultative procedures have been followed; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: In 1985 my officials have had formal meetings with a combined trade union side, consisting of representatives of the Council of Civil Service Unions and the National and Local Government Officers Association, on the following occasions:

26 February
19 March
28 March
23 April
14 May
13 June
9 July
6 August
3 September
1 October

In addition there have been meetings with individual trade unions at national and local level and with other representive bodies, but these are too numerous to list.

I am satisfied that officials have consulted to the maximum extent practicable within the confines of the timetable necessary to ensure establishment of the Crown prosecution service prior to the abolition of the metropolitan county councils.

In addition my right hon. and learned Friend and I have had discussions on a number of occasions, both formal and informal, with representatives of the staff of existing prosecuting solicitors departments, most recently on 11 September and 8 October, when I received delegations from the Prosecuting Solicitors Society of England and Wales and the Crown prosecution service trade union group respectively.

Mr. Mason asked the Attorney-General to what extent he has given assurances to the trade unions and prosecuting solicitors that their future prospects and salaries will be secured under the independent Crown prosecution service; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: My right hon. and learned Friend has assured the staff of existing prosecuting solicitors departments and their representative bodies that the staff who will serve in the Crown prosecution service will be remunerated on a basis that should ensure that they provide the high standards that will be required.

It is the Government's intention, as has consistantly been reflected in what my right hon. and learned Friend has said in his discussions with representatives of the staff of existing prosecuting solicitors departments, that career prospects in the new service should also be such as to attract and retain staff of the necessary calibre.

On 30 March 1984 my right hon. and learned Friend told a meeting of the Prosecuting Solicitors' Society that its members' career prospects would be enhanced by reason of the larger total requirement of the new service for qualified prosecutors.

Mr. Mason asked the Attorney-General whether he will delay the implementation of the independent Crown prosecution service, especially the transfer regulations timetable affecting the metropolitan counties, until satisfactory assurances regarding the future of their grades, salaries and resident offices have been agreed with prosecuting solicitors and other officers in the six provincial areas; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: It is intended to establish the service in the present six metropolitan counties and the county of Durham on 1 April 1986. It would not be in the public interest or the interests of the staff affected to subject prosecution arrangements in the metropolitan areas to two separate disturbances. Discussions on each of the matters referred to in the right hon. Member's question and on related matters are currently taking place between officials of the Director of Public Prosecutions and the relevant representative bodies, with a view to arrangements which will suffice to attract and retain staff of the requisite quality.

Mr. Mason asked the Attorney-General what assurances have been given to the South Yorkshire county prosecuting solicitors' department working at Barnsley magistrates' court that no further upheaval in transfers of men and offices will take place when the independent Crown prosecution service is established.

The Solicitor-General: No assurances have been give. To be efficient, effective and economical the Crown prosecution service will need to be structured on a system of area and branch offices. Moreover, it is desirable that, as soon as practicable, it should be housed in accommodation separate from the police. All changes will be affected with proper consideration for the interests of the staff concerned and, where appropriate, after consultation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Dispute

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in detail his latest proposals to the teachers involved in the present dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: Offers of pay increases for school teachers are made by the management panel of the Burnham primary and secondary committee. The last formal offer was made in that committee on 12 September and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House. The offer was constructed on the Government's willingness to see an extra £1,250 million spent on teachers' pay over the next four years in order to develop a new career and promotion structure and to clarify the range of teachers' professional duties. In addressing these objectives the offer proposed:

(i) the creation of an extra 70,000 promotions, associated with a restructuring of pay scales, from September 1986;

(ii) an increase of £480 or 5 per cent. for all teachers from 1 April 1985;

(iii) the merger of scales 1 and 2 from 1 September 1985, providing an additional increment at that date for those on the maximum of scale 1;

(iv) a further 1 per cent. increase for all teachers from 1 November 1985; and

(v) an additional increment for all teachers on the maxima of scales 2, 3, 4 and the senior teacher scale from 31 March 1986.

The average increase during the year would have been nearly 6 per cent. and the average increase by the end of March 1986 would have been just over 8 per cent. From September 1986, all new teachers would have received a starting salary of £7,035 a year and all teachers would have been able to progress, even without promotion, to a salary of £10,000 a year or about £2,000 more than that now available for those on the scale 1 maximum. By the same date head teachers and their deputies would have received increases amounting to about 18 per cent. in most cases. This offer was rejected by the teacher unions after just 20 minutes consideration. Developments since that rejection were outlined in my statement to the House on 22 October at column 152.

Academic Staffs

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many academic staff in universities, polytechnics and higher education colleges have been (a) made redundant or (b) taken early retirement, since 1979; and what these figures represent as a percentage of the total academic staff for each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The number of academic staff in British universities made redundant or taking early retirement since the scheme started in 1981-82 is 3,317. This represents 7·7 per cent. of the 1979-80 staff, 7·5 per cent. of the 1980-81 staff, 7·6 per cent. of the 1981-82 staff, 7·7 per cent. of the 1982-83 staff and 7·7 per cent. of the 1983-84 staff.

Since 1979 the number of polytechnic teachers in England and Wales who had applied under the premature retirement scheme was 1,784. If this is expressed as a percentage of the full-time staff in each financial year from 1978-79 to 1983-84, the percentages are 10·6 per cent., 10·5 per cent., 10·6 per cent., 11·0 per cent., 11·2 per cent., and 11·5 per cent. respectively.

Redundancies and early retirements for staff in other colleges engaged in higher education cannot be separated from all other further education staff.

Students (Statistics)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applications were made by mature students for entry to courses in higher education for each of the last 10 years; and how many were accepted.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of applicants and acceptances, for students aged 21 and over through the Universities' Central Council on Admissions scheme, have been as follows:

	Applicants	Acceptances
1975	22,034	8,680
1976	25,648	9,159
1977	27,296	9,415

Similar figures for public sector higher education are not available.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the number of overseas students studying in higher education in European Economic Community states, the United States of America and Japan, and the percentage they represent within the indicated student population as a whole.

Mr. Brooke: The data requested are shown in the following table:

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many new enrolments of (a) full and (b) part-time students in colleges and institutes of advanced further education in England, excluding polytechnics, have occurred in each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of first-year enrolments of full-time and part-time students on advanced courses in colleges and institutes of further education in England for the period from 1979 to 1984 (the latest date for which figures are available) are as follows:

First year enrolments on advanced courses in public sector establishments (excluding polytechnics) England; 1 November each year.

Notes:
1. All figures relate to total student numbers i.e. home, EC and overseas students.
2. All figures have been rounded to the nearest 10.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applications there have been for places on postgraduate certificate in education courses in each of the last five years for which figures are available, in total, and broken down into the following categories (a) primary phase, (b) secondary phase, (c) mathematics and science and (d) arts.

Mr. Chris Patten: Applications to postgraduate courses of initial teacher training as registered by the clearing houses are as follows:

	1981 final figures	1982 as at 20 October 1982	1983 as at 5 October 1983	1984 as at 24 October 1984	1985 as at 16 October 1985

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many university applicants there were in each of the last 20 years; how many candidates were finally accepted in each of those years; and what the acceptance rate represents as a percentage of applications for each of those years.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of applicants and acceptances through the Universities' Central Council on Admission scheme have been as follows:

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in (a) British universities and (b) polytechnics have met or are currently meeting the full cost of tuition fees at the home rate, at both undergraduate and postgraduate level, for each of the last five years.

Mr. Brooke: Information is not available in the form requested. It is estimated that only about 1 or 2 per cent. of home students in higher education are not in receipt of mandatory or discretionary awards.

Teaching Staff

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teaching staff were employed in higher education in May 1979 and for each year since.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of teaching staff in British universities and in public sector higher education in England since 1978-79 are as follows:

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many engineering undergraduates there are expected to be in universities in the academic year 1985-86; and how this compares with each year since 1979;

(2) how many mathematics and computer undergraduates there are expected to be in the academic year 1985-86; and how this compares with each year since 1979.

Overseas Students (Fees)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recommendations have been issued about fees for overseas students, non-EEC, on courses of further and higher education in the academic year 1985-86.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's policy is that overseas students who began their courses on or after 1 September 1980 should pay fees that cover the cost of their education here, but it is for individual institutions and authorities to determine the fees that they charge such students in accordance with the Government's policy and in the light of their own particular circumstances. The University Grants Committee has however recommended that universities should charge at least the following minimum fees to such overseas students during the current academic year:

Arts courses	3,310
Science courses	4,350
Clinical courses in medicine, dentistry and veterinary science	8,050

Similarly, the Council of Local Education Authorities has recommended that local authority institutions should charge at least the following minimum fees to such overseas students:

Advanced courses	3,310
Non-advanced courses	1,820

School Admissions

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, for each local education authority, how many admission appeals have been made to education appeals committees for (a) the voluntary and (b) the state sectors under the provisions of the Education Act 1981; how many applicants have been successful in their appeals; and how many cases have subsequently been referred to the Commission for Local Administration on grounds of maladministration by the local education authority involved, in each year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

School Buildings

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to improve school buildings, in the light of the statement by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools in its recent expenditure survey that the state of school buildings are a cause of growing concern.

Mr. Dunn: It is for local authorities themselves to determine repairs and maintenance priorities in the light of local needs and circumstances. We have made clear our view that this area should be given priority within the resources available. The Government's plans for local authority expenditure on education for the current year provide scope for some improvement in the level of provision for repairs and maintenance, provided costs can be contained and feasible savings made elsewhere. In order to help authorities make the best use of the resources available, the Department published in March this year guidelines for determining maintenance priorities and for setting up cost-effective maintenance programmes.

Schools (Hygiene)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department concerning (a) the standards of hygiene in school cloakrooms and (b) outbreaks of dysentery in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The standard of hygiene in cloakrooms of schools which are maintained by a local education authority is a matter for that authority. While my right hon. Friend is aware of a small number of outbreaks of dysentery in schools in recent years, the Department does not collect information on either subject. Advice on all aspects of health and hygiene in relation to their schools is available to education authorities from their district health authority and local environmental health officer.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement concerning the Government's present position on the use of corporal punishment in schools, in the light of European Court judgments.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government are considering the appropriate course of action to take in the light of the decision not to proceed with the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill this Session announced on 23 July 1985 at column 863.

REPLAN Scheme

Mr. Frank. Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has yet received advice from the Department steering committee for the adult unemployed on whether the REPLAN scheme should be extended beyond 1987.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on Friday 25 October 1985 at column 263. In reaching his decision my right hon. Friend will of course take account of any views which the programme's steering committee put to him.

Plant Breeding Station, Aberystwyth

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether a final decision has been reached about the future work of the plant breeding station at Aberystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Welsh plant breeding station at Aberystwyth is an institute of the Agricultural and Food Research Council (AFRC), which receives a grant-in-aid from the Department's science budget.

I understand that the AFRC is shortly to publish a statement of forward policy based on its long-term view discussion paper and subsequent consultation. The council is committed to supporting a strong research programme at the Welsh plant breeding station relating to the needs of livestock and grassland enterprises of the wetter west of Britain. The station will make a major contribution to the council's integrated research programme for the animal production and grasslands sector.

I understand that the AFRC expects to make a grant of £3·01 million to the Welsh plant breeding station for recurrent expenditure in 1986-87. This compares with £3·09 million in the current year and takes account of the reduced needs of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for commissioned research in 1986-87.

I understand further that the director expects fully to maintain current work on hills and uplands, nitrogen fixation, nutrient cycling and basic developmental studies of grass and clover. There will however be reductions in strategic research on crop physiology and grass cytogenetics, as well as in commissioned research.

The reductions are likely to cause 25 posts to be lost at the station, some of which may involve compulsory redundancy.

Liverpool Polytechnic

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of funding of Liverpool polytechnic.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend accepted the national advisory body's recommendation that £19·003 million (including £150,000 selective assistance for research) from the advanced further education (AFE) pool for 1985-86 should be allocated to Liverpool city council in respect of Liverpool polytechnic's recurrent expenditure. In addition £1·36 million for polytechnic building projects and £1·49 million for AFE equipment were included in the city's allocation of prescribed capital expenditure.

School Places

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by how much the number of secondary school and primary school places has fallen in each year since 1974; and what are his current targets for reductions in 1985, 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Dunn: Latest targets for the removal of surplus places in primary and secondary schools were published in the public expenditure White Paper, Cmnd. 9428: the target for the period April 1975 to March 1985 was 790,000 places accumulating to over one million places by March 1987. A separate target for March 1986 was not published. The reduction in the numbers of primary and secondary school places in the years for which the information is available are as follows:

'000 places

	Primary	Secondary	Cumulative total
April 1975 to June 1978	47·0	26·8	73·8
July 1978 to December 1979	47·3	18·1	139·2
1980	63·2	18·8	221·2
1981	128·5	43·9	393·6
1982	111·2	37·6	542·4
1983	102·3	55·1	699·8
1984	88·4	66·9	855·1

Funding (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of funding for schools in the maintained sector in Liverpool.

Mr. Dunn: As with any local education authority, it is for the city of Liverpool itself to determine the level of funding of its education service consonant with its statutory responsibilities.

Higher Education (Green Paper)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his meeting with the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals in Leicester at the end of September; and what representations were made to him during that meeting about his Green Paper on higher education.

Mr. Brooke: I am sending the hon. Member a copy of the talk which my right hon. Friend gave at the meeting on 26 September and a copy has been placed in the Library. The vice-chancellors welcomed what my right hon. Friend said and then exchanged views and information with him and myself about the proposals in Cmnd. 9524 and other matters. We have a much better understanding of each other's concerns as a result.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Computers in Schools

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the uptake of his Department's schemes to put microcomputers and peripheral equipment in secondary and primary schools and what further plans he has for seeking to extend computer literacy in schools.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department has run three schemes over the last four years to help schools buy computers and related equipment; 6,511 secondary schools and 27,407 primary schools have received help towards the purchase of computers and related equipment under the schemes, representing over 95 per cent. of those eligible.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry, in reply at column 453-54 to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 23 July, announced additional support of £3·5 million for local education authorities and independent schools to enable them to buy more educational software. That scheme will begin on 1 January and full details have been sent to those concerned. My Department will also be continuing to take a close interest in other developments in educational computing and will consider further steps as appropriate.

Intermediate Assisted Area Grants

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many west midlands firms have benefited under the intermediate assisted area grant scheme to date, how many extra employees have been taken on as a result, and what is the average cost per new employee.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Since the designation of intermediate area status on 29 November 1984, 158 applications have been approved for regional selective assistance totalling £18·020 million towards projects costing £159·271 million in the west midlands. Of these approvals, some 148, with an offer value of £12·773 million, are for projects creating 4,711 new jobs.

Pirate Radio

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial, manpower and other resources are currently allocated by his Department for the detection, surveillance and prevention of pirate radio broadcasting.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Shipbuilding and Marine Engineering Industries

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's shipbuilding and marine engineering industries.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Greater London Enterprise Board

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set up an inquiry under section 14 of the Companies Act 1985 into the affairs of the Greater London Enterprise Board and the London Enterprise Property Company.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. and learned Friend has the power to investigate the affairs of companies under the provisions of section 431 and section 432 of the Companies Act 1985. He also has more limited powers under section 447 of the Companies Act 1985.

The police are already making inquiries concerning the affairs of these companies and I see no reason to exercise these powers at present. I will, however, keep the situation under review and consider any further information the hon. Member has about these companies.

Iran (Car Kits)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what special support is being provided for the contract between Peugeot Talbot Motor Company and Iran for the sale of car kits.

Mr. Channon: For many years the Export Credits Guarantee Department has been insuring sales to Iran under this contract which is vital to the operation of the Peugeot Talbot plant in Coventry. Exceptionally ECGD has provided cover in advance of the issue of irrevocable letters of credit. My right hon. and learned Friend has decided that ECGD should continue such cover for a further period and for a limited amount to enable the contractors to renegotiate the terms with their buyers in such a way as to speed up the flow of letters of credit.

Anti-piracy

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received from the United States trade authorities a copy of the Singapore draft law on anti-piracy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: We are aware that the Singapore authorities have drafted legislation and we have asked them for a copy because we would wish to make them aware of our views. Any discussions with the United States authorities on this issue are a confidential matter.

Copyright

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his response to the representations from the Talking Newspaper Association to the Green Paper on the recording and rental of audio and video copyright material.

Mr. Butcher: We hope to publish soon a White Paper setting out our proposals for reform in the whole field of copyright law, taking account of the representations that we have received from the Talking Newspaper Association.

Indonesia

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give details of the volume and value of goods entering into trade between the United Kingdom and Indonesia during the years 1982 to 1984, inclusive, and the first half of 1985.

Mr. Channon: Volume trade figures for individual countries are not available. The value of goods traded between the United Kingdom and Indonesia during the years 1982 to 1984, and the first half of 1985, is as follows.

United Kingdom trade with Indonesia

£ thousand

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has now received British Shipbuilders' corporate plan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: British Shipbuilders submitted its plan in late July. I am placing in the Library a version with commercially confidential information deleted. As last year, the Government accept the broad thrust of the proposed strategy, which is to continue to concentrate resources on a stable cost-effective mainstream merchant shipbuilding business. The pursuit of this strategy in 1984-85 enabled the corporation to reduce its trading loss on activities administered by BS during the year to £25 million and to achieve its new order target for merchant ships of some 200,000 compensated gross tonnes.

The corporation accepts the importance of continuing to improve its performance in the marketplace which will determine its ability to win new orders and to operate effectively within the framework of tight and degressive levels of Government financial support. Within that framework, British Shipbuilders' original forecast contained in the plan was that its level of new orders this financial year would be similar to last year's. But conditions in the shipbuilding market have recently deteriorated and British Shipbuilders now believes that it is unlikely to be able to win this level of orders. I have asked the corporation to keep the situation under review.

British Shipbuilders is continuing to privatise the warship building yards with the aim of completing all the sales by 31 March 1986.

PRIME MINISTER

Geological Surveying

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply, 19 July, Official Report, column 285, when she expects to receive a copy of the report to be submitted to the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council and Advisory Board for the Research Councils about geological surveying in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I understand that the chairmen of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils (ABRC) and the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) expect the study group to submit its report to them about nine months after it starts work. Thereafter it will be for the ABRC and the NERC to decide what action to take on the report's recommendations; if they see fit to make a submission to the Government it would be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I have placed in the Library a copy of the NECR's press notice of 17 October which gives the study group's membership and terms of reference.

Pharmaceutical Patents

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of Social Security on the problems of pharmaceutical patents arising out of the Patents Act 1977; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I am satisfied that there has been full consultation between the two departments on the questions raised by the pharmaceutical industry in connection with the Patents Act 1977. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has offered to meet representatives of the industry to discuss the matters which concern them.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister (1) what has been the total cost for Chequers in each of the past six years;

(2) how much has been spent on 10 Downing street in each of the past six years in respect of (a) total running costs, (b) staffing, (c) repairs and maintenance, (d) decoration, (e) furniture and (f) rates.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to the Lord Privy Seal's reply, 21 October 1985, c. 11]: It is not possible without disproportionate expense to allocate costs between 10 Downing street and Chequers or to provide the historical analysis of costs other than for staff.

The total costs to public funds of the Prime Minister's Office, including Chequers, in the last six years are:

*Cost at outturn prices

Year (April to March)	£
1979-80	1,409,101
1980-81	1,744,824
1981-82†	2,415,301
1982-83	2,699,752
1983-84‡	3,026,042
1984-85	3,648,073

*Includes grant-in-aid to the Chequers trust, salaries and wages, pension liability and administration costs, but excludes the salary of the Prime Minister, messengerial and cleaning services, and any allowance for accommodation until 1983-84 when the property repayment scheme was introduced.

‡Following the abolition of the CPRS, the policy unit in the Prime Minister"s Office was strengthened by four staff. In the last full year of its existence (1982-83) CPRS employed 35 people and cost £1,109,000. Thus, while the cost of the Prime Minister's Office increased as a result of the abolition of the CPRS, substantial net overall savings were made.

†The increase in cost between 1980-81 and 1981-82 reflects the change in the basis of charging by MOD for aircraft used by the Prime Minister, and the introduction of repayment for the Service staff at Chequers, previously provided as an allied service.

The annual costs of staffing 10 Downing street in the last six years are:

*Cost at outturn prices

Year (April to March)	£
1979-80	760,814
1980-81	901,608
1981-82	1,015,095
1982-83	1,042,817
1983-84	1,146,674
1984-85	1,355,173

*Includes salaries, wages, and notional superannuation costs.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister how much has been spent by her office on foreign travel in each of the past six years.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to the Lord Privy Seal's reply, 21 October 1985, c. 11]: The expenditure by my office on foreign travel in each of the last six years was:

*Cost at outturn prices

Year†	£
1979-80	154,453
1980-81‡	141,824
1981-82	557,634
1982-83	538,877
1983-84	228,934
1984-85	434,006

* Because of billing delays the above figures do not necessarily reflect the costs of travel undertaken during the year against which they are shown.

† April to March.

‡ The increase in cost between 1980-81 and 1981-82 reflects the change in the basis of charging by MOD for aircraft used by the Prime Minister.

WALES

Local Government Act 1966

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what payments have been made under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 to local authorities in Wales during the financial years 1983-84 and 1984-85, and for what specific purposes these grants were paid.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Responsibility for approval and payment of grants under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 lies with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. In 1984-85 the Home Office made provisional payments of £57,657·75p in respect of 1983-84 and £99,281 in respect of 1984-85 towards the establishment of 28 posts in South Glamorgan county council — (16 English second language teachers, 1 community tutor, 3 part-time adult instructors, 3 social workers, 2 social worker assistants, 1 clerk/typist, 1 ethnic minority librarian, 1 senior administrative assistant.) A further three posts (2 senior personal assistants and 1 higher clerical assistant) were approved in July 1985. Approval was also given to Cardiff city council in May 1985 for the appointment of a race and housing advisor, and a clerk/typist. No grant has been paid to date towards these appointments.

Parrot Corporation

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether, pursuant to his announcement of an internal investigation into the Welsh Development Agency's handling of its investment in the Parrot Corporation, he is yet in a position to give further details of that investigation.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The investigation will be carried out by Mr. Douglas Baker, chairman of Touche Ross & Co. Mr. Baker's terms of reference are:

"to examine the Welsh Development Agency's handling of its investment in the Parrot Corporation and the Agency's supervision of its investment having special regard to the provisions of the WDA Act 1975, the investment guidelines laid down by the Welsh Office and the WDA's own investment manual; and to report to the Secretary of State".

The investigation will begin immediately and I will report further to the House in due course.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Secretarial and Research Allowances

27. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent representations he has received about secretarial and research allowances; and if he will make a statement.

29. Mr. Boyes asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent representations he has received about secretarial and research allowances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have answered a number of parliamentary questions and have discussed the matter with an all-party delegation.

Research Assistants

30. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent change has been recorded in the number of research assistants employed in the House.

Mr. Biffen: Since 1 May the number of photo-identity passes on issue to Members' research assistants has fallen from 469 to 466.

Early-day Motions

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent change has been recorded in the numbers of early-day motions tabled.

Mr. Biffen: The numbers of early-day motions tabled over the last five Sessions have been as follows:

	Numbers
1980-81	631
1981-82	716
*1982-83	502
†1983-84	1,058
1984-85	‡934

* Short session.

† Long session.

‡ Up to summer recess.

Positive Vetting

Mr. Bermingham asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed as representing the House of Commons Commission how many of the officers and staff of the House have been positively vetted; and if he will state the number vetted in each grade of employment.

Mr. Beith: No officers or staff of the House have been positively vetted for the purposes of their employment in the service of the House.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Lord Privy Seal if any of the privileges of membership of the Lobby are dependent on the journalists concerned of (a) the broadcasting media or (b) the press having been positively vetted.

Mr. Biffen: No.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

International Fund for Agricultural Development

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the most recent discussions which have taken place with the United States of America in relation to present and future funding of the international fund for agricultural development.

Mr. Raison: The United States took part in the last formal discussion in IFAD on funding the organisation which took place from 16 to 18 May. No agreement was then reached on the second replenishment. We are, of course, in regular touch with the United States on this problem.

Sub-Saharan Africa

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government propose regarding the special programme of aid for sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Raison: I have nothing to add to the answer given on 24 June at column 273 to the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas).

THE ARTS

Publishers (Aid)

Mr. Freud asked the Minister for the Arts if he will list in the Official Report (a) the overall levels of support from the Arts Council to publishers and (b) the amounts given to each grant-aided publisher in each of the last three years and the projected grants for the forthcoming year; and what is the percentage change in each case.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Merseyside

Mr. Wareing asked the Minister for the Arts if he will outline the provision for the funding of the arts in the county of Merseyside from 1 April 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

CIVIL SERVICE

Complaints Procedures

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the proposal for an independent body to investigate complaints by serving civil servants about alleged politicisation of the Civil Service put forward by Sir Douglas Wass.

Mr. Luce: Sir Douglas Wass's article does not appear to make a proposal along the lines suggested by the hon. Member.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

South Africa

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will detail, for each year since the inception of the EEC code of conduct for European firms operating in South Africa, how many companies in which the Church has investments were shown by the returns to the Department of Trade and Industry not to have fully complied with the code; and what action was taken.

Sir William van Straubenzee: Detailed information is not available for the whole eight-year period. In the last three years all United Kingdom companies have satisfied the commissioners either that they have complied with the code, or are making progress in that direction; although in four cases correspondence is continuing.

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many companies in which the Church has investments have been approached by the commissioners in each year since the inception of the EEC code of conduct for European firms operating in South Africa in respect of their returns to the Department of Trade and Industry on non-compliance with the code.

Sir William van Straubenzee: Detailed information is not available for the whole eight-year period, but since 1983 the following initial approaches have been made to companies:

1983: 14
1984: 21
1985: 12 (to date)

In many cases, these initial inquiries have led to subsequent correspondence or discussion with company management.

Investment Policy

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will name the persons on the commission staff who have the responsibility of monitoring the Church's portfolio to ensure that companies abide by the EEC code of conduct.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The responsibility for this matter, as with all matters relating to the commissioners' business, rests with their secretary, Mr. J. E. Shelley.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Contraception

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, in the light of the House of Lords judgment on the Gillick case, he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the prescribing by doctors in Northern Ireland of contraceptive devices or drugs to girls below the age of consent.

Mr. Needham: In its 1975 memorandum of guidance on family planning services the Department of Health and Social Services advised that, in the case of young persons, consideration be given to the desirability of seeking parental consent to any proposed contraceptive treatment having regard to the Age of Majority Act (Northern Ireland) 1969. This advice is still in effect and there are no plans at present to change it. It is, however, intended to review all the advice on contraception issued in Northern Ireland taking account of the House of Lords' judgment and the views expressed on this matter.

Security Forces (Co-operation)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) whether, in the light of the recent statement of the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, that the Gardai in the Republic of Ireland had had to reduce its resources for the penetration and monitoring of terrorist groups, he remains satisfied with the co-operation between the security forces of the Irish Republic and the Royal Ulster Constabulary in the apprehension and conviction of members of the Irish Republican Army and the Irish National Liberation Army; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether the recent statement by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary on security accurately represents (a) Her Majesty's Government's policy towards cross-border co-operation between the British and Irish security forces and (b) Her Majesty's Government's assessment of the effectiveness of that co-operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985, c. 282]: It is now clear that the Chief Constable's recent lecture to a gathering of professional police officers in the United States on the subject of border terrorism in an international context was seriously misrepresented in the media. While the Chief Constable expressed concern at the scale of resources available to the Gardai, he paid tribute to the Gardai, saying specifically that it was an excellent force of fine men; that the Royal Ulster Costabulary and the Gardai had a good relationship along the border at working level; and that there was no lack of will by the Gardai to combat terrorism. It is regrettable that an unreliable report should have led to so much unnecessary controversy.

We appreciate the co-operation which already takes place between the security forces on both sides of the border, and the Government intend to take every opportunity to improve it still further.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sugar Beet

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out the acreages used for the growing of sugar beet within the European Economic Community for each of the last 10 years and the tonnage of sugar produced for the same periods.

Mr. Jopling: The information available is as follows:

Year (October—September)	Area of sugar beet in the European Community ('000 Hectares)	*Beet sugar production in the European Community ('000 tonnes white sugar)
1975-76	1,887	9,656
1976-77	1,916	10,009
1977-78	1,803	11,472
1978-79	1,796	11,721
1979-80	1,800	12,230
1980-81	1,805	11,978
1981-82	2,026	14,711
1982-83	1,839	13,633
1983-84	1,663	10,740
1984-85†	1,733	12,211

Source: EC Commission.

* Includes non-quota sugar production which must be exported outside the EC without export refunds or carried forward to count towards the following year's quota production.

† Provisional.

University Funding

Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the effect on university funding of his expressed hope that the reductions in the agricultural research budget in each of the next two years will be replaced by funds from industry and private research funding bodies; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have received no such representations.

Agricultural Research

Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the reduction in the agricultural research Vote of £10 million for 1986-87 and £20 million for 1987-88 he estimates will be replaced by industry and private research funding bodies, respectively.

Mr. Jopling: Consultations are in progress with all sectors on the arrangements by which the industry might contribute to the future funding of research and development from which it benefits. At this stage it is not possible to indicate what the proportion of funds coming from different sources will be.

Severe Weather Aid

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is yet in a position to respond, in a practical manner, to the representations which have been made to him by the National Farmers Union for financial aid to the farming industry in the light of the winter weather crisis in certain areas of Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on Thursday 24 October 1985, at column 258, to the hon.

Top Management Information Systems

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is now able to make available the 1985 returns of his top management information systems.

Mr. Jopling: I am pleased to say that a copy of the 1985 MINIM returns, which cover the objectives and resources used by the Ministry's programmes, has today been placed in the Library of the House.

ENERGY

Electricity Prices

12. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the average increase in (a) domestic and (b) industrial electricity prices over the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Electricity tariffs increased on 1 April 1985 by an average of 4·3 and 4·9 per cent. for domestic and industrial consumers, respectively. For four years electricity prices have risen less than the rate of inflation.

"New Community Energy Objectives"

13. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what response he has made to the European Commission document COM(85)245 entitled "New Community Energy Objectives."

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State welcomed the Commission's draft paper at the Energy Council on 20 June, but emphasised the need for further careful consideration.

British Gas Corporation

14. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Gas Consumers Council, he will discuss with her the proposed privatisation of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I meet the chairman of the National Gas Consumers Council from time to time and discuss with her matters of current interest.

Coal Industry

15. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next proposes to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the future of the coal industry.

17. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of the National Coal Board frequently to discuss all aspects of the industry, including future strategy.

Energy Conservation Year

16. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many staff in the energy efficiency office are employed directly on preparations for Energy Conservation Year in 1986.

Mr. Peter Walker: The entire staff of the energy efficiency office will, of course, be involved in Energy Efficiency Year 1986. However, within the office a special team has been created to ensure that planning of the year is co-ordinated and that information about events and initiatives in the year is properly disseminated. In addition, the team is supported by regional energy efficiency officers.

Nuclear Power Stations

18. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board, he will raise with him the building of further nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB has stated that it does not intend to make any application for new power stations (nuclear or otherwise) until the outcome of the Sizewell inquiry is known.

National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd.

19. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the achievements to date of National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd.

21. Mrs Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd. in providing alternative jobs in mining areas affected by pit closures.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes).

Anti-Nuclear Campaign

20. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to counteract the anti-nuclear campaign related to energy from nuclear power.

Mr. Goodlad: Ministers have frequently indicated the importance we attach to the safe and economic development of nuclear power; and will continue to do so.

Heating Systems

22. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans or financial incentives he has to encourage the changeover from district heating systems to individual heating systems.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no plans to encourage changing from district heating to individual heating systems.

Offshore Oil and Gas Construction Industry

23. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what action he proposes to take to stimulate the growth and export potential of the offshore oil and gas construction industry.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Since 1980 the United Kingdom offshore oil and gas construction industry has won an average 82 per cent. share of a domestic market now worth nearly £650 million a year. This year I have approved 16 new oil and gas projects, and there has been a record response from the oil and gas companies in the ninth round of licensing.

Redundant Mineworkers

24. Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration he is giving to assist those mineworkers who are being declared redundant, yet, because they have not paid their national insurance contributions for 12 months, are likely to lose unemployment benefits and entitlements from the redundant mineworkers' pension scheme; if he will liaise with the National Coal Board to find a solution to this problem; whether he will consider introducing a buy-back benefits scheme; and if he will make a statement.

25. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to introduce amendments to the mineworkers' redundancy payment scheme to cover payments to miners who are made redundant in 1986.

Mr. David Hunt: I am considering whether changes to the present legislation governing the redundant mineworkers payments scheme would be appropriate given the failure of some mineworkers to pay sufficient national insurance contributions during the strike to qualify for unemployment benefit during benefit year 1986.

Gas and Electricity (Standing Charges)

Mr. Eric Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the revenues of the gas and electricity industries, respectively, is derived from standing charges on domestic consumers.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is estimated that in 1984-85 standing charges represented about 9 per cent. of the total revenue of the British Gas Corporation and about 6 per cent. of the total revenue of the electricity supply industry.

NCB Works, Tredomen

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has received or is aware of any proposals for new investment in, or further development of, the National Coal Board engineering works at Tredomen, Ystrad Mynach.

Mr. David Hunt: Tredomen Engineering Ltd. is a company owned by the NCB's wholly owned subsidiary NCB (Ancillaries). The NCB tells me that since 1982, some £700,000 has been invested in modern production facilities at Tredomen, including robotic welding equipment and computer controlled machine tools. It is for the board or its subsidiaries to decide on further investment.

Polkemmet Colliery

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the results of his study of the West Lothian district council evidence to the Cooper committee on the non-recovery of Polkemmet colliery.

Mr. David Hunt: I wrote to the hon. Member on 31 July about the evidence submitted by West Lothian district council. The council subequently sent my right hon. Friend a copy of the inquiry's report and he wrote to it on 16 September.

Decisions on the future of individual pits are central to the management of the coal industry and must be for the National Coal Board in consultation with the unions. The unions have the opportunity to appeal against the proposed closure of Polkemmet through the colliery review procedure.

TRANSPORT

Speed Limits

26. Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to make temporary speed limits on motorways mandatory.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to make the temporary advisory speed limits on motorways mandatory; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: No. There is no evidence that mandatory speed limits are any more effective than temporary advisory speed limits even where these are used in circumstances where the need for reduced speeds is immediately apparent. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has written to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins).

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is intending to issue new guidelines regarding speed and driving attitudes to users of the fast lane on motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: Full guidance already exists in the highway code and the Department's manual "Driving"; it is regularly supported by widespread publicity. The messages are simple: "keep to the speed limits; use the correct lane; keep your distance". Drivers are advised that the third lane is for overtaking only and should be referred to as the overtaking lane and not by any other name.

Freight Charges

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information is available about him to the relative cost of transporting one tonne of freight by road and rail in (i) 1966, and (ii) 1983, expressed as user expenditure per tonne at 1983 prices.

Mrs. Chalker: The only available estimates are for total users' expenditure on road and rail freight and for tonnes moved by each mode. The table shows estimated average costs per tonne and per tonne-kilometre at 1983 prices, but such simple expenditure comparisons between road and rail give a misleading picture of the comparable costs of the two modes because of the different types of freight covered and services provided. Rail freight consists mainly of bulk commodities: full train loads accounting for over 90 per cent. of tonnage in 1983. By comparison road freight is largely concerned with individual loads often of several different commodities for several destinations—bulk commodities accounting for only 30 per cent. of tonnage in 1983.

Comparisons between 1966 and 1983 are also effected by changes in the rail freight operation. In 1966 about 70 per cent. of freight was wagon-load traffic, by 1983 it had fallen to less than 10 per cent. The figures include the effects of taxes and grants.

Estimates of expenditure on road and rail freight: United Kingdom

	Users' Expenditure at 1983 prices (£m)	Tonnes carried (m)	Tonne-kms (bn)	Users expenditure per tonne (£)	per tonne-km (pence)
Road 1966	*15,900	1,680	75	*9·5	21·2
1983	19,200	1,440	103	13·3	18·6
Rail 1966	*1,590	220	25	*7·2	6·4
1983	645	150	17	4·3	3·8

* Inflated using implicit GDP estimates of inflation.
Note: All freight figures include parcels traffic.

Road Planning

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport when contracts will be placed for the M1-A1 link road and when such work is likely to be started.

Mrs. Chalker: Placing contracts for the scheme depends on the outcome of the nine-month public inquiries which ended in June. The Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport will announce their decision as soon as possible after receiving the inspector's report, which is expected to be submitted in the first half of 1986. On present programmes, work could start during 1987.

Local Authority Associations (Consultations)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the ground rules circulated within his Department to ensure adequate consultation with the local authority associations in the light of the judgment in R v. Secretary of State for Social Services ex parte the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Mr. Ridley: No.

Roads

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the amount spent by Staffordshire county council in each of the last 12 years on (a) maintenance and repair of roads and (b) new road building, expressed at constant prices.

Mrs. Chalker: I could only provide the answer at disproportionate cost. My Department does not hold such collated information for individual local authorities. However, expenditure on maintenance (including lighting) and capital (mostly roads) accepted for transport supplementary grant for Staffordshire county council since 1975-76 at constant prices is:

£ million

	Maintenance	Capital
1975-76	17·8	27·6
1976-77	17·6	33·1
1977-78	17·6	23·4
1978-79	18·5	12·6
1979-80	18·5	12·9
1980-81	18·1	10·0
1981-82	16·8	8·6
1982-83	16·3	7·8
1983-84	16·1	9·1
1984-85	16·8	8·7
1985-86	*	*

* Not available at constant prices.

Road Humps

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the policy of his Department as to the introduction of road humps and if he will list his powers to agree to such schemes.

Mrs. Chalker: Road humps are one of a number of measures available to highway authorities for moderating the speed of traffic. Provisions allowing their installation were inserted into the Highways Act 1980 by schedule 10 of the Transport Act 1981. Regulations governing the form and siting of road humps are:

— The Highways (Road Humps) Regulations 1983 SI 1087
— The Traffic Signs General (Amendment) Directions 1983 SI 1086
— The Traffic Signs (Amendment) Regulations 1983 SI 1088.

The Department will shortly be consulting on revised proposals for amendments to these regulations to introduce greater flexibility.

M40

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress being made towards the construction of the M40 extension.

Mrs. Chalker: Work on the Warwick to Wendlebury section of the M40, a substantial part of which is subject to proceedings in the Appeal Court, has been suspended pending the outcome of these proceedings. A draft side roads order for the section between Warwick and M42 at Umberslade, which is not affected by the Appeal Court hearing, was published last March and a draft compulsory purchase order for this stretch is being published on 25 October, with the closing date for objections of 15 November.

The Appeal Court hearing is due to be held on 21 November. Depending on the outcome, arrangements will then be made for a public inquiry into objections to the published orders on the Warwick to Umberslade section, and preparation work on the Warwick to Wendlebury section will resume with a view to publishing the necessary side roads orders and CPOs as soon as possible.

It is hoped to make a further announcement on the remaining section of the M40 between Wendlebury and Waterstock shortly.

Subject to the legal proceedings, and to the subsequent satisfactory progress of the outstanding statutory procedures, work on building the M40 extension could start by around the middle of 1987.

A303 Roadworks

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the estimated cost for the proposed (a) grade-separated junction and (b) temporary splash island on the A303 cross roads at Stoke Sub Hamdon and Martock.

Mrs. Chalker: The proposed road widening incorporating a ghost island would cost about £50,000. It is difficult to isolate the cost of a grade separated junction from the associated costs of improving the present main road to dual carriageway standard, which we are planning as part of a major reconstruction of this stretch of the A303, but the junction and slip roads are likely to account for at least £1 million in this proposed £9 million scheme.

Transport Staff (Assaults)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information and statistics he collects from public transport operators as to the incidence of assaults on members of their staff in the course of their duty and on any subsequent criminal proceedings taken against the alleged assailants.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Bus and Coach Council keeps records relating to bus operators outside London and London Regional Transport does the same for its operations, and have made them available to my Department. The British Railways Board provides me with information on the number of assaults on its employees and individual cases on request.

M6 (Congestion)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider the need to widen the M6 between junctions 30 and 31 in order to avoid congestion.

Mrs. Chalker: I have engaged consultants to study present conditions on this stretch of the M6 and to consider the likely traffic needs now and up to the turn of the century. I expect to receive their report shortly and to announce my decision on what improvement measures need to be taken early next year.

Road Accidents (Fire Hazards)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the inquiry into the recent accident on the M6 will look into ways of reducing fire hazards in road accidents.

Mrs. Chalker: As I have assured the House, when all the evidence is available I shall be looking at every aspect of the accident on the M6 on 21 October to see what lessons may be learnt for the future. We are already looking into the general subject of fire risk in road accidents and, in the case of coaches, we are seeking advice from the fire research station on our proposals that new coaches should meet specified standards for fire retardant material.

Veterinary Services

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any proposals to amend existing regulations to permit animal ambulances or veterinary surgeons attending the scenes of accidents to use emergency flashing lights; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no plans to do so. I shall be sending my hon. Friend very shortly a full reply to his recent letter.

Domestic Air Routes (Competition)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the conditions prevailing on domestic air routes are such as to make competition possible with those airlines currently serving them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I will answer this question shortly.

Drivers' Hours

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will call for the chairman of the Council of Transport Ministers' meeting on 14 November to strike the drivers' hours regulations from the agenda.

Mr. Ridley: No.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will print a list of accident rates per mile of long distance heavy goods vehicle drivers for the five years prior to 1968 and the most recent five-year period for which figures are available, including the total number of accidents in each case, and showing such information as he has as to what proportion were caused by driver error.

Mr. Ridley: I will answer this question shortly.

Air Lanka

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his policy with regard to Air Lanka flying between Manchester international airport and Colombo;

(2) what is his policy with regard to determining the number of seats which Air Lanka is allowed to fill on its aircraft flying between the United Kingdom and Sri Lanka; and if he will agree to an increase in this number;

(3) if he will make a statement about the forthcoming talks between his Department and the Sri Lankan aviation authorities;

(4) if representatives of British Airways will be present at the forthcoming talks between his Department and the Sri Lankan aviation authorities; whether representatives of other British airlines will be present at these talks; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he will undertake to place in the Library an account of the forthcoming talks between his Department and the Sri Lankan aviation authorities as soon as those discussions have been completed.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the prospects of Air Lanka flying direct between Manchester and Colombo.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Sri Lankan authorities have asked for consultations about services on the route between the United Kingdom and Sri Lanka. The British delegation therefore will include representatives of British Airways as the designated British airline.

We shall consider any Sri Lankan proposals for changes in the present arrangements in accordance with the policy set out in two White Papers — "Airline Competition policy" (Cmnd. 9366) and "Airports Policy" (Cmnd. 9542) — recently presented to Parliament by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The discussions themselves will, of course, be confidential. I will, however, place in the Library a copy of any public statement which may be agreed between the delegations and of any statement which I may make about the results of the discussions. I can say that traffic between Sri Lanka and the United Kingdom fell sharply between the years ending 31 March 1984 and 1985 and that this decline is continuing.

Platinum (Price)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will assess the impact of changes in the price of platinum upon the economics of catalytic converters designed for the removal of hydrocarbons and NOx from vehicle exhausts.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that the cost of the platinum group metals that would be used in a three-way catalyst on a typical European mid-sized car is around £25 at current prices. Thus a doubling in the price of these metals would add about £25 to the cost of each catalyst.

British Rail Engineering Ltd.

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library copies of the feasibility studies on the future of BREL which have been submitted to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The BR chairman is keeping us informed of progress on his review of options for the future of British Rail Engineering Ltd. but no feasibility studies on this subject have been submitted to my right hon. Friend.

Scotland

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the feasibility study on the future of Scotrail which has been submitted to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No feasibility study on the future of Scotrail has been submitted to my right hon. Friend.

Channel Link

Mr. Aitken asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the criteria by which he intends to judge submissions on the Channel fixed link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The proposals by promoters of a Channel fixed link, which my right hon. Friend must receive by 31 October, will be assessed in accordance with the invitation to promoters issued by the British and French Governments on 2 April, a copy of which was placed in the Library.

Tachographs

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many visits have been made by representatives of the traffic commissioners or his Department to local long-distance coach operators to check bus tachographs; and what action has been subsequently taken.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 25 October 1985, c. 272]: Separate figures are not kept for checks on tachograph charts for drivers of vehicles operated by local long distance coach operators. My Department's traffic examiners make regular visits to all bus operators to check vehicle and driver records including tachograph charts. Passenger vehicle and driver records are also checked at the roadside and at the ferry ports. In 1984 some 20,747 charts were checked for drivers of passenger vehicles from which 2,224 (10·7 per cent.) offences were reported for further action.

EMPLOYMENT

Unmarried Mothers

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General (1) how many unmarried mothers are classified as unemployed; how many unmarried mothers are registered at job centres; and what these figures represent as a percentage of the total of unmarried mothers;

(2) how many unmarried mothers are in receipt of unemployment benefit; how many are in receipt of supplementary benefit; and what these figures represent as a percentage of the total number of unmarried mothers.

Mr. Alan Clark: According to the labour force survey, in Great Britain in the spring of 1984, there were about 190,000 women who were single, widowed, divorced or separated with dependent children aged under 16 who said they were claiming benefits and therefore included in the unemployment count. This represents about 11·5 per cent. of all such women. Corresponding figures are not available for those registered at jobcentres. About 65,000 of these women—about 4 per cent.—were claiming unemployment benefit while some 120,000—about 7 per cent.—were claiming supplementary benefit only.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress being made towards the implementation of a two-year youth training scheme.

Mr. Trippier: Following consultations with interested parties, the Manpower Services Commission has recently finalised and published details of the main funding and administrative arrangements for the two-year youth training scheme, including transitional provision for ex-mode B1 schemes. During the next few months guidance about the design and content and other aspects of two-year training courses will be issued; and staff in the Manpower Services Commission's area offices will be discussing with potential training providers how they might be involved in the two-year scheme.

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about the proposed funding arrangements for youth training schemes which hitherto have been designated as mode B training schemes.

Mr. Trippier: Under the new two-year youth training scheme, existing mode B1 providers will generally be eligible for the premium rate of funding and so receive £270 per trainee per month, in addition to the managing agent's fee. The provider will continue to get this higher level of funding for as long as the young person remains on his scheme, including those periods when the young person is receiving work experience on an employer's premises. Many current mode B1 providers will also receive transitional funding for 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Jobclubs

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on jobclubs, with particular reference to their funding and terms of reference.

Mr. Alan Clark: The purpose of jobclubs is to coach groups of long-term unemployed people in job finding techniques, provide them with facilities for intensive job hunting, and motivate and support them in looking for work.

The Manpower Services Commission is currently operating 29 jobclubs and I have asked it to expand rapidly, should evaluation confirm the very encouraging results so far, to around 200 by the end of 1986.

Jobclubs are being funded out of existing MSC resources. The majority of jobclubs are housed in jobcentres, and all are run by jobcentre staff.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General if he will give a breakdown by age and sex of the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The table gives the available analysis of those unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over one year as at 11 July 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available.

Long term unemployment—United Kingdom—11 July 1985—Age analysis

17 years	6,179	4,240
18 years	22,375	15,059

50-54 years	95,368	32,609

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General how many persons who have been made redundant are included in the latest unemployment figures; and what criteria are used to determine which redundant persons are included.

Mr. Alan Clark: Separate figures for those made redundant are not available. But according to the labour force survey, in Great Britain in the spring of 1984, about 26 per cent. of the claimant unemployed had had a job within the previous three years and had left their last job because of redundancy or dismissal.

All people made redundant and making claims at unemployment benefit offices are included in the unemployment count while they are signing on, although the payments received may affect their entitlement to unemployment benefit or supplementary benefit.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General why persons in receipt of paid holiday are included in the unemployment figures for the weeks in which they are in receipt of holiday pay; and how many such persons were included in the latest unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: There should be no such persons in receipt of holiday pay included in the monthly unemployment figures.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General how many employed persons who were also classified as sick were included in the latest unemployment figures; how many sick, self-employed persons were included; and in each case, why.

Mr. Alan Clark: According to results of the 1984 labour force survey, there were about 15,000 people who said they were claiming benefits and had a job but were away from it for at last part of the reference week because of sickness or injury.

The number of self-employed people in this category was insignificant. Some people with jobs—for example, those with low paid part-time jobs—may legitimately claim benefit and some may sign on but later have their claim disallowed

The survey results may also be subject to some respondent errors.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General (1) what is the definition of unemployment used in compiling the monthly unemployment figures;

(2) if he will list (a) all the separate categories of persons who are included in the unemployment figures and (b) all the various claim forms which, if completed, result in a person being included in the unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: The monthly unemployment count relates to all unemployed people signing on at unemployment benefit offices to claim unemployment benefit, supplementary benefit or national insurance credits.

The main claim forms which result in a person being included in the unemployment figures are the initial claim form (UB461) and the fortnightly declaration of unemployment (UB 25). In addition, the following forms are used in particular circumstances:

Claim Form	Purpose
UB 20	Weekly claiming
UB88 (Qtrly)	Quarterly claiming
PF	Postal claiming book
PQF	Postal claiming book
PQW	Postal claiming book
UB 88P	Weekly postal claiming
UB 88P(AE)	Part-time worker postal Claiming.
UB 20(SF)	Share fishermen's claims
UB 118 (AE)	Share fishermen's claims with other part-time work
UB 90	Seeking work away from home
UB 88X	Confirmation of past unemployment
UB 26T/V	Fortnightly claiming with weekly cheques by personal issue.
UB 591	Delayed claim for benefit
CR2	Weekly application for NI credits
CR 2 (Quarterly)	Quarterly application for NI credits
CR 5	Postal application for NI credits
UB 40 (Part 2)	Signing-on card
UB 43	Final days of claim
UB44	Failed to sign cases
UB 71	Final claim by a personal issue
CR 4	Final days-NI credits only
UB25(AE)	Part-time worker

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures for Liverpool.

Mr. Alan Clark: The level of unemployment in Liverpool is too high. That is why there is an extensive range of Government assistance to attract new investment and therefore new jobs. The area will also benefit from the expansion of three of our special employment and training measures — the youth training scheme, the community programme and the enterprise allowance scheme. But the creation of jobs in Liverpool and elsewhere depends primarily on the efforts of entrepreneurs and the competitiveness of industry.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Paymaster General how many of those who left school in 1985 in the Leeds travel-to-work area were in full-time employment on the latest available figures; and what is that figure as a percentage of school leavers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information from the Leeds careers service indicates that of 6,802 young people who left school this year in the Leeds travel-to-work area 1,832, or 26·9 per cent., went into employment. In addition, 2,783, some of whom will be employees, entered the youth training scheme.

Mr. Wareing asked the Paymaster General what were the levels of unemployment for each month of 1985 in Peacehaven and Dorking.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the number of unemployed claimants for the Lewes No. 9 ward which relates to Peacehaven, and the Dorking north-east, Dorking north-west, Dorking south-east, Dorking south-west and north Holmwood wards which relate to Dorking.

	Peacehaven	Dorking
January 1985	474	332
February 1985	478	333
March 1985	441	318
April 1985	454	318
May 1985	427	307
June 1985	429	289
July 1985	417	299
August 1985	437	305
September 1985	447	301

Disabled People

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General how many disabled persons were included in the latest unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: According to the 1984 labour force survey, approximately 16 per cent. of claimants included in the unemployment count had health problems or disabilities that would limit the kind of work they could do.

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Paymaster General what consideration is being given to the disabled with emphasis on the mentally ill and mentally handicapped within the Government's new provisions for the unemployed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Disabled people, including those who are mentally ill and mentally handicapped, benefit from the full range of employment and training services which are available to able-bodied people. This applies to both new and existing provision. In many of these programmes, relaxed eligibility conditions are applicable to disabled participants.

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Paymaster General if there are any plans for research into more effective ways of providing vocational rehabilitation services for the disabled.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Manpower Services Commission administers an employment rehabilitation programme for disabled people. There is a continuous programme of evaluating existing practices and developing new initiatives to improve the effectiveness of the service.

Community Programme

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest progress towards increasing the number of places on the community programme.

Mr. Alan Clark: The community programme is being expanded by 100,000 places to 230,000 filled places by the end of May 1986 with an interim target for December 1985 of 180,000 filled places. We are making good progress towards meeting these targets. The latest available figures show that 185,700 places have now been authorised, of which 150,930 are filled.

EC (Harmonisation Measures)

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General if he will list those European Economic Community harmonisation measures coming into effect over the last 12 months which have (a) reduced the paperwork demands on business and (b) increased the paperwork demands on business.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I cannot give precise information broken down in this way. However, it is important that EEC measures should not run counter to our domestic deregulation policy. The Government, therefore, want to see the EEC introduce arrangements to ensure systematic scrutiny of existing and proposed community legislation for its impact on business. In response to an initiative launched by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the March European Council, the Commission is studying the problem and is due to report back to the December Council.

Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Paymaster General what vocational provisions are being made for the mentally ill and mentally handicapped following the Goverment's programme of closing down large institutions and establishing community services for these groups.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A flexible range of assistance is available through the Manpower Services Commission to all disabled people, including the mentally ill and mentally handicapped. Eligibility for particular types of assistande depends on the circumstances of the individual. No programmes have been developed specifically to meet the closure of particular institutions, but local resettlement services, availabie through jobcentres, seek to help to meet local needs.

Employment rehabilitation centres and Asset (assistance towards employment) teams provide rehabilitation for mentally ill and mentally handicapped people. Further work is in hand to improve such provision for this group. An increasing number of places are becoming available under the sheltered employment programme for those not able to work in open employment.

Labour Force Survey

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the main findings of his Department's latest survey of the labour force and, in particular, on the number of those on the unemployment register who either had a job or were not seeking work during the period of the survey; and if he will indicate the criteria used in determining whether such persons should be included in the unemployment statistics.

Mr. Alan Clark: The 1984 labour force survey showed that there were about 740,000 claimants without a job but not actively seeking work in the survey week and therefore not classified as unemployed using the survey definition. There were a further 200,000 claimants not classed as unemployed because they said they had a paid job. The monthly unemployment count includes all those who make a claim at an unemployment benefit office for unemployment benefit, supplementary benefit or national insurance credits and sign on as available for work.

Students

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General if students who are seeking work during the summer vacation are included in the unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: A separate count is made of students on vacation who intend to return to full-time education and are unemployed claimants. All other unemployment figures issued by my Department exclude such students.

Work Test Procedure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the operation and efficacy of the work test procedure.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployed people making a claim for benefit have their availability tested for work by a direct question on the unemployment benefit claim form, and subsequently whenever doubt arises about their availability for work. They are no longer required to register for work at a jobcentre but are encouraged to make full use of the services offered by the Manpower Services Commission

The initial availability test requires all claimants to declare whether or not they are willing to take any full-time job which they can do. A negative reply causes the unemployment benefit office to make further detailed inquiries about the nature and conditions of the work which an individual claimant is prepared to accept. Any doubts about the individual's availability are then referred to the independent adjudicating authorities. In 1983, the last full year for which figures are available, over 57,000 claims were disallowed on these grounds.

I am not fully satisfied with this availability test. I have recently set in hand arrangements to improve links between unemployment benefit offices and jobcentres and I am discussing with colleagues the possibility of strengthening the role played by the unemployment review officers of the DHSS.

Jobcentres

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General how many and what percentage of unemployed claimants in the London area are registered at a jobcentre; and how these figures compare with (a) the number of vacancies notified to his Department in Greater London and (b) the estimated overall number of vacancies in Greater London.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on the numbers and the percentage of unemployed claimants registered at jobcentres in the Greater London area is not available. The total number of those registered at jobcentres in Greater London at 4 October 1985 was 29,711. Statistics of those registered at jobcentres do not distinguish unemployed claimants from people seeking a change of employment and others who are not claiming unemployment benefit. Information on the number and percentage of unemployed claimants registered at jobcentres is therefore not available.

On 6 September the numbers of notified vacancies in Greater London were 29,160 at jobcentres and 4,879 at careers offices. No estimate is available of the overall number of vacancies in Greater London. Nationally it is estimated that about one third of all vacancies are notified to jobcentres.

Unemployment Register

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General in what circumstances men over 60 years are required to sign the unemployment register.

Mr. Alan Clark: Men over 60 who are not working are required to sign on as unemployed if they wish to claim unemployment benefit.

Employment Transfer Scheme

Mr. Wareing asked the Paymaster General if he will take steps to seek to increase the effectiveness of the working of the employment transfer scheme as regards applicants from the north of England and Scotland seeking jobs in the south of England.

Mr. Alan Clark: The purpose of the employment transfer scheme is to help employers to fill vacancies which cannot be filled locally by encouraging and assisting unemployed people and those threatened with redundancy to move to take them when they would not otherwise have done so. The scheme is not intended to provide financial assistance to all unemployed people who move to jobs in other parts of the country. Offering such assistance where vacancies can be filled by local unemployed people would be a waste of taxpayers' money. We are piloting a revised approach in the south-west region which ties the scheme more closely to those vacancies which employers cannot fill locally. This new approach is simpler to administer than the existing employment transfer scheme and will enable unemployed people who are considering taking jobs in other areas to be told more quickly than is possible under the existing arrangements whether they are eligible for assistance. The Government will be reviewing the future of the scheme in the light of the results of the pilot scheme and other factors.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Local Government Act 1966

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money has been paid under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 to local authorities in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland, respectively, in the most recent year for which information is available.

Mr. Waddington: The total grant paid to local authorities in respect of the financial year 1983-84 is as follows:

(a) England: £73,050,470

(b) Wales: £57,658 (In 1983-84 all applications for grant under section 11 from Welsh local authorities were approved)

Section 11 does not apply to Scotland.

Certain payments are provisional subject to audit and final acceptance by the Home Office and the final figures may therefore be slightly different.

Prisoners (Accommodation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces outside the metropolitan area have held prisoners in police cells in 1985; and what are the age, sex and location of the prisoners concerned.

Mr. Mellor: Between 1 May and 18 October 1985 prisoners were held in police cells by provincial forces as follows:

	Adult males	Under 21 males	Adult females	Under 21 females
Bedfordshire	—	—	2	—
Cambridgeshire	—	—	4	1
Dorset	—	—	1	—

* The high level of occupancy of police cells in Kent was the result of an industrial dispute at Canterbury prison, which has now been resolved.

Further information is not available centrally.

For information about numbers between 1 January and 30 April I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to his question on 8 May at column 408.

Pregnant Females (Youth Custody)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of pregnant girls entering youth custody centres in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: One hundred and thirty-six girls known to be pregnant are recorded as having been received in youth custody centres in 1984.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of girls who gave birth in 1984 and so far this year whilst in youth custody centres, giving their ages, sentence left to serve and offence.

Mr. Mellor: Sixteen females under 21 serving sentences in youth custody centres have given birth since 1 January 1984. One was 16 years old, seven were 17, one 18, two 19, two 20 and three 21.

One had two weeks left to serve, two one month, five six weeks, one two months, one two and a half months, two three months, two three and a half months, one four months and one seven months.

Five had been convicted of robbery, two for the possession of drugs, and one each for robbery and assault, robbery and burglary, burglary, burglary and theft, theft and deception, illegal importation of drugs, abduction, unlawful wounding and assault occasioning grievous bodily harm.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of females currently in youth custody centres who are pregnant.

Mr. Mellor: On 18 October 1985, the latest date for which information is available, 13 females in youth custody centres were known to be pregnant.

Mothers (Youth Custody)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of women currently in youth custody centres who are mothers; and what is the number of children they have.

Mr. Mellor: There are currently 42 mothers in youth custody centres with 55 children between them.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of women in prison at the latest available date who had their children with them, giving their location, the ages of the children, the sentence being served by the mother and the offence.

Mr. Mellor: On 18 October 1985, the latest date for which this information is available, 23 women had their children with them in custody.

Six women were in Holloway, of whom one was awaiting trial for murder, one for the supply and one for the illegal importation of drugs. One was serving a 21-month sentence and one a three-year sentence for the illegal importation of drugs, and one a 27-month sentence for possession of drugs. Their children's ages ranged from seven days to 16 weeks.

Six women were in Styal, of whom one was serving a 12-month sentence for deception, one 15-month for burglary, one 21-month for breach of a suspended sentence and robbery, one two years for deception, one two years for burglary and one three years for abduction and assault. Their children's ages ranged from two months to 5½ months.

Eleven women were in Askham Grange. One was serving a seven-month sentence for theft and deception, three were serving nine months for burglary, attempted and criminal deception, and deception and wounding respectively, two were serving 12 months for the possession of drugs and forgery respectively, one was serving 15 months for theft, two were serving 18 months for burglary and receiving respectively, one was serving two years for customs evasion and one three years for the illegal importation of drugs. Their children's ages ranged from three weeks to 15½ months.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate of the number of women in prison who have children; what is the number of these children aged three years or less; and who is responsible for the children while the mother is in custody.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not kept centrally and reliable estimates could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the provision of facilities at youth custody centres for girls to have their children with them.

Mr. Mellor: The mother and baby unit at Styal is a designated youth custody centre. Female inmates sentenced to youth custody are also eligible to have their babies with them in the mother and baby units at Askham Grange and Holloway.

Births in Custody

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women gave birth in 1984 and so far in 1985 while on remand in custody awaiting trial or sentence; what was the offence with which each one was charged; what was the sentence; and what happened to the children.

Mr. Mellor: Twenty-two unsentenced women have given birth in custody since 1 January 1984.

Four were charged with illegal importation of drugs, four with theft, two each with murder, burglary, handling stolen goods and deception and one each with assault occasioning grievous bodily harm, robbery with violence, customs evasion, threatening words and behaviour, fraud, and arson.

Thirteen received custodial sentences—one of 126 days' youth custody, one of 15 months' youth custody, one of 12 months' imprisonment (of which eight were suspended) one of nine months, three of 12 months, three of 18 months, one of 21 months, one of two and one of three years. Four received non-custodial sentences, two were made subject to extradition orders, and three are at present on trial.

Of their children, 13 remained with their mothers in mother and baby units, three went to relations, three were placed in local authority care, one was fostered and two were extradited with their mothers.

Women in Custody

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of women in custody with their children in 1984 and so far in 1985 who were subsequently separated from their children, giving the age of the child, the disposal of the child and the reason for the separation.

Mr. Mellor: Since 1 January 1984, sixteen women who had their children in custody were subsequently separated from them. Seventeen babies were involved, one aged 24 hours, 10 aged several days, one each aged six weeks, four months, eight months and 10 months and two aged 15 months.

Seven babies were placed with friends or relations, and nine in various forms of care. One baby was separated because it needed hospital care, the mother remaining in custody. Of the other 15 mothers, 12 preferred separation, one mother was transferred to an establishment without a mother and baby unit for disciplinary reasons, one was separated from her baby because of the nature of her offence, and one mother was separated from one of her babies on psychiatric advice and subsequently placed a second in voluntary care.

Mother and Baby Units

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of children refused admission to each mother and baby unit in 1984 and so far in 1985, giving the reason for the refusal and the subsequent disposal of the child.

Mr. Mellor: In 1984 three babies were refused admission to the unit at Holloway, one because of the length of the mother's sentence and two because the unit was full. Two babies remained with their grandparents and one remained with a friend of the mother.

Up till 18 October 1985 two babies have been refused admission to the unit at Askham Grange, one because of its age, the other following advice from probation and social services departments. One remained with foster parents and the other with relatives. Two babies have been refused admission to the unit at Holloway because of lack of space. One remained with its father, the other with a friend of the mother.

There is no record of any baby being refused admission to the unit at Styal over this period.

Local Authority Associations (Consultations)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the ground rules circulated within his Department to ensure adequate consultation with the local authority associations in the light of the judgment in R. v Secretary of State for Social Services ex parte in the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Mr. Mellor: No such grounds rules have been circulated. My right hon. Friend is considering, in the light of the judgment, whether any changes in the Department's procedures for consulting the local authority associations and other organisations are necessary.

Racial Violence (Prosecutions)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis regarding the policy of the police toward the initiation by them, rather than by the victim, of court proceedings where offences involving racial violence are alleged to have taken place.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Decisions on whether to prosecute in individual cases are for the chief officer of police, advised as appropriate by the Director of Public Prosecutions, but it is the normal policy of the police to prosecute in offences involving violence resulting in injury, unless there are special considerations. Violence for racial motives is viewed particularly seriously.

The Department is consulting the Association of Chief Police Officers and the commissioner about the circumstances in which the police, with the consent of the victim, initiate a prosecution for common assault to see whether any general guidance would be helpful.

Police Stations (Lay Visitors)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a decision on the request to set up a lay vistors' scheme to police stations in W Division of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend, as police authority for the Metropolitan police district, has considered and agreed to proposals put forward by the Wandsworth policing consultative committee for the establishment of a lay visitor scheme for police stations in W division. The necessary steps are being taken to appoint visitors.

Prison Medical Officers (Training)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training is being given to prison hospital doctors and staff for dealing with drug addicts who are sent to prison.

Mr. Mellor: Prison medical officers at establishments which receive direct committals from the courts are experienced in the recognition and treatment of the physical symptoms of drug dependency, and many have received psychiatric training or experience. All medical officers are encouraged, and allowed opportunity, to attend external refresher and development courses relevant to this and other aspects of their work. Hospital officers, who work under medical direction, receive theoretical and practical instruction in the nursing care of drug dependents as part of their basic training.

Plastic and Rubber Baton Rounds

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the metropolitan police first acquired plastic baton rounds, in what quantities they hold them, and whether they also possess stocks of rubber baton rounds.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that plastic baton rounds were first acquired by his force in the autumn of 1981, following serious riots in the London area. The commissioner advises that to provide details of the numbers held would not be conducive to operational effectiveness. No rubber baton rounds are held.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baton rounds were fired during training in 1984 by the Metropolitan police; and what was the estimated cost of the training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that 1,597 rounds were fired. The rounds cost a total of £11,875.

CS Gas

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Metropolitan police first acquired stocks of CS gas and whether they have, or have ever had, stocks of CN or CR gas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that the force first acquired stocks of CS in the early 1960s for criminal siege purposes. The Metropolitan police have never held stocks of either CN or CR gas.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in each London police district, what is the number of (a) CS gas canisters held in armouries, (b) weapons that can discharge CS gas canisters and (c) officers trained in the use of CS gas;

(2) which of the following departments of the Metropolitan police have stocks of CS gas canisters, gas canister launchers and officers trained in their use; and in each case what are the numbers involved: Commissioner's Office, A1 to A10, B1 to B14, C1 to C13, special branch, D1 to D15, area headquarters, training schools and holding centres.

Mr. Giles Shaw: For operational reasons, it would not be sensible to disclose the quantity of CS equipment held by the Metropolitan police, its location, or the number of officers who have been trained in its use.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many gas projectiles were fired during training in 1984 by the Metropolitan police; and what was the estimated cost of the training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that no CS gas canisters were fired in public order training; 22 practice grenades were fired; these emit non-toxic smoke. Each practice grenade costs £36.

Mr. Edward Hopson

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to the answer of 12 November 1984, Official Report, column 71, he will make a further statement on the progress in the community of Mr. Edward Hopson, released from Broadmoor in April 1982.

Mr. Mellor: I have received detailed monthly reports from a consultant psychiatrist at Broadmoor hospital and a senior probation officer who are responsible for supervising Mr. Hopson. These indicate that he is making satisfactory progress in the community. I shall continue to take a close interest in the case.

Immigration Checks

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost annually of administering immigration checks at all United Kingdom airports.

Mr. Waddington: The overall cost of the immigration service in 1984-85 was approximately £28 million and we estimate that £17 million of this was attributable to work at airports.

Interviews (Tape Recording)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any information as to the estimated average time taken for a police officer to complete the paperwork necessary after an arrest; and how this will compare when tape recorded interviews are in operation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The impact of tape recording on police practices and procedures is one of the matters being studied in the tape recording field trials which will not be completed until next spring. The study includes an examination of the time spent by police officers writing up notes and statements etc. Some preliminary information is contained in Home Office Research Study No. 58 "The Tape Recording of Police Interviews with Suspects" published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office last year, and in Home Office research and planning unit bulletin No. 19, published this year. The current impression is that tape recording enables interviews to proceed more quickly and smoothly than where detailed notes have to be taken.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will specify the standards required in setting up a tape recording interview room for police use; and what is the estimated cost.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The cost of providing rooms in which tape recorded interviews can be conducted depends entirely upon the suitability of existing rooms for adaptation, and the amount of acoustic enhancement required. The latter will depend in turn on such factors as the proximity of the rooms in question to sources of external noise and the materials from which they are constructed. An interim guide to interview room acoustics was circulated to police authorities and chief constables in July and copies have been placed in the Library of the House (Home Office circular 48/1985). Further guidance, based on a study of interview rooms will be available shortly.

Metropolitan Police (Reorganisation)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what form the presentation took which was made to him by the Metropolitan police about the proposed reorganisation of the force; what documents were provided in support of the presentation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend, the then Home Secretary, met the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and a number of his senior officers on 31 October 1984 to discuss his plans for reorganising the Metropolitan police. A summary of the main features of the proposals was provided by the commissioner to those present at the meeting.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of Stare for the Home Department which organisations or individuals the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis consulted or took advice from during the construction of the basic plan for strategy 7B; what is the timetable for consulting public bodies on the implementation of strategy 7B, who will be consulted and to what extent the plans are open to modification; why the existing consultative committees were not consulted over the basic plan of strategy 7B; which Metropolitan police staff organisations were consulted over strategy 7B; on what date they were approached; and what was the substance of their representations.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that, before preparing his proposals he sought advice from some 34 outside organisations. e CThese included management consultants, educational establishments, Government Departments and commercial concerns. In addition, advice was sought from 13 police forces in the United Kingdom and eight overseas forces.

The commissioner began consultations with public bodies shortly after he had announced his outline proposals and these consultations will continue throughout 1986 as the reorganisation is implemented. This process will involve borough and district councils, community police consultative groups and other community representatives. The broad framework of the commissioner's plans have now been settled, but the consultations will cover the many detailed points arising from the reorganisation which have yet to be resolved. The emphasis of this consultation will be on ensuring that the reorganisation is tailored to meet local circumstances in the different parts of the Metropolitan police district.

I regret that it was not possible for the commissioner to consult consultative groups or others in advance of announcing his basic proposals. However, advance consultation on detailed plans would have caused damaging delay and uncertainty, with a consequent risk to efficiency and morale.

The commissioner informed the Metropolitan police staff associations of his proposals on 20 November 1984, the day on which they were announced publicly. Since then police staff associations and the civil staff trade union sides have been closely involved in all matters relating to the reorganisation.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of Stare for the Home Department if he met the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to discuss the basic plan contained in strategy 7B; and what representations he has received about strategy 7B.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend the then Home Secretary met the commissioner on 31 October 1984 to discuss in detail his plans for reorganising the management structure of the Metropolitan police.

Representations about the reorganisation have been made by a number of right hon. and hon. Members, and by 12 local bodies, including five community/police consultative groups. Among the points which have been raised are: consultation before the broad proposals were announced; their effect on community/police consultative arrangements; and the future of borough-based community liaison officers.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the rationale behind the proposed eight new areas under strategy 7B of the Metropolitan police: on what basis the boundaries were decided; who took the decision; whether any financial studies were conducted into the cost of strategy 7B prior to the publication of the commissioner's plans; and what studies have been done on the training implications of the implementation of strategy 7B.

Mr. Shaw: The area boundaries which were introduced on 23 September were fixed only after the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis had considered a wide variety of possible configurations. His decisions were based on principles which he considered important in determining the configuration of the new areas. These included the need to avoid altering divisional boundaries; to avoid dividing local authorities between areas; to balance different types of workload and provide variety on each area; to equalise workloads and the number of divisions between areas; and to achieve a workload structure that would enable effective control between headquarters and area, and area and divisions. The commissioner fully consulted my right hon. and learned Friend, the then Home Secretary, who agreed with the proposed area structure.

The commissioner has made it clear that the cost of the reorganisation will be contained within existing resources. One of its primary objectives is to ensure the most effective use of resources. Training requirements were carefully considered, and the necessary training has been taking place since the reorganisation was announced. This will continue as further needs are identified during the implementation phase.

Wandsworth Prison

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when a Minister of his Department last visited the prison officers' mess at Wandsworth prison; what report he made on his visit; what money has now been allocated for improving conditions and facilities in this mess; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend Lord Elton visited the prison, but not the staff mess, in October 1983. Since then the mess has been refurbished. No further improvements are planned because a new staff mess is to be provided outside the prison.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the land opposite Wandsworth prison was taken back from the nursery which had been using the land; what are the present plans to use the land; and what discussions have taken place, and with whom, as to the future use of this land.

Mr. Mellor: An area of land adjacent to the prison was leased to a local nursery in 1958. The lease was renegotiated in 1968 in respect of a slightly smaller area. The land thereby released has been used to provide car parking for prison staff and facilities for the storage of contractors' materials in connection with building works within the prison, and it is likely to continue to be needed for these purposes in the immediate future. We are aware that, in the longer term, the local authority wish to see this land used to provide open space.

Electoral Register

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables as to which constabularies use the electoral register to assist in the identification of individuals.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. It is common practice for police officers to refer to the electoral register to assist in verifying addresses or to help to locate people, but it would be of limited value in identifying individuals.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables as to which constabularies use or plan to use the electoral register in machine readable form for operational purposes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. I am not aware that any constabulary uses or plans to use the electoral register in machine readable form but, if the police were to obtain copies, the use of the data would be subject to the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 in the same way as any other data they hold.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to modify current data protection practices in relation to the use of the electoral register in machine readable form; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. Under the Data Protection Act 1984 any person to whom the electoral registration officer supplies the electoral register in computer-compatible form will be required to register the data with the Data Protection Registrar. He will also be required to comply with the eight data protection principles set out in schedule 1 to the Act. The Data Protection Registrar has power to investigate any breach of these principles and to enforce compliance with them.

Departmental Broadcasting Unit

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the functions of his Department's broadcasting unit; how many staff are currently employed by the unit; what is its budget for the current year; if he will state the role played by the unit (a) in relation to his action in respect of the proposed BBC programme "At the Edge of the Union" and (b) in respect of any other programmes during the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The broadcasting department of the Home Office is responsible for advising the Home Secretary on broadcasting policy, including constitutional and international matters, and the implications of new technological development. It also advises on matters concerning the financing of BBC and independent television and radio services, and on relevant legislation. The Department, which has a staff of 26, is also responsible for policy on data protection.

Staffing and associated running costs for 1985-86 are estimated at £237,000.

Over the past five years the Department has replied to letters from members of the public about individual programmes and it has advised Ministers in their replies to similar correspondence and on any matters in which Ministers wished their views on programmes to be made known to the broadcasting authorities. It performed these functions in relation to the programme "At the Edge of the Union".

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the financial contributions made by his Department to each police authority towards the cost of policing the miners' dispute; (2) if he will estimate the net cost of policing the mining dispute for each police authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Final claims for police grant and the special payment we made available for the additional cost of policing the miners' dispute relating to expenditure arising from the dispute in 1984-85 are now being received and have not yet been audited. It is not yet possible, therefore, to provide the information requested.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each police authority the total sums incurred by the Metropolitan police during deployment in the coal dispute, and for each authority, who has paid and who has not and in the latter case what action has been taken to recover the sums due.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Metropolitan police estimate that the additional cost of providing mutual aid to other police forces in connection with the miners' dispute was £18·147 million. These costs fall to be met by the aided forces, and details, by police force, of the amounts involved and payments made by 9 October are set out below. The Metropolitan police are in correspondence with the police authorities in Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire and South Yorkshire about the outstanding amounts. My right hon. Friend is considering an application from the commissioner for a determination, under section 14(4) of the Police Act 1964, in respect of Derbyshire.

Mutual aid costs incurred by the Metropolitan Police in connection with the miners' dispute

Aided force	Additional costs incurred	Amounts repaid by 9 October 1985
Derbyshire	5·496	Nil
Nottinghamshire	6·734	5·094
Leicestershire	1·211	0·836
Warwickshire	0·368	0·368
South Yorkshire	1·225	1·166
North Yorkshire	0·720	0·720
Humberside	1·928	1·928
Durham	0·059	0·059
Sussex	0·295	0·295
Essex	0·006	0·006
Kent	0·105	0·105
Total	18·147	10·577

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a summary of sentences imposed by the courts in cases concerned with riotous assembly and similar crimes in connection with the coal dispute; and if he will also state the numbers charged and the numbers convicted.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am making inquiries and will write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average fine imposed by the courts in the last six months in connection with convictions arising from offences committed in connection with the coal dispute.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not recorded centrally.

Prisoners

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to reduce the amount of time spent by prisoners locked in their cells by the provision of additional employment or recreational opportunities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Under the arrangements set out in circular instruction 55/84, a copy of which is in the Library, governors and regional directors are required to manage their resources so as to enable prisoners to spend the maximum possible time out of cells. Employment, recreation and other regime activities will be developed wherever possible, though the extent to which this can be achieved, particularly in local prisons, depends on a number of factors, including the size of the prison population.

"At the Edge of the Union"

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the source of his information concerning the intentions of the BBC to broadcast a programme entitled "At the Edge of the Union", on the basis of which he wrote to the chairman of the BBC's board of governors requesting the corporation to reconsider its decision to broadcast the programme.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend, the then Home Secretary first learnt of the BBC's intention to broadcast this programme when he was asked to comment on it by a member of the staff of The Sunday Times. Material about the programme was then published in the press.

Metropolitan Police (Firearms Training)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the length of (a) the initial training and (b) the annual training of officers in the Metropolitan police who are authorised in the use of firearms; and what is the average number of rounds of ammunition expended by officers in each category.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The initial training of authorised firearms officers lasts for two weeks, during which time the officer can expect to fire about 440 rounds of ammunition. Once the officer has received basic training, he will attend further refresher courses four times a year, each time for one day. On these occasions the officer would be expected to fire between 50 and 80 rounds of ammunition.

Cemeteries (Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received alleging irregularities in the running of cemeteries in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: A letter was sent to the Home Office in March of this year complaining about the running of the Cefn Coed cemetery in Merthyr Tydfil. The reply sent explained that this was not the responsibility of the Home Office. A letter to the Prime Minister about the cemetery was also copied to the Home Secretary earlier this month. The burial authority with responsibility for the management of this cemetery is the Merthyr Tydfil borough council.

Disabled People (Cinemas)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reconsider his plans that would require disabled persons in wheelchairs to be accompanied by an able-bodied adult before entering a cinema; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the draft regulations under the Cinemas Act 1985 recently issued by his Department for consultation and, in particular, on the proposal that blind people should be admitted to a cinema only if accompanied by a sighted person;

(2) what is his policy in relation to encouraging independence and mobility for blind and other handicapped people.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Member to the answers given on 24 October to questions from the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam).

Data Protection

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what distinction will be made in the guidelines for the operation of the Data Protection Act between the management of personal affairs or recreational purposes on the one hand and any personal business affairs on the other hand;

(2) what guidelines exist in respect of the operation of the Data Protection Act with regard to the point at which a computer bureau will be deemed to be in operation when equipment leaves its owners's possession for use by another.

Mr. Waddington: It is for the Data Protection Registrar, rather than for my right hon. Friend, to offer guidance on the interpretation and application of the Data Protection Act. I understand from the Registrar that he has not, as yet, offered any general guidance on the two points raised by the hon. Member but he will be happy to advise the hon. Member if he would write to him explaining the precise circumstances he has in mind.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many entries the data protection registrar expects to include in his register; how many of these will relate to financial organisations which hold information on the financial affairs of individuals; and what is the likely cost to a data subject in time, in postal charges, and in fees permitted under the Act, of checking those entries.

Mr. Waddington: As I indicated in reply to questions from the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on 26 July 1985 at column 807-8, it is extremely difficult to estimate the likely number of registrations under the Data Protection Act. The registrar's current working assumption is, however, that he will receive about 300,000 initial applications, with 90,000 per year thereafter. No estimates have been made of the proportion of these applications which will be made by financial organisations. Nor is it possible to estimate the costs referred to in the last part of the question.

Metropolitan Police (Cost-effectiveness)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals for introducing a cost-effectiveness study into the Metropolitan police estimates.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend fully accepts, as does the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, the need to ensure cost-effectiveness and value for money in the use of Metropolitan police resources—particularly manpower, which accounts for some 80 per cent. of the force's budget. This is a constantly recurring theme in the regular discussions which my right hon. Friend and officials have with the Metropolitan police; it is specifically reflected in the force's goal for 1985 and it is one of the prime objectives of the force reorganisation. It will also figure prominently in the urgent work which my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 21 October at column 31 he has set in hand to assess the manpower needs for the force. Arrangements approved by his predecessor for examining particular areas of force expenditure are now in place and the first such review, of the management of the vehicle fleet, is well advanced.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effect on existing training programmes in crime prevention, community relations and race awareness of the extra training requirements arising from the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The special retraining exercise for the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 is nearly complete. It will not be a continuing requirement, since the 1984 Act provisions now form part of basic training for new recruits.

Some short-term readjustments of training programmes have been necessary, but training continues in the three important areas specified in the question, and has been tailored to take account of the provisions of the Act. The Act training programme, by underlining the need for open and accountable exercise of police powers, will itself have contributed to improved awareness of the need for good relations between the police and the community.

Gaming Act

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to extend the Gaming Act 1968 to cover gaming on ships outside territorial waters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Public Disorder (Brixton)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what sentences have been imposed by the courts following cases which have been held in connection with alleged offences committed during the Brixton riots.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics of such court proceedings are being compiled and will be made available in due course.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how many arrests have been made in connection with the alleged rapes during the Brixton riots.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that no arrests have been made to date, but that inquiries are continuing.

Motoring Offences (Fines)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average fine imposed by the courts in the last six months in connection with convictions for motoring offences, other than parking offences.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information is shown in tables 6, 11 and 12 of the publication "Offences relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, 1983—Supplementary Tables", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The issue for 1984 will be published shortly.

Crime Prevention Officers

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crime prevention officers were employed by each police force in England and Wales in each of the years 1980 to 1985; and if he will make a statement on the Government's policy as to crime prevention officers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The full information request for each force is not readily available centrally. I understand, however, that there are some 650 crime prevention officers in police forces in England and Wales. It is for individual chief officers of police to decide on the disposition of their manpower resources but the Government believe that crime prevention officers have a vital role in stimulating preventive activity within the community.

Licensing Law

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals for the review of licensing law in the light of the conclusions of the third case study contained in Home Office research study No. 86, "Implementing Crime Prevention Measures"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We shall take account of this study in our current review of permitted opening hours of licensed premises in England and Wales.

Civil Defence

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure on civil defence in each of the years 1980 to 1985; and how has the cost been divided between central and local government.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Expenditure figures for the United Kingdom are as follows:

£ million

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	*1985-86
Central Government	25·2	30·1	43·6	54·4	65·9	71·7
Local and police authorities	6·3	8·2	9·5	12·2	15·2	18·0
Sub-total	31·5	38·3	53·1	66·6	81·1	88·7
Central Government administration (estimate)	2·7	3·2	3·6	4·1	4·6	5·9
Total	34·2	41·5	56·7	70·7	85·7	94·6

* Estimate.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what land and premises are currently held by the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils purchased with the aid of grants paid under regulations made under section 3 of the Civil Defence Act 1948.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not readily available centrally in the form requested, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Metropolitan Police (Armed Searches)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many armed searches were carried out by the Metropolitan police in domestic premises in districts L and Y, respectively, during each of the years 1982 to 1984 and so far in 1985.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for each Metropolitan police district, on how many occasions armed police have entered private homes (i) with a warrant and (ii) without a warrant.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not recorded centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Metropolitan Police (Establishment)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the strength of the civilian employees in the Metropolitan police in 1965 and 1979; and what is the establishment now.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 31 December 1965 the strength of the Metropolitan police civil staff was 3,355; on 30 April 1979 the figure was 11,837. The current civil staff ceiling is 13,482.

Charitable Bodies (Trustees)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to which charitable bodies the Greater London council is entitled to appoint trustees.

Mr. Mellor: The Greater London council is entitled to appoint trustees to a charitable body if the trust instrument provides for such appointments. Information about such charities has been sought from the Greater London council, but has not yet been received.

Property (Charitable Purposes)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what property is held by the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils for charitable purposes.

Mr. Mellor: This information has been sought, but has not yet been received, from the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

BBC (Staff)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what basis, and for what reasons, members of the staff of the British Broadcasting Corporation are positively vetted by the security services; whether the security services advise the British Broadcasting Corporation as to which members of the corporation's staff should undergo such vetting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The positive vetting system is used to investigate the reliability of those who are expected to have regular access to highly classified information. It takes place with the knowledge and consent of those concerned. It is applied only to a very small number of staff of the BBC in accordance with the procedures and criteria described in the Government's "Statement on the Recommendations of the Security Commission" (Cmnd. 8540, May 1982).

Mrs. Muriel McCullough

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mrs. Muriel McCullough is being held in Durham gaol as a category A prisoner.

Mr. Mellor: Mrs. Muriel McCullough is not a category A prisoner. Durham prison accommodates other sentenced female prisoners as well as those in category A.

SCOTLAND

Communicative Aids (Financial Support)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, why his Department has ceased supporting financially the work of Dr. Philip Odor and the Godfrey Thomson unit in the University of Edinburgh in their work on communicative aids for language and learning.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The communications aids for language and learning centre, established in 1983, was funded by the Department of Trade and Industry, Lothian regional council and the urban renewal unit until March 1985. To allow the centre time to seek alternative funding sources, the Scottish Education Department offered a grant towards establishment and research costs for the financial year 1985-86, to cease on 31 March 1986. The grant was accepted on these terms. My Department, however, is not in a position to finance the centre on a permanent basis.

Sport (Religious Discrimination)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to ban religious discrimination in sport.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Homoeopathy

Sir John Wells asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the total expenditure in each region of the Health Service in Scotland on homoeopathy in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not collected centrally. The running costs of the one homoeopathic hospital in Scotland — the homoeopathic hospital, Glasgow—amounted to £486,000 in the year ended 31 March 1985.

Community Industry (Strathclyde)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the monthly increase and the total number of persons employed by community industry in the Strathclyde region during the last month for which figures are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 12 September 1985, the latest date for which information is available, 1,060 persons were participating in community industry in Strathclyde region, a decrease of two over the previous month.

Employment (Greenock)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many redundancy notifications were given during the last month for which statistics are available in the Greenock travel-to-work area.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Statistics are compiled from notifications to the Department of Employment of impending redundancies involving 10 or more workers. During the month of September 1985, three such notifications affecting 777 workers were made by employers in the Greenock and Port Glasgow jobcentre areas. The figures are collected by jobcentre area, and precise figures for the Greenock travel-to-work area are not therefore available.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the employment consequences of the stated intentions of Scott Lithgow Limited to make 900 members of the work force at Greenock and Port Glasgow redundant and of Clark Kincaid to make 80 members of the work force at Greencock redundant.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The numbers of those to be made redundant are still uncertain. Were 980 redundancies to take place and all those persons were to claim unemployment benefit in the Greenock travel-to-work area, it is estimated that the direct short-run effect would be to increase the unemployment rate in the Greenock TTWA by around two percentage points. The Government recognise the serious problems of the area, which has development area status, and give their full support to the Inverclyde initiative.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many community programme places were being supported in the Greenock travel-to-work area and the Strathclyde region during the last month for which statistics are available; and how many of those places were part-time and full-time places, respectively.

Mr. Allan Stewart: At 30 September 1985 there were 556 filled places on the community programme in the Greenock travel-to-work area. Of these, 459 were part-time and 97 were full-time. At the same date there were 12,555 filled places in Stratchlyde region of which 9,583 were part-time and 2,972 were full-time.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs in the Greenock travel-to-work area were being supported by the temporary short-time working scheme during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The temporary short-time working compensation scheme closed for applications on 31 March 1984. No potentially redundant jobs were being supported in the Greenock travel-to-work area in September 1984, the last month for which statistics are available.

Inverclyde Initiative

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been created by the Inverclyde initiative to date; what number are full-time positions; what number are part-time positions; and what percentage of jobs have been filled by male applicants.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Inverclyde initiative was launched only at the end of March this year for a period of five years. Its aim of regenerating the economy in Inverclyde cannot be achieved overnight. The action taken to date had concentrated on environmental improvements, preparation of land for industrial development, assisting existing companies to relocate and thereby strengthen their future prospects, and identifying projects which will generate investment and attract business to the area. I have no doubt that new and permanent jobs will be created as these projects come to fruition, but no figures are yet available.

Unemployment (Strathclyde)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the total of young people who have become unemployed and who have registered at unemployment benefit offices in each travel-to-work area in Strathclyde in the last month for which statistics are available;

(2) how many young persons in the Greenock travel to work area have been unemployed during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's letter of 22 October 1984. The information requested is available in the Library.

Regional Assistance (Strathclyde)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number and value of offers of regional assistance made to companies in the Strathclyde travel-to-work areas and in Strathclyde as a whole for the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In September 1985, there were two offers of regional selective assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 with a combined value of £1 million and 103 offers of new style regional development grant with a total value of £2·54 million made to companies in Strathclyde. Information of the type requested for old style regional development grant is not available.

It is not possible to give details of offers of regional selective assistance for Strathclyde travel-to-work areas as to do so would disclose information on individual companies. The following table shows offers of new style regional development grant by travel-to-work areas within Strathclyde for September 1985.

Travel-to-work area	Number of offers	Value of offers (£ million)
Cumnock & Sanquhar, Dumbarton	5	0·04
Glasgow	48	1·60
Greenock	4	0·03
Irvine	12	0·26
Kilmarnock	3	0·04
Lanarkshire	31	0·59
Total	103	*2·54

* Figures for individual travel-to-work areas may not add to total shown because of rounding.

Youth Training Scheme (Strathclyde)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many youth training scheme places were identified and supported in the Greenock travel-to-work area and the Strathclyde region during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart: During September 1985, 25 and 887 places were approved locally for the Greenock travel-to-work area and Strathclyde region respectively. The majority of places have already been approved for young people entering the youth training scheme in 1985-86.

Saughton Prison

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will take immediate steps to relieve the overcrowding in Saughton prison, Edinburgh and elsewhere in Scotland; if he will make it his policy to abolish overcrowding in Scottish prisons as soon as practicable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Action was taken in March of this year to reduce the level of overcrowding in Edinburgh prison by providing accommodation for 50 under-21 remand inmates, who would normally be held in Edinburgh prison, in Polmont young offenders' institution.

I can hold out no prospect of being able to afford any further significant relief to Edinburgh prison until phase II of Shotts prison becomes available in the spring of 1987.

It is already Government policy to end overcrowding, which mainly affects Edinburgh and Barlinnie prisons and Longriggend remand institution, as soon as practicable.

Prisons

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what capital expenditure is currently being committed for prison building in Scotland; what detailed plans he has for the future of the Scottish prison system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: It is estimated that £11·7 million will be spent on capital projects within the Scottish prison service during the current financial year.

A review of the use of inmate accommodation within the Scottish penal system which was nearing completion will now have to be looked at further in the light of recent increases in the penal population.

Defective Housing

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make available the £3 million unallocated funds to local authorities in Scotland in the course of the next few weeks under the terms of the Housing Defects Act 1984; and whether he has taken and will take into account the needs of defective housing in the public sector in calculating the rate support grant formula for Edinburgh.

Mr. Ancram: Local authorities have been informed that they will be issued with supplementary capital allocations to cover their estimated expenditure under the provisions of the Housing Defects Act in 1985-86. Whatever proportion of the £3 million unallocated consent is required will be so issued. Any balance will be issued in the form of general enhancements of capital allocations. Local authority expenditure on defective housing is not relevant expenditure for rate support grant purposes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when contractors will be issued with a licence for the remedying of defective housing in Scotland, both in the public and private sectors.

Mr. Ancram: A number of applications for the licence of repair systems have been made to PRC Homes Ltd. and approved methods of repair are likely to emerge in the coming months.

Judges (Appointments)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, in view of the increased work load of the Scottish courts on drugs cases and other subjects and the length of time for appeals to be heard, he will consider seeking to create another Scottish judge or judges.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) on 15 July at column 36. Since then one additional judge of the Court of Session has been appointed in September 1985.

West Highlands Free Press

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether grant or loan support has been provided to the West Highlands Free Press by the Highlands and Islands Development Board.

Mr. John MacKay: The board has provided both grant and loan assistance.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the 15 per cent. of youth training scheme leavers in Scotland who receive Manpower Services Commission questionnaires regarding their employment status reply.

Mr. Younger: The response rate in Scotland to the Manpower Services Commission's sample survey of 15 per cent. of young people who left the youth training scheme between June 1984 and March 1985 was 64 per cent.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of youth training scheme leavers in Scotland who left the scheme in June are currently in full-time employment.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is not available. Results from the Manpower Services Commission's 100 per cent. survey of young people who left the scheme in June are expected in December 1985. The results of the survey will be placed in the Library.

Agriculture (Severe Weather)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will be able to arrive at a decision regarding financial aid to the Scottish farming industry, in the light of last winter's weather.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on 24 October.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will permit farmers in Scotland to claim grant aid under the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme after 31 December if eligible work already started or planned cannot be finished due to adverse weather conditions.

Mr. John MacKay: The agriculture and horticulture grant scheme already provides for an extended closing date for claims for certain important operations including reseeding and regeneration of grassland and arterial drainage in Scotland. Additionally, the Government are urgently considering what steps should be taken to assist farmers whose businesses have been affected by the bad weather. An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Independent Schools (Boarding Allowances)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much money the Government paid in each year since 1978-79 to independent schools in the form of boarding allowances in respect of the education of the children of diplomatic staff.

Mr. Eggar: The total cost to the diplomatic service wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, including communications departments, in each year since 1978-79 for boarding school allowances, was:

1978-79	3,791,665
1979-80	4,011,280
1980-81	4,962,267
1981-82	5,663,088
1982-83	7,465,177
1983-84	5,940,981
1984-85	6,239,908

East Timor

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards East Timor in the light of Amnesty International's report on the alleged violation of human rights in that country, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Rifkind: Our policy is to support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary General to promote contacts between the Indonesian and Portuguese Governments aimed at achieving a just settlement in East Timor. We draw encouragement from the United Nation's Secretary General's latest report on East Timor, copies of which I am placing in the Library of the House.

Export Stabilisation Scheme

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the European Economic Community Commission document, 8667/85 concerning the establishment of an export stabilisation system; what discussions have been held by European Economic Community Foreign Ministers on this subject; and what conclusions were reached.

Mr. Rifkind: At its meeting on 1 October, the Foreign Affairs Council agreed that the European Community should offer to establish a new system of compensation for losses of export earnings on various commodities for the benefit of a number of least-developed countries not already covered by the provisions of the Lomé convention. An announcement to this effect as made at the mid-term review of the UN-sponsored substantial new programme of action for least developed countries held in Geneva from 30 September-11 October.

Hong Kong (Travel Documents)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the arrangements for the introduction of international travel documents for citizens of Hong Kong; whether he is satisfied that such documents will be accepted by other countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. It is intended that British National (Overseas) passports should be introduced from 1 July 1987. Their format will be the same as that of passports issued by United Kingdom passport issuing posts to other British Nationals. The Government will do all that they can to secure for BN(O) passport holders the same access to other countries as that enjoyed by holders of British Dependent Territories citizens passports.

Mr. Raoul Wallenberg

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received during each of the last two years regarding Mr. Raoul Wallenberg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind This year we have recived representations from 11 hon. Members in the form of letters on the case of Raoul Wallenberg, and answers have been given to nine parliamentary questions. The corresponding figures for 1984 were three letters and two parliamentary questions. A moderate flow of correspondence from members of the public has also been received over the period.

Boarding School Allowances

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much money the Government paid in each year since 1979 to independent schools in the form of boarding allowances in respect of the education of the children of diplomatic staff (a) in cash terms and (b) in constant 1985 prices; and for each, how many children that covered.

Mr. Eggar The total cost to the diplomatic service wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, including Communications Departments in each financial year since 1979-80 for boarding school allowances, was:

1979-80	4,011,280
1980-81	4,962,267
1981-82	5,663,088
1982-83	7,465,177
1983-84	5,940,981
1984-85	6,239,908

The 1982-83 figure reflects a change in the method and timing of payment from monthly to termly in advance. As a once and for all result, the equivalent of 15 months payment was made in the 12-month period.

In constant 1985 prices the cost was:

1979-80	5,986,985
1980-81	6,478,155
1981-82	6,654,627
1982-83	8,230,625
1983-84	6,247,088
1984-85	6,239,908

I shall write to the hon. Member with the other information he requests.

Irish Ambassador

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions since 1969 the Irish ambassador has been summoned to his Department to explain statements made by Irish Ministers or other public persons in the Republic critical of the security forces in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Rifkind: The detailed information requested — covering some 16 years — could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Peace Organisations (Aid)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much grant-in-aid was given to Peace through NATO in 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86; how much aid was given to other organisations working for peace; and if he will list those organisations.

Mr. Rifkind: Peace through NATO received grants-in-aid of £68,000 in 1983-84 and £71,500 in 1984-85. There is a provision for a grant-in-aid of £73,000 in 1985-86.

During the same periods the following organisations working for peace were also given grants-in-aid by the FCO:

	1983-84	1984-85	Provision for 1985-86
British Atlantic Committee	45,000	47,000	49,000
United Nations Association	24,000	24,000	24,000

A grant of £3,000 was given to the Council on Christian Approaches to Defence and Disarmament in the current financial year to help finance its international conference.

Indian Subcontinent (Entry Clearance)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each British diplomatic post in the Indian subcontinent the current expected time from first application to (a) interview and (b) decision for entry clearance for (i) fiancé(e)s and (ii) spouses.

Mr. Eggar: Information on the waiting time between first application and interview on 30 June for fiancés and spouses in the queues was published for the main entry clearance posts in the subcontinent in the quarterly Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration Statistics", table 10 of issue 22/85 copies of which are in the Library of the House. At that time fiancées did not require prior entry clearance. The immigration rules and queueing arrangements were changed on 26 August. The waiting times for the groups in the new queues will not have stabilised until the end of this year.

Each application for entry clearance is treated on its merits and waiting times from first application to decision vary from case to case. Statistics are not, therefore, available.

Ministerial Conference, San José

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to implement the recommendations of the San José conference in September 1984 directed to all European Economic Community and central American countries and, in particular, with respect to developing, extending and diversifying their mutual trade to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. Rifkind: Our policy towards central America is designed to support the efforts of the Contadora group to promote conditions of political stability in which the fundamental social and economic problems of the region can be tackled.

Since the San José meeting, we have been working with our European partners to ensure that the follow-up conference to be held in Luxembourg on 11-12 November will fulfil the commitment entered into at San José to promote stronger economic and political relations between the two regions. We and our partners have remained in close touch with the Governments of central America and the Contadora states. Arrangments for regular political dialogue between the two regions are likely to be agreed at the Luxembourg meeting in November.

In parallel, the European Commission in consultation with members of the Community and the central American countries, have been examining how best to strengthen economic links between the two regions. An economic framework agreement on the lines envisaged in the San José communiqué has been negotiated. It is hoped that this will be signed at the Luxembourg meeting. The agreement will include provision for additional EC aid to central America. The additonal aid will have the objective of promoting inter-regional integration and the development of central America as a whole.

East Timor

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding human rights violations in East Timor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received letters from hon. Members on behalf of Amnesty International and others about human rights in East Timor and understand the concern. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised East Timor with President Soeharto in April. The situation there shows some improvement. I should also refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Field) earlier today.

Indonesia

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Indonesian ambassador in relation to the state of human rights in his country.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister visited Indonesia earlier this year, and we maintain regular contact with the Indonesian authorities. The Indonesian Government are well aware of our position on human rights.

Middle East

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the amendments which were considered by Her Majesty's Government to the statement on the middle east discussed with the two Palestine Liberation Organisation members of the proposed Jordanian/Palestinian delegation; and if he will indicate which of these amendments were acceptable to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Rifkind: The Palestinian members of the joint delegation put forward without commitment the following wording in place of the statement already agreed with the Jordanian Prime Minister:

> The members of the joint delegation reiterated their personal support for a peaceful settlement between Israel and its Arab neighbours on the basis of the relevant United Nations resolutions, including Resolutions 242 and 338 of the Security Council, under the appropriate auspices. They stated that in accordance with these resolutions a settlement should recognise the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination within the context of a Jordanian/Palestinian confederation, as well as the right of all states in the area to exist within the secure recognised boundaries. They confirmed their opposition to all forms of terrorism and violence from whatever source.

We made clear our view that the statement would be acceptable only if it contained an explicit reference to the right of Israel to exist within secure and recognised borders.

DEFENCE

Torpedo Development Programmes

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what action he is taking to improve the financial efficiency of torpedo development programmes in the light of the report of the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government's formal response to the report of the Public Accounts Committee on the torpedo programme will be published in the form of a Treasury minute later this year. It would therefore not be appropriate to anticipate this response at the present time.

Apprentice Training Centre, Rosyth

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the apprentice training centre at Rosyth dockyard if his proposals for commercial management go ahead; whether his Department or the contractor would run the centre; and what obligations will be laid down for its continued support.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Arrangements will be made to ensure the continuation of apprentice training at Rosyth dockyard after commercial management is introduced. Plans are at present being drawn up within my Department and these will be made public in due course.

Saudi Arabia (Warplanes)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent export contract for the supply of warplanes to Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On 26 September 1985, the Minister of Defence and Aviation of Saudi Arabia and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence signed, on behalf of their respective Governments, a memorandum of understanding providing for the purchase by Saudi Arabia of 48 Tornado IDS, 24 Tornado ADV, 30 Hawk and 30 PC-9 aircraft as part of the continued modernisation of the Royal Saudi air force.

The sale will provide much needed work for the British aerospace industry into the 1990s.

ENVIRONMENT

Rate Support Grant

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the amount of rate support grant paid to each London borough and to each metropolitan district in each of the years from 1978-79 to 1985-86 expressed in constant 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information requested is in the following tables, which should be read with the usual explanatory notes.

Notes:

The figures for 1978/79 to 1980/81 comprise needs, resources and domestic elements; those for 1981/82 onwards comprise block grant and domestic rate relief grant.

Prior to 1981/82, no grants were paid to Metropolitan counties or to precepting authorities in London. Resources element was paid only to qualifying rating authorities. Where appropriate, figures for 1981/82 include grant paid in respect of the Greater London Council and the Metropolitan Police; for 1982/83 grant in respect of the Metropolitan Police is included; in subsequent years Metropolitan Police grant was also paid direct. Figures for grant paid over the run of years shown, therefore, are not on a comparable basis.

Grant payments have been revalued to 1985/86 constant prices using the GDP deflator. Figures for 1978/79 to 1982/83 are based upon final entitlements; for later years latest entitlements have been used.

Urban Housing Renewal Unit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities which have received visits from members of his Department's urban housing renewal unit and the number of visits which each has received.

National Housing Stock

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will commission an independent inquiry into the state of the national housing stock and the condition of council housing in particular; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend expects to publish the findings of the Department's recent inquiry into the condition of the local authority housing stock shortly. The next English house condition survey, covering the national housing stock, will take place next year.

Home Purchase Assistance Scheme

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons have made use of the home purchase assistance scheme since 1978; how much has been paid out in each year; what was the maximum value for any one individual when first set up; when last it was revised; and, allowing for inflation, what is its value now in real terms.

Sir George Young: Benefits under the scheme began to be paid in 1980. Since then about 22,000 first-time buyers have received them. The amounts paid out each year are as follows:

£ million

Financial Year	Payments	*Net Cost
1980-81	0·42	0·42
1981-82	3·86	3·86
1982-83	4·36	4·24
1983-84	2·95	2·48
1984-85	2·50	1·60
1985-86†	0·90	0·50

* Amounts paid out in loans and bonuses less repayments of loans and interest charges on delayed repayments.

† To 30 September 1985.

The maximum amount payable to any individual at the scheme's inception was £710, comprising a loan of £600 free of interest and capital repayments for five years, and a once-for-all bonus payment of £110. The level of benefits has not been revised. In the period since the scheme began retail prices have risen by 37 per cent. In terms of the prices prevailing at the time the scheme started the maximum bonus is now worth £69 and the loan £378.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated cost of severance and redundancy payments following abolition of the Merseyside county council.

Mr. Tracey: I have nothing to add to the estimates given in the answer which I received from my right hon. Friend on 30 November 1984, at column 611.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will have discussions with the London residuary body and the residuary bodies in the metropolitan counties about holding their meetings in public.

Mr. Tracey: No.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his meeting with hon. Members representing Liverpool constituencies to discuss the city's budget situation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The five Liverpool Labour Members of Parliament and the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) came to see me on 26 September at their request. I made clear my view that the solution to Liverpool city council's budget problem remained firmly in the hands of the council. Its officers had put before it options which would enable services to be maintained during this financial year, and what was required was the political will to take the necessary decisions. I said that I was not prepared to meet city councillors while they continued to behave unreasonably. There has been no change in my position since that meeting.

Water (Lead Content)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any information on the effectiveness of raising pH levels of water and the addition of orthophosphates to reduce plumbosolvency.

Mr. John Patten: Yes. Information and advice on this subject is contained in "Lead in Potable Water", technical note No. 5, issued by my Department in May 1984. I am sending the hon. Member a copy.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has made an assessment of the need to replace lead piping in water supply systems in order to reduce lead content in water;

(2) if he has made any assessment of the number of dwellings in England and Wales which need replacement of lead piping in order to reduce lead content in water, and of the cost.

Mr. John Patten: As the lead concentration in a dwelling's water supply is dependent on a variety of factors, it is not possible to make any exact assessment of the number of dwellings where pipe replacement would be necessary. Surveys carried out by water undertakers over the last decade at the request of the Government indicate that between 100,000 and 300,000 household may have some pipework that needs to be replaced. This would normally be the property's service pipe and pipework to a drinking water tap, which is the owner's responsibility, and the communication pipe between the water main and the service pipe, which is the water undertaker's responsibility.

The average cost per dwelling is estimated at just over £500; on our estimates, the householder would on average bear about two thirds of this cost. Those costs which fall to the water authorities will be met from within their existing resources.

Croxteth Hall, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the future of Croxteth hall in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has received several representations about the future of Croxteth hall, including those from the trustees of the Sefton Estate, the Friends of Merseyside County Museums and Art Galleries and the Croxteth Hall Community Forum.

My right hon. Friend fully appreciates the strength of local feeling that adequate arrangements must be made for the future of this property.

Housing Stock

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the condition of the local authority housing stock.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply of 23 October, at column 164, to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Nugee Committee

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the report of the Nugee committee on the management of privately owned rented accommodation.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend expects to receive the committee's report shortly.

Merseyside

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give the figures for completions of new dwellings by housing co-operatives and housing associations for the period 1973 to 1984 for all the constituent local authorities of Merseyside;

(2) if he will give the figures for council house completions in the period 1973 to 1984 for all the constituent local authorities of Merseyside.

Sir George Young: The available information reported by the local authorities is as follows:

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the comparative figures for completed improvement grants in the public and private sectors for all of the five constituent local authorities of Merseyside for the period from 1973 to 1984.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Private Water Supplies (Diseases)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of outbreaks of water-borne diseases associated with private water supplies in each of the last 10 years, giving the type of disease, the number of persons involved, and the source of supply.

Mr. Whitney: Information is available only for the last five years and is as follows:

Year	Disease	Number of Persons	Source
1980	Gastroenteritis	Several hundred	4 bore holes (near Leeds)
	Gastroenteritis	160	Holiday Camp (Somerset)
1981	Gastroenteritis	Not known	Youth Hostel (Peak District)
1984	Gastroenteritis	30 guests plus unknown number of staff	Hotel (Cumbria)
	Gastroenteritis	Not known	Primary School (Lake District)

Hospital Pharmaceutical Service

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on manpower in the hospital pharmaceutical service.

Mr. Hayhoe: There were 3,209 (whole-time equivalent) pharmacists in the hospital service in England at 30 September 1984.

I am aware of recruitment difficulties in the basic grade in some areas and I understand that the management side of the Pharmaceutical Whitley council has indicated to the staff side that it would wish to see the settlement of the current pay claim weighted in favour of the pay of basic grade pharmacists who represent about one third of the total. The council is due to meet again on 8 November to continue negotiations.

Kidney Transplants

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of kidney transplants in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of cadaver kidney transplant operations performed in the United Kingdom in each of the past five years, as reported to the United Kingdom transplant service, were as follows:

	Numbers
1980	988
1981	905
1982	1,070
1983	1,144
1984	1,443

The Government launched a campaign in February 1984 to increase public awareness of the benefits of organ transplantation and to promote the donor card scheme, and the encouraging increase in kidney transplant operations performed in 1984 reflects the success of this campaign. Consideration is being given to how the momentum of the campaign might be maintained.

Local Authority Associations (Consultations)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the ground rules circulated within his Department to ensure adequate consultation with the local authority associations in the light of the judgment in R v. Secretary of State for Social Services ex parte the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Mr. Newton: No ground rules have been circulated.

Health Care Provision

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to introduce legislation to establish a statutory national inspectorate to monitor health care provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. Our Department monitors the National Health Service in a whole range of ways, including approval of regional health authorities' plans and review of performance. In addition the Health Advisory Service, while not an inspectorate, operates independently to help maintain and improve patient care in services for mentally ill and elderly people. The national development team for mentally handicapped people serves a similar function.

NHS (Complaints Procedure)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many investigations of complaints under the National Health Service (Service Committees and Tribunals) Regulations 1974 have been carried out in each of the last three years; in how many cases in each of those years there has been a request for an oral hearing; and in how many cases the request has been granted.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the form requested. The hon. Member may, however, find the following information helpful.

	1982	1983	1984
Number of service committees complaints formally investigated	1,395	1,313	1,496
Number of appeals and representations made against the decision of the family practitioner committee	189	245	201
Decisions announced following oral hearings	70	59	55

Silentnight Ltd.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the National Health Service has purchased any beds from Silentnight Ltd. in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Silentnight is not a supplier under the central contract for the provision of mattresses to the National Health Service. Information about health authorities' purchases outside the contract is not held centrally.

Social Workers (Assaults)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of social workers assaulted in the course of their duty in each year since 1979 in respect of which assaults the alleged assailant was subsequently charged with (a) causing actual bodily harm, (b) causing grievous bodily harm, (c) wounding with intent, (d) manslaughter and (e) murder, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Snapethorpe Hospital, Wakefield

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his officials have had any recent discussions with the officials of the Yorkshire regional health authority or the officials of the Wakefield area health authority about the future of Snapethorpe hospital, Wakefield, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Officials have held discussions with Yorkshire regional health authority officials both at my request and also as part of the normal process of assessing the regional strategic plan which was recently submitted.

A possible use that has been suggested locally for Snapethorpe hospital is as a geriatric hospital, and it is in this context that officials have had discussions. I understand that the two health authorities are presently carrying out a full appraisal of the available options for the developments of geriatric services. The results of this exercise are expected later in the year. The health authority will then be better able to make proposals as to the future of Snapethorpe hospital.

Benefit Uprating

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what period of increase in the retail price index the July 1986 benefit uprating will be based.

Mr. Newton: The July 1986 uprating will be based on the movement in the retail price index during the period from May 1985 to January 1986.

Heating Costs (Burnley)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report any housing estates in the Burnley borough council area designated by him as having abnormally high heat costs in accordance with the Supplementary Benefit (Requirement) Regulations, schedule 4, paragraph 11.

Mr. Major: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to paragraph 6 of schedule 4 to the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations, which allows a special rate of supplementary benefit heating addition where the home is part of an estate built with a heating system recognised by the Secretary of State as having disproportionately high running costs. No heating systems in the Burnley borough council area have been so recognised.

Pharmacists

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he proposes to introduce legislation to implement the recent agreement on a new contract for pharmacists reached with the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee, what form the legislation will take, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government remain fully committed to the recent agreements on a new National Health Service contract for community pharmacists and intend introducing the legislation necessary to control entry to the pharmaceutical list at the earliest possible opportunity. Any new legislation will cover both the agreements reached in England and Wales and those in Scotland and Northern Ireland. I cannot at the moment predict when it will be possible to introduce such legislation.

Home Help Schemes

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which local authorities have used joint funding to establish intensive home help schemes for elderly people being discharged from hospital.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information requested is not held centrally. Details of a number of intensive home help schemes, many involving joint finance, are given in the research report "A Sourcebook of Innovations in the Community Care of the Elderly" published by the personal social services research unit at the university of Kent in November 1982. Age Concern England has also published a collection of projects related to mental health in old age, some of which involve home support services funded through joint finance. Two of the pilot projects in the programme established as part of the care in the community initiative involve the use of specially trained home care assistants to provide care to elderly long stay patients leaving hospital. These projects at Winchester and Darlington are being supported from centrally reserved joint finance funds.

General Practitioner-related Ancillary Staff Scheme

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report any abuses known to his Department of the single-handed rural general practitioner-related ancillary staff scheme since its inception.

Mr. Hayhoe: None are known.

Data Protection

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 22 July, Official Report, column 400, if he will make a further statement on his review of the arrangements for preserving confidentiality in all computerised systems in the light of the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Major: We are now well advanced in the process of identifying all the computer systems within the Department which contain personal data and preparing arrangements for registration under the Data Protection Act, and steps have been taken to ensure compliance with the data protection principles. Security officers have been designated for all major data processing projects and installations, and guidance on security standards for computer systems is being prepared. All staff in the Department have been given information about the requirements of the Act, including a reminder of the need to preserve the confidentiality of personal information.

Further information and training will be tailored to the needs of the particular groups of staff handling personal data.

Widows

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensions are being paid to widows residing in India, Bangladesh and Pakistan, of men who worked in the United Kingdom and contributed to the national insurance scheme.

Mr. Major: The number of women living in India, Bangladesh, and Pakistan receiving national insurance widow's benefit on 2 April 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, was 210, 381 and 951 respectively. Some of the 2,587 retirement pensioners in India, the 1,139 in Bangladesh, and 3,145 in Pakistan will be widows receiving pensions on their late husbands' insurance, but we are unable to identify these separately.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for widows' pensions are currently with his Department from widows residing in India, Bangladesh and Pakistan.

Mr. Major: The overseas branch of the Department is currently dealing with 33 widows' benefit claims from widows in India, 171 from widows in Pakistan and 290 from widows in Bangladesh.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures his Department has taken to inform and communicate with widows residing in the Indian sub-continent about their entitlement to national insurance widows' pensions.

Mr. Major: If details of a wife are held at the time of the death of a male beneficiary, a claim form is sent to the widow wherever she is. In addition special arrangements have been made with the State bank of India and the Sonali bank in Bangladesh to help widows to make claims and to obtain the necessary documentary evidence which is required. Although it has not been possible to make the same arrangements with the Habib bank in Pakistan, it acts as paying agents and gives limited assistance to claimants. The Department also co-operates with representatives of claimants where there are language difficulties. Leaflet FB2, "Which Benefit", is now available in Bengali, Gujerati, Hindi, Punjabi and Urdu.

Women (Retirement Pension)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women, in each year from 1979 to 1984, claimed a retirement pension based on contributions paid or credited for the period before 5 July 1948; and how many of these claims were followed by an award of pension based (i) entirely on contributions paid or credited for the period before July 1948 and (ii) partly on such contributions; and in each case what was the average pension awarded.

Mr. Major: There is no central statistical analysis of claimants' insurance records which would indicate the specific periods of the working life during which contributions accrued on which title to retirement pension is based.

I regret therefore that the information requested is not available.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for family income supplement following the miners' strike have (a) been referred to tribunal, (b) been heard, (c) remain to be heard and (d) have been determined: (i) in favour and (ii) against the appellant, in each Department of Health and Social Security region.

Mr. Newton: Appeals against the disallowance of a claim to family income supplement made by families of striking miners were recorded from 4 July 1984. Since then 959 claims from striking miners have been referred to the social security appeal tribunals. Of these 517 have been heard, 357 have been withdrawn by the claimant at the hearing and 85 are still outstanding. Of the claims heard, 27 were allowed and 490 were disallowed by the tribunal. The 27 cases allowed were referred to the commissioner. Figures are not available on a regional basis.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many striking miners' families made claims for family income supplement during the 1984-85 strike; and how many of these claims were met.

Mr. Newton: From September 1984, when separate records were kept, there were around 2,700 claims to family income supplement from families of striking miners. All were disallowed.

Benefits

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be publishing the 1983 statistics for social security benefits.

Mr. Major: 1983 statistics on many social security benefits were included in "Social Security Statistics 1984". 1983 statistics on most other benefits will be included in the next volume of "Social Security Statistics" planned for publication in the spring of 1986.

In addition copies of the full set of tabulated figures from the 1983 supplementary benefit annual statistical inquiry will be deposited in the Library and made available from the DHSS leaflets unit at the end of November 1985.

Hospital Services (Chesterfield)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the occupancy rate of beds at the new hospital in Chesterfield.

Mr. Whitney: Beds in the new Chesterfield and North Derbyshire royal hospital were first opened on 29 April 1984. During that year, and into 1985, as beds were brought into use, there were further openings. For the period from 1 January to 31 December 1984, the period covered by data so far submitted to the Department, an average of 293 beds were recorded as available daily: the average number occupied was 175, giving an occupancy rate of 60 per cent.

Dental Fillings

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make non-mercury-amalgam dental fillings available to National Health Service patients for fillings in any type of tooth.

Mr. Hayhoe: Dental filling materials other than amalgam, including gold, porcelain, silicate, glass ionomer and silico-phosphate cements, together with resin based composite materials are already available for the restoration of teeth within the general dental service of the National Health Service. Most of these materials are either unsuitable or are insufficiently tested for normal use in restoring cavities of all types in all teeth; their use for certain fillings therefore in exceptional circumstances, where amalgam may in the clinical judgment of the dentist be inappropriate, requires the prior approval of the Dental Estimates Board.

Notifiable Communicable Diseases

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is (a) the number and category of suspected and confirmed cases of notifiable communicable diseases, (b) the number of special beds designated and their location and (c) the number of registered fever nurses or their successors employed in the National Health Service, for each district and regional health authority in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Whitney: Data on notifications of communicable diseases for each Regional Health Authority are published in annual volumes of "Communicable Disease Statistics" for the years 1979 to 1983 and its predecessor "Statistics of Infectious Diseases" for the years 1974 to 1978. Copies of these publications are held in the Library. Numbers of suspected cases are not routinely aggregated. The information is not available at district health authority level.

Information about the number of beds available in the specialities of infectious diseases and tropical medicine and the number of registered fever nurses is given in the tables. The register of fever nurses has been closed since 1967. Some registered general nurses undertake special post-basic training in this area but information on the number of staff thus qualified is not held centrally.

"Health for All" Strategy

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has given to district health authorities, local authorities and any other relevant organisations on policy towards implementation of the World Health Organisation's health for all strategy in relation to each of its six major themes.

Mr. Hayhoe: We are considering how the World Health Organisation's strategy for achieving health for all may best be drawn to the attention of the National Health Service and other interested authorities and organisations.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make public the two-yearly monitoring reports, from 1983 onwards, and six yearly evaluations of progress, from 1985 onwards, which the Government submit to the regional committee of the World Health Organisation and WHA in furtherance of the World Health Organisation's health for all strategy.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have today placed in the Library, along with the relevant questionnaires, copies of the two reports—the 1983 monitoring report and the 1985 evaluation report—so far submitted on behalf of the United Kingdom to the European regional office of the World Health Organisation. The first six-yearly evaluation report is not due until 1991.

Park Hospital, North Derbyshire

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the limits on free time, in terms of when and for how long it lasts, for consultants categorised as maximum part-time consultants at Park hospital, north Derbyshire; if he will list the sessions these surgeons undertake for the National Health Service, by day and time; whether these consultants' free time private sessions ever overlap with their National Health Service sessions; and whether any checks are made as to whether these surgeons are fulfilling their National Health Service contracts.

Mr. Hayhoe: We do not collect centrally such detailed information. The hon. Member may therefore wish to make inquiries of the chairman of the Trent regional health authority.

Day Care

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the number of day care places in (i) day centres for the elderly and (ii) local authority residential homes for the elderly, (b) the rate per thousand population and (c) the percentage change of day care places for people over 75 years and between 60 and 75 years, respectively, for each of the years 1978 to 1985, inclusive.

Mr. Whitney: The available information on the number of day care places for the elderly for the years 1978 to 1984 is given in the table: data for 1985 are not yet available. Further details are given in the Department's booklet "Adult Training Centres for the Mentally Handicapped and Day Centres for the Mentally Ill, the Elderly and the Younger Physically Handicapped (at 31 March)", copies of which are available in the Library. It is not possible to give figures separately for age groups over or below the age of 75.

* The data do not include the growing number of places in 'mixed' day centres, of which an unspecified number are for the elderly.

Homoeopathy

Sir John Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the total expenditure in each region of the National Health Service on homoeopathy in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information requested is not collected centrally. Health authorities' annual accounts submitted to the Department do not distinguish between expenditure on homoeopathy and expenditure on other forms of treatment.

Disabled Persons (Rehabilitation)

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision exists for higher level training for health professionals, for example at universities, aimed at identifying need and providing for the rehabilitation of the disabled.

Mr. Hayhoe: Doctors wishing to specialise in rehabilitation medicine will have completed a period of postgraduate training before entering a four-year period of higher training which combines clinical, teaching, organisational and administrative experience. Doctors in other specialties may also train in rehabilitation.

Instruction for trainee general practitioners is given during vocational training including during their day release course. Regional advisers in general practice and organisers of continuing education courses for GPs are developing the concept of multi-disciplinary learning for trainees and for established principals. Courses of this type are also being organised by the department of general practice at Exeter university. These courses involve nurses and therapists.

The English National Board for Nursing Midwifery and Health Visiting approves a number of post-registration courses concerned with rehabilitation. In addition occupational health nurses have a rehabilitation component as an integral part of the course which leads to the OHN certificate approved by the Royal College of Nursing.

As regards the remedial professions, the professional bodies run post-basic courses. There are opportunities for members of these professions to undertake remedial studies as part of post-graduate courses at Southampton university, at the Polytechnic of Central London and Lanchester college, Coventry. The education development unit for the remedial professions, under the aegis of the National Health Service Training Authority, promotes the development of on-going education.

Child Care

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what discussions he has had with local authorities and voluntary organisations about joint funding for the care of children who have left mental hospitals;

(2) in what percentage of cases children who are released from mental hospitals return to the parental or family home;

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure that full and adequate community care is provided for children who are released from mental hospitals;

(4) under which health authorities the children who leave mental hospitals are reviewed for their health, social service and educational needs;

(5) how many children have been admitted to mental hospitals in each of the last five years; and if he will name the hospitals and their locations;

(6) if he will list the record for each regional health authority, in each of the past five years, of releasing children from mental hospitals;

(7) what are the numbers of children in each of the last five years who have ceased to be included in statistics as children in mental hospitals because they reached the age of 16 years;

(8) what has been the change over the last five years in the number of children under the age of 16 years who are in mental hospitals;

(9) how many children under the age of 16 years are in mental hospitals with 25 or more beds; if he will name the hospitals and their locations; and if he will make a statement;

(10) on what date he estimates that all children will be removed from long-stay mental handicap hospitals.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the right hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about his review of child care law; what changes he envisages in the near future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The review of child care law which was the report to Ministers of an inter-departmental working party was published on 4 October as a consultative document. We have asked for comments by 15 January 1986 and will then decide what action to take.

Erith and District Hospital

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received to date on the future of Erith and District hospital.

Mr. Whitney: None.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will introduce legislation to compensate for loss of pension those unemployed persons taking a reduced early pension in consequence of the supplementary benefit notional resources regulations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of unemployed persons in receipt of supplementary benefit, whose benefit is reduced because they have an entitlement to an early reduced pension from a former employer;

(3) how many submissions have been made to his headquarters from local offices in respect of deductions in supplementary benefit to unemployed persons who have a choice of a reduced early pension from a former employer.

Mr. Major: Regulation 4(2)(a) of the Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Regulations (SI 1981/1527) provides that any resource which would become available to a member of the assessment unit upon application duly being made, but which has not been acquired by him may if, in the opinion of the adjudication officer it is reasonable in the circumstances to do so, be treated as if it were possessed by him. Information on the number of persons to whom this provision has been applied because of entitlement to an early reduced pension is not available. Our headquarters received one submission on the matter in 1981 and I understand that the office of the Chief Adjudication Officer has in recent weeks given guidance to a local office in an individual case. We have no plans at present either to amend the existing law or to introduce legislation providing for compensation in such cases.

Supplementary Benefit (Greenock)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for those offices covering the Greenock travel-to-work area, what is the total number of unemployed people claiming supplementary benefit during the last month for which figures are available; and what are the figures for the comparable month in 1984;

(2) for those offices covering the Greenock travel-to-work area, what is the total number of supplementary benefit appeals registered during the last month for which statistics are available;

(3) for those offices covering the Greenock travel-to-work area, what is the total number of supplementary benefit claimants for the last month for which statistics are available and the figure for the comparable month in 1984.

Mr. Major: The numbers of people receiving supplementary benefit from the four local offices serving the Greenock travel-to-work area are set out in the following table:

	July 1985		July 1984
	Unemployed Claimants	All Claimants	Unemployed Claimants	All Claimants
Greenock	4,280	11,101	4,100	10,748
Port Glasgow	2,189	5,006	2,068	4,723

Johnstone	3,729	7,917	3,790	7,863

Source: 100% count of cases in action.

The number of supplementary benefits appeals registered during the four-week period up to 24 September 1985 was:

	Number
Greenock	59
Port Glasgow	12
Paisley	104
Johnstone	28

Limited List Prescribing

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of experience of the operation of the limited list over the past six months, he will now update the projected annual savings in cost to the National Health Service expected to arise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The limited information so far available is generally in line with the forecast annual saving of £75 millions.

Benefits (Statutory Instruments)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many statutory instruments concerned with benefits, other than supplementary benefit and unemployment benefit, were laid in each of the years 1980 to 1984; how many have been laid so far in 1985; and what is the annual cost of printing them.

Mr. Major: The information in the form requested is as follows:

Year	Statutory Instruments (SIs)
1980	14
1981	10
1982	19
1983	21
1984	24
1985 so far	13

The cost of printing SIs is borne by Her Majesty's Stationery Office which recovers the costs itself.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many statutory instruments concerned with supplementary benefit were laid in each of the years 1980 to 1984; how many have been laid so far in 1985; and what is the annual cost of printing them.

Mr. Major: The information in the form requested is as follows:

Year	Statutory Instruments (SIs)
1980	15
1981	12
1982	8
1983	11
1984	7
1985 so far	6

The cost of printing SIs is borne by Her Majesty's Stationery Office which recovers the costs itself.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many statutory instruments concerned with unemployment benefit were laid in each of the years 1980 to 1984; how many have been laid so far in 1985; and what is the annual cost of printing them.

Mr. Major: The information in the form requested is as follows:

Year	Statutory Instruments (SIs)
1980	NIL
1981	2
1982	3
1983	1
1984	1
1985 so far	NIL

The cost of printing SIs is borne by Her Majesty's Stationery Office which recovers the costs itself.

Leeds Health Authorities (Revenue Allocations)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out at 1982 prices the revenue allocations for (a) Leeds western district health authority and (b) Leeds eastern district health authority for 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Hayhoe: Revenue allocation to district health authorities is a matter for regional health authorities. The hon. Member may wish to seek information from the chairman of the Yorkshire regional health authority.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what efforts are being made by his Department to notify people presently entitled to severe disablement allowance and new claimants of their full entitlements and of possible extra benefits available because of needs arising from their disabilities.

Mr. Newton: We are currently carrying out a national advertising campaign directed at encouraging claims from people who are phased in to the benefit at the end of November. This reinforces a similar campaign last year aimed at people included at the start of the benefit. The explanatory leaflet accompanying the claim form includes information about the other benefits available to handicapped people. Details of some of these benefits are also given in our handbook "Non-contributory Benefits for disabled people", a new edition of which is in preparation.

Departmental Office, Huyton

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of hours of overtime worked in the Huyton office of his Department in each of the last five years and to date in 1985.

Mr. Major: The hours of overtime worked in the Huyton office are as follows:

Year	Hours
1981-82	4,508
1982-83	9,996
1983-84	2,237
1984-85	10,640

The overtime hours worked from 10 April 1985 to 24 September 1985 (the latest date for which accounts are held) are 12,950.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the annual cost of the overtime worked in each of the last five years and to date in 1985 in constant terms in the Huyton office of his Department.

Mr. Major: The annual cost in constant terms of overtime worked in Huyton office in each of the last five years and to date in 1985 is as follows:

Year	Cost (£)
1981-82	31,544
1982-83	69,934
1983-84	15,646
1984-85	74,441

The cost of overtime from 10 April 1985 to 24 September 1985, the latest date for which accounts are held, is £90,605.

These figures are based on 1984-85 average costs of overtime in the Department.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the reduction in personnel in the Huyton office of his Department over the last three years; and what savings have resulted from the reduction in staff.

Mr. Major: Information is available only for the last two years. On 1 April 1983 there were 160 staff in post, on 1 April 1985 the corresponding figure was 153.

The seven posts resulted in a saving of £51,576 based on 1984-85 average salaries costs.

Rates

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the response of local authorities to his proposal to enforce a requirement to pay 20 per cent. of the rates bill.

Mr. Newton: Over 400 local authorities commented on many aspects of the Green Paper proposals. Their responses are still being analysed.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether exceptionally severe weather payments will be available during the winter of 1985-86; and if he will make a statement on the changes he proposes as a result of the experience of the winter of 1984-85.

Mr. Newton: We hope to make an announcement shortly, taking account of last winter's experience.

Child Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to uprate child benefit in 1986.

Mr. Newton: The rate of child benefit from the next general uprating in July 1986 will be determined at the appropriate time.

Social Security Review

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many individuals have signed petitions or postcards addressed to him in response to the proposals of his social security reviews.

Mr. Newton: About 128,000.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if loans paid from his proposed social fund are to be deductible from child benefit and pensions as well as from supplementary benefits.

Mr. Newton: Detailed proposals in these and other respects are still under consideration in the light of comments made in the consultation period on the Green Paper. Our conclusions will be set out in the White Paper.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he plans with interested parties after the publication of his White Paper on the social security reviews.

Mr. Newton: The White Paper will contain the Government's major decisions on the reform of social security. The legislation to give effect to the White Paper will be fully debated in Parliament. In addition we shall consult interested bodies as necessary on the details of change.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the calculations of the consultants' report on the additional staff numbers that will have to be recruited on a temporary basis to administer the new benefit system proposed in his Green Paper on the reviews.

Mr. Newton: We shall consider this when the final decisions on proposals for the reform of social security have been taken.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish a table showing, in percentages, the responses in favour and against, the main recommendations of his social security Green Paper;

(2) if he will list those organisations which supported his proposals to (a) abolish the state earnings-related pension scheme, (b) create a social fund, (c) abolish heating additions, (d) abolish the death grant, (e) abolish the maternity grant and (f) impose a 20 per cent. rates requirement on supplementary benefit claimants.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply at column 129 on 22 October.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many organisations and individuals responded during the consultation period of his social security reviews.

Mr. Newton: Over 7,000.

Radio Therapy (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of radiotherapy units which have been closed in National Health Service hospitals in the west midlands region since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to seek information from the chairman of West Midlands regional health authority.

Maternity Allowance

Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to amend the regulations relating to the maternity allowance to permit a woman who is widowed during pregnancy or shortly after childbirth to receive maternity allowance.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about changes in the regulations governing the payment of maternity allowances to women widowed during pregnancy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have at present no proposals to change the rules which prevent the simultaneous payment to the same person of two benefits intended for personal maintenance. However, a number of representations on the point raised by my hon. Friend have recently been received, mainly arising from a resolution passed by the National Union of Townswomen's Guilds. The National Union has itself written to me about it, referring to the social security review, and its representations will accordingly be considered alongside other suggestions made in the course of consultation on the Green Paper.

St. Luke's Hospital, Bradford

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when it is envisaged that construction of the new St. Luke's hospital in Bradford will commence.

Mr. Whitney: The Yorkshire regional health authority is planning to commence construction of the new St. Luke's hospital in Bradford in 1988.

Dental Charges

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will extend the exemption from dental charges to those women who have borne a child in such a way that the exemption period for dental treatment extends to the end of the month in which the child's first birthday falls;

(2) if he will introduce a special item into the dental fee scale to pay for preventive advice for expectant and nursing mothers concerning the care of children's teeth and the prevention of dental disease;

(3) if he will remove the prior approval conditions under items 3 and 5 of the dental fee scale for pregnant women and for those who have borne a child within the previous 12 months;

(4) if he has any plans to extend exemptions from dental charges to women who become pregnant during a course of dental treatment.

Mr. Hayhoe: I will let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the trend in the size of the income tax base in real terms in the past decade, after taking account of the costs of all reliefs against income tax.

Mr. Moore: The estimates below are of the movement (at constant prices) of the total taxable income of individuals less deductions and personal allowances. Figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are provisional.

Year	Index (1975-76 = 100)
1975-76	100·0
1976-77	99·3
1977-78	89·7
1978-79	102·3
1979-80	104·4
1980-81	102·1
1981-82	103·1
1982-83	103·0
1983-84	105·5
1984-85	102·3

"Official Report" (Price)

Mr. Thornton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the price of the Official Report.

Mr. Gow: Following a review by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, I have authorised an increase of 55p in the price of the daily part, with corresponding increases in the prices of weekly parts, indexes, Standing Committee debates, bound volumes and subscription rates. The scale of charges for reprints of Members' speeches appearing in the Official Report will also be raised. Despite these increases Hansard will still receive a substantial subsidy.

Capital Allowances (Factories and Workshops)

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to re-establish the 100 per cent. capital allowance for the building of factories or workshops of up to 1,000 sq ft.

Mr. Moore: I have no plans to do so.

VAT (Housing Improvements)

Mr. Lawler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total receipts collected by his Department from the value added tax on housing improvements in the last fiscal year.

Mr. Gow: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on recent reports on the likely trends of unemployment in the United Kingdom during 1986, contained in documents issued by the International Monetary Fund and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Palace of Westminster

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will seek to deter seagulls from the Terrace of the Houses of Parliament, and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to expedite the removal of seagull droppings from the Terrace of the Houses of Parliament, and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Unfortunately, my right hon. Friend has no powers of control over visits to the Terrace of uninvited birds, whether seagulls or any other variety. Such visitors have been unusually prolific this year, perhaps due to the improved catering facilities, the hospitality of Members, or the declining prospects over the river at County Hall. The normal cleaning arrangements have been adjusted to cope with the additional burden falling on them.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the cost of cleaning the fabric of the Houses of Parliament since 1979.

Sir George Young: The programme of stonework repair, restoration and conservation began in July 1981. Costs of each phase so far are as follows:

Phase I	New Palace Yard	293,700
Phase II	House of Lords, West Front	761,000
Phase III	Speaker's Green	614,000
Phase IV	Clock Tower	*1,750,000
Phase V	Terrace	*1,800,000

Furan and Dioxins

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any information about the potential production of dioxins or furans during the combustion of polyvinyl chloride materials in municipal refuse incinerators; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: There are conflicting views about the role of the various potential chlorine sources, including polyvinyl chloride, in the formation of trace quantities of dioxins and furans during the complex combustion processes taking place in municipal refuse incinerators. However, investigations are currently being carried out by the Warren Spring Laboratory, designed amongst other things to test the content of dioxins and furans in the flue gases from municipal incinerators.

Polychlorinated Biphenyl Wastes

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if there are any plans to bring up to date and correct waste management paper No. 6 on polychlorinated biphenyl wastes.

Mrs. Rumbold: While the general guidance given in this paper still holds good, work on a second edition is already in hand in order to reflect current United Kingdom and international knowledge, and to strengthen the guidance on disposal of PCB wastes. Publication will be in the first half of 1986.

Grant-related Expenditure Assessments

Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about grant-related expenditure assessments for local authorities in England in 1986-87.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In response to requests from the local authority associations and many individual authorities, I have sent to all local authorities in England details of their provisional GREs for 1986-87. Copies have been placed in the Library and in the Vote Office. For the first time this provides them with information about GREs some six weeks in advance of the RSG settlement.

Council House Sales

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council house tenants have bought their own home since the introduction of right-to-buy legislation; of these figures how many bought were flats; and if he will break down these figures by region and also give the figures for Leicester.

Sir George Young: Between October 1980 and June 1985 an estimated 482,400 right-to-buy sales were completed by local authorities and new towns in England, including 16,300 flats. Corresponding figures reported by Leicester city council were 3,907 houses and eight flats.

I am placing in the Library the regular table showing sales by individual local authorities by region. This includes numbers of dwellings sold under the right to buy and total flats sold since April 1979, including voluntary sales.

Solarite House, Wednesbury

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied that the urban development grant made concerning Solarite house, Wednesbury, Birmingham, met the appropriate criteria.

Sir George Young: I wrote to my hon. Friend about this case on 23 September.

Community Trade Mark Office

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will investigate the Property Services Agency portfolio of central London buildings and nominate a site for the proposed Community Trade Mark office.

Sir George Young: I shall be assisting my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in reviewing and assessing all the potential sites for the proposed Community Trade Mark office, including any suitable ones within the Property Services Agency's portfolio.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to provide finance to objectors and to county councils at public inquiries on nuclear waste dumping proposals.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is not Government policy to give financial aid to local authorities and objectors at public inquiries of this nature.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether sanctions and penalties on council spending will be incurred by special expenditure by councils in relation to public inquiries into nuclear waste dumping proposals.

Mrs. Rumbold: The system of expenditure targets and grant holdback will be abandoned from the financial year 1986-87, and so will not apply to any expenditure of this nature. However, the general constraints of the block grant machinery will continue to apply to revenue spending by local authorities, including expenditure on public inquiries.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) in what way and at what stage he intends to consult the National Radiological Protection Board on NIREX's proposals for nuclear waste dumps;

(2) in what way and at what stage he intends to consult the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee on NIREX's proposals for nuclear waste dumps;

(3) if he will publish the principles by which schemes for nuclear waste dumps will be assessed by him under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960.

Mrs. Rumbold: The National Radiological Protection Board and the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee have already been consulted on the principles to be applied in considering any projects for disposal facilities for low and intermediate level wastes. These principles have already been published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in the document "Disposal Facilities on Land for Low and Intermediate-Level Radioactive Wastes: Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment". In addition, the board has published its own guidance on assessing the acceptability of sites for disposal. It is not the current intention to consult the board or the committee on specific projects. These would fall to be considered at a public inquiry in the light of the published principles.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how it is proposed to deposit or store, in the long term, the volume of intermediate-level waste currently stored in a temporary repository at Harwell.

Mrs. Rumbold: Radioactive waste packaged for deep ocean disposal in 1983 remains in a dry storage building at Harwell. A decision on its disposal has been deferred pending the results of the study by the Department of the best practicable disposal options for this and other low and intermediate-level wastes.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment has been made of the effect on the volume of radioactive waste produced in the United Kingdom of the eventual decommissioning of the United Kingdom civil reactor programme.

Mrs. Rumbold: The inventory of radioactive wastes kept jointly by my Department and NIREX includes decommissioning wastes estimated to arise up to the year 2029. The relevant figures, which are published in the annual reports of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee, are based on the CEGB estimates for decommissioning typical Magnox and AGR power stations.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when and by what means he intends to announce the proposed sites which NIREX wishes to investigate as possibly suitable for the disposal of short lived and medium term nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1985, c. 255]: NIREX has told me that it is making good progress towards a final list of possible sites. It should be possible for it to announce candidate sites for detailed geological investigation before the end of the year. It is in everyone's interest that delay should be kept to a minimum. It is also in everyone's interest that the best possible sites are chosen.

Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee and their qualifications and indicate how often it meets.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee holds one-day meetings five times a year and normally undertakes one visit a year to installations of interest. Current members and their qualifications are as follows:

Local Authorities (Legal Proceedings)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will update his reply of 30 January, Official Report, column 174, about local authorities which have commenced or have given notice of their intention to commence legal proceedings against him in respect of the administration of block grant, expenditure guidance and grant holdback whether by way of an action for judicial review, for a declaration or otherwise since 1 April 1981, summarising the grounds upon which the actions were stated to have been brought and, where appropriate, the outcome.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Following is the information.

Urban Aid Grants

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have received urban aid grants for the refurbishment of specific housing estates in the last three years.

Sir George Young: Six local authorities have received offers of urban development grant towards eight projects for the refurbishment or conversion of council housing for sale to owner-occupiers. Many of the authorities for the 48 districts designated under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978 have also received urban programme grant towards additional facilities or environmental improvements on council estates. In addition, 12 community refurbishment schemes on council estates have been approved for urban programme grant.

Local Authority Information (Public Access)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of local authorities since the implementation of the Local Government (Access to Information) Act who have started to levy charges on members of the public wishing to inspect documents and if he will list those authorities.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department does not collect information of the kind the hon. Member seeks.

Portsdown Park, Portsmouth

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received an application from Portsmouth city council for a grant towards the refurbishment of the Portsdown Park housing estate.

Sir George Young: No. The leader of Portsmouth city council has written to my right hon. Friend recently asking whether a possible scheme for the refurbishment of the estate would qualify for urban development grant. I have replied to that letter today.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Lear Fan Project

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement on the winding up of the Lear Fan project.

Dr. Boyson: It is unlikely that any substantial recoupment of the public funds invested in the Lear Fan project will be achieved by sale of physical assets owned by Lear Fan Ltd. in either the United States or in the United Kingdom. Such recoupment appears to be wholly dependant on the sale and subsequent successful development of the Lear Fan technology rights. The receiver of Lear Fan Ltd. (appointed by the Government), those who invested private funds in the project and the US trustee in bankruptcy are currently discussing the possibility of establishing a new company to market the technology rights.

The new company shareholding would be allocated on the basis of the investment made by the respective parties and the rights they hold in respect of the project. The US trustee in bankruptcy could decide to take out a shareholding in the new company. If so the Government, who even if a new company is formed will still be creditors of Lear Fan Ltd., would be entitled to a proportion of any benefits ultimately accruing to the trustee in respect of his shareholding in the new company. Formation of a new company will require the approval of the United States Bankruptcy Court.

The receiver has had some discussions with a consortium about the possible acquisition of the project; but there is no question of any further Government investment even if there are proposals to exploit the project within the United Kingdom.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the cases during the last three years in which a prison sentence imposed for a scheduled offence has been reduced under the prerogative, indicating the respective offences, sentences and reductions.

Mr. Scott: The information is not readily available in the form requested and it is not our practice to give details of release under the Royal prerogative of mercy. However, the numbers of persons released under the Royal prerogative of mercy since 1980 were published most recently in my reply to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross), at columns 57-58.

Teaching Staff (Higher Education)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many teaching staff were employed in public sector higher education in Northern Ireland for each year since 1979.

Mr. Scott: The following figures, which relate to academic years, are approximate.

	Full-time	Part-time
1978-79	702	164
1979-80	712	142
1980-81	719	147
1981-82	723	135
1982-83	721	176
1983-84	712	175
1984-85	142	65

Note:

The Ulster polytechnic merged with New University of Ulster to form the University of Ulster on 1 October 1984. Academic staff of the two Northern Ireland universities are excluded.

Her Majesty's Prison, Armagh

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, in July, August and September, respectively, if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched, whether any prison contraband smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items, in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted, and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance at Armagh courthouse on remand, attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons.

Mr. Scott: During July 1985 a total of 28 searches were carried out on 22 prisoners; 16 prisoners were searched once and six were searched twice. During August 1985, there was a total of 25 searches carried out on 14 prisoners; three prisoners were searched once and 11 were searched twice. During September 1985, there were 21 searches carried out on 14 prisoners; nine prisoners were searched once, three prisoners were searched twice, and two prisoners were searched three times. No prohibited article was found during these searches and no prisoner refused to be searched. Searches were carried out in the following circumstances:

	July	August	September
First admission on remand and awaiting trial	6	2	5
First admission on sentence and final discharge	13	15	11
Attending Armagh Remand Court	1	—	—
Attending other Remand Courts	1	—	2
Bail Court appearance	3	2	—
Home Leave Scheme	3	4	2
Inter-Prison Visits	—	2	—
Visits to outside hospital	1	—	1

Motorways (Road Works)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions during the last 12 months, the hard shoulder on the M2 and the M5 motorways out of Belfast has been used during road works or diversions, and of these, on how many occasions signs were placed to direct motorists to use the hard shoulder.

Mr. Needham: On one occasion, and appropriate signing was provided.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to require signs to be placed in future on motorways during road works at diversions to indicate to motorists that the hard shoulder may be used.

Mr. Needham: Where motorists are required to use the hard shoulder on motorways in Northern Ireland during roadworks or diversions, adequate signing will be provided.

TRANSPORT

Hillingdon

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what consultations he has had with London Regional Transport about the cost of constructing a new London Regional Transport station at Hillingdon as part of the blue scheme for the improvement of the A40 Western Avenue;

(2) whether any part of the cost of the new London Regional Transport station at Hillingdon is part of the blue scheme for the improvement of the A40 Western Avenue will fall on his Department's Vote.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department, through its consulting engineers for the A40 Long Lane road improvement scheme, has held preliminary meetings with London Underground Ltd. about the reconstruction of Hillingdon station.

The normal equivalent reinstatement basis of compensation will apply.

M25

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many additional contracts have been issued to the contractor and consultants responsible for the Wisley to Reigate section of the M25; and if he will list those projects.

Mrs. Chalker: Three contracts were let for the construction of the sections of the M25 between Wisley and Reigate:

(i) Leatherhead interchange—
Awarded to Balfour Beatty Ltd. on 14 June 1982 at £14·1 million.

(ii) Wisley-Leatherhead section—
Awarded to Fairclough Civil Engineering Ltd. on 5 October 1982 at £15·4 million.

(iii) Leatherhead-Reigate section—
Awarded to Bovis Civil Engineering Ltd.* in consortium with Peter Birse Ltd. on 21 April 1983 at £14·6 million.

* On 9 November 1984 Bovis Civil Engineering Ltd. was purchased by the Farr Group Ltd. and the name changed to A. E. Farr Ltd.

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the eventual length of the M25 and how many miles of the M25 are (a) floodlit and (b) have a crash barrier.

Mrs. Chalker: The eventual length of the actual M25 will be 117 miles excluding the Dartford tunnel and the approach roads. Approximately 40 miles are lit at present and safety fences are provided throughout the entire length of the open sections except for 1·8km between junctions 11 and 12 which has a very wide central reserve.

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what studies were undertaken before his Department selected a three-lane carriageway on the M25, and how many motorways in England are four lane;

(2) if he is satisfied that a three-lane carriageway is adequate for all sections of the M25; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Comprehensive studies to predict traffic flows were carried out in the design stages of the M25. The choice of carriageway width was based on these predictions. The M25 is generally dual three-lane, but dual four-lanes have been provided between junctions 13 (Staines interchange) and 15 (M4). The adjoining sections from junction 11 (Chertsey interchange) and to junction 16 (M40) have been built with dual three-lanes, but in a way which will facilitate the future provision of fourth lanes should that prove necessary.

There are six other sections of four-lane motorway in England, mostly short lengths between adjacent junctions.

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the contractors and consultants who built the Wisley to Reigate section of the M25;

(2) what was the original date for the completion of the Wisley to Reigate section of the M25 as notified to his Department by the contractors and consultants.

Mrs. Chalker: The M25 between Wisley and Reigate was constructed under the following main contracts:—

Section of M25	Contractor	Original Contract Completion Date	Revised Contract Completion Date
A3 to Chatley Heath	Balfour Beatty Ltd.	30 August 1983	26 June 1984
Chatley Heath to Leatherhead	Fairclough Civil Engineering Ltd.	5 November 1984	9 September 1985
Leatherhead interchange	Balfour Beatty Ltd.	15 April 1985	—
Leatherhead to Reigate	Birse Farr (formerly—Bovis/Birse) Joint Venture	23 December 1984	9 September 1985

All the contracts were supervised by W. S. Atkins & Partners, Consulting Engineers.

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the precise nature of the problem which delayed the opening of the Wisely to Reigate section of the M25; and what is his Department's proposal for overcoming future maintenance problems on this section.

Mrs. Chalker: On the advice of Surrey county council it was decided that all the sections of the M25 between Wisley and Reigate should be opened at the same time. It was not possible to open the last section between Leatherhead and Reigate on the contract completion date of 9 September 1985 because of the need to repair joints formed in the concrete slabs and hairline cracks appearing in the slabs. Some repairs remain to be completed in the normal maintenance period of 12 months following completion. These repairs, together with any other maintenance needed, will be so arranged as to minimise delays to traffic.

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport what studies his Department has made on traffic volume between Reigate and the Heathrow exit on the M25; and if he will publish those studies.

Mrs. Chalker: The latest estimated forecasts of traffic flows on the Reigate to Heathrow sections per 16-hour day in 1987, the expected first full year of operation of the complete M25, are in the following ranges:

Section of M25
From	To	Vehicles per day (000s)
A217	A243	44 to 53
A243	A3	50 to 58
A3	A320	61 to 80
A320	M3	72 to 85
M3	A30	67 to 80
A30	Airport spur	78 to 85
Airport spur	M4	78 to 85

Motorways (Coaches)

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport what studies his Department has made of the consequences of confining coaches to the centre and inner lanes of motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: As coaches are not confined to the centre and inside lanes of motorways, specific studies cannot be made. I have already announced that I am looking very carefully at every aspect of the speed and safety of coaches on motorways, including lane usage.

Motorways (Surfacing)

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport what advice his Department gives to contractors over the choice of tarmac or concrete for motorway surfacing.

Mrs. Chalker: Unless there are engineering reasons to the contrary, contractors are provided with designs for concrete and bituminous pavement construction, and invited to tender prices for both. The designs are in accordance with the Department's standards, and materials and construction must be in accordance with the Department's specification. Those criteria ensure that either form of construction would normally be equally acceptable. The contract is then awarded on the basis of the lowest tender, which ensures that the most economical form of construction is adopted, and therefore ultimately determines the type of material that is used.

Air India Boeing 747 (Crash)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has had consultations with the aviation authorities of Canada, Ireland and India regarding the cause of the loss of the Air India Boeing 747 off the coast of Ireland in June 1985; what advice on the matter he has received from the Civil Aviation Authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The responsibility for the accident investigation into the loss of the Air India Boeing 747 lies with the Indian Government, with assistance from the state of manufacture.

I have had no consultations with the aviation authorities of India, Canada and Ireland regarding the cause of this tragic accident, but the Civil Aviation Authority, which is solely responsible for United Kingdom aviation safety regulation, is keeping in touch with all the relevant authorities pending the outcome of the accident investigation.

My accident investigation branch is also keeping in close touch with all the authorities concerned and is providing assistance to the Indian authorities when requested.

Second-hand Tyres

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further measures he intends to take concerning the dangers of second-hand tyres; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Existing regulations prohibit the use and sale of sub-standard tyres, whether new or second-hand. I have recently advised motorists to check the condition and the markings on second-hand tyres before purchase.

Tachographs

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he is satisfied with the operation of the regulations regarding the construction of tachographs on coaches, and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will introduce legislation requiring tachographs on coaches to be crash-proof and fireproof, and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Tachographs and recording charts must comply with the requirements of EEC regulation 1463/70. I am satisfied that this provides for appropriate standards of construction including some protection against fire and accidental damage. It is extremely rare for a tachograph chart to be destroyed in a crash or by fire. I do not believe more onerous requirements would be justified at present.

Light Dues

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the final report on the study of light dues.

Mr. Ridley: I have received a large number of most helpful comments from individuals and from representative bodies. I am most grateful to all concerned for the thought and attention that they have given to the proposals. I am considering the issues carefully and will make a further statement in due course.

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate, in terms of amount per vessel per year, of the cost of collecting a levy in respect of light dues from yachts under 20 tonnes.

Mr. Ridley: I have not yet reached any conclusion on the desirability of levying light dues on yachts that are at present exempt, nor made any estimate of the costs of levying such a charge.

Batheaston Bypass

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for a further round of public consultation to include the Beckford Spur, in addition to his Department's published details of alternative routes for the Batheaston bypass (A4) and the A36 at Bathampton and A46 at Swainswick; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: An unusually long period was allowed for public consultation about this scheme, and I now intend to proceed to a decision on a preferred route.

The so-called Beckford spur has no role to play in the national trunk road network, but should Avon county council wish to consult the public on it as a local distributor road, it is of course open to it to do so.

Nuclear Waste (Transport)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what research has been undertaken involving the carriage of Magnox spent fuel by advanced gas-cooled reactor flasks with regard to crash tests and International Atomic Energy Agency drop tests;

(2) when the safety of transport of irradiated Magnox fuel by MK2a and MK2b flasks was last reviewed, and what conclusions were reached;

(3) on what grounds the use of MK2c flasks in the transport of irradiated fuels has been authorised as replacements for MK2a and MK2b flasks.

Mr. David Mitchell: We are satisfied, from tests carried out under the requirements of IAEA regulations, that those AGR flasks which are in some cases used to transport Magnox fuel can do so safely.

The MK2a Magnox fuel flask is no longer in service. Details of its withdrawal were given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in a written answer to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) (8 November 1983, c. 105). The safety of MK2b and MK2c flasks was last reviewed in 1984 and their continued use was authorised by the Department.

The testing and assessment methods for all such flasks which are used by the CEGB meet the internationally agreed IAEA requirements. Their effectiveness was demonstrated by a 4-year programme of research, culminating in the train crash arranged in July 1984 in conjunction with British Rail.

Boeing 737 (Crash)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has had discussions with the Civil Aviation Authority concerning the crash of the Boeing 737 at Manchester airport in August, with particular reference to the problem of cracks in the engine burner cans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The Civil Aviation Authority is solely responsible for United Kingdom aviation safety requirements and regulations. I understand that as a result of evidence arising from the accident investigation the CAA has required the burner cans on JT8D engines which have completed specified numbers of flights or flight hours to be inspected for unacceptable cracking.

International Driving Permits

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he plans any changes in the arrangements for issuing international driving permits to motorists travelling abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: International driving permits have for many years been issued on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State by the Automobile Association, the Royal Automobile Club and the Royal Scottish Automobile Club. It is a task they perform responsibly and well. But I do not think the right to issue these permits should be restricted to these associations if other motoring organisations can show themselves to be suitably qualified. I have therefore decided, following examination of its proposed scheme, that the Secretary of State should delegate authority to the National Breakdown Recovery Club to issue international driving permits as from 1 January, 1986.

Cabotage

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in his talks with the West German Government seeking the extension of the rights of cabotage in West German waters to British-registered ships.

Mr. Ridley: I am pleased to announce that we have now reached a satisfactory agreement with the Federal Republic. This will have the effect of ensuring that British operators offering a competitive service will have no bureaucratic difficulties in participating in German cabotage trades. We shall be seeking similar arrangements with other EC member states which at present exclude our vessels from such trades, while continuing to press for the early adoption of the Commission's proposal for abolition of cabotage restrictions among member states.

Oxford Circus (Fire)

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer, given on 13 June, Official Report, column 539, when London Regional Transport will publish a statement on the circumstances of the fire at Oxford Circus, and on the action being taken to prevent a recurrence.

Mr. David Mitchell: LRT will be publishing its statement today and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library.

Domestic Air Routes (Competition)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the conditions prevailing on domestic air routes are such as to make competition possible with those airlines currently serving them and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to the reply, 28 October 1985]: Before licensing a competing domestic service the Civil Aviation Authority, in accordance with its statutory duties, must consider a number of factors including whether a route can support competing services and the effect on an incumbent operator of licensing a competitor. There are no other constraints on route entry apart from statutory considerations such as these. Domestic fares in particular are now effectively deregulated, although the authority retains powers to deal with anti-competitive behaviour on fares, as well as in other areas.

WALES

Higher Education (Teachers)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many teaching staff were employed in public sector higher education in Wales for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Figures on the number of teaching staff in public sector higher education are not available. however, the information on those employed in maintained higher and further education establishments in Wales is as follows:

Year (as at January)	*Teachers in maintained establishments of higher and further education
	Full-time	Part-time (full-time equivalents)	Total full-time and full-time equivalents
1979†	3,717	—	—
1980	3,822	578	4,400
1981	3,783	536	4,319
1982	3,834	571	4,405
1983	4,104	518	4,622
1984	4,158	604	4,762
1985	4,082	565	4,647

* Excluding adult education centres and youth clubs and centres.
† Figures on part-time numbers are not available.

Urban Development Grant

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total amount allocated in by his Department in urban development grant to each county council in Wales for the year 1984-85 and for each of the previous five years; and what are the estimated figures to be allocated to them in 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) what was the total amount allocated in by his Department in urban development grant for the year 1984-85 and for each of the previous five years, and what are the estimated figures to be allocated 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The urban development grant scheme was introduced in 1982 and the first approvals were announced in February 1983. Expenditure on approved projects may extend beyond the year of approval.

Total amounts approved for projects in Wales which have been completed or are in progress are, by year of approval:

1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million*
3·552	2·23	10·62	2·016

* (to date)

The above figures include expenditure on approved projects submitted by four county councils, as follows:

County Council	1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million
South Glamorgan	0·385	0·045	8·5	0·093
Dyfed	—	0·016	—	—
Clwyd	0·338	—	—	—
Mid Glamorgan	0·025	—	—	—

Levels of urban development grant in 1986-87 will not be decided until the overall capital expenditure provision for Wales has been determined.

Community Council Expenditure

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report details of the mechanism within the Welsh grant-related expenditure formula whereby community councils' expenditure is taken into account.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Community councils' precepts form part of district councils' expenditure, which qualifies for rate support grant. Under the 1985-86 grant-related expenditure (GRE) formula, 50 per cent. of GRE which relates to community councils' precepts is distributed to district councils in proportion to their home population. The remaining 50 per cent. is distributed on the basis of enhanced population (as defined in note 5 to table 9.5 in Appendix 9 to the Welsh rate support grant report 1985-86) adjusted to take account of population density, population in accommodation lacking amenities and unemployment.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the total public expenditure in Wales undertaken by community councils.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Approximately £6 million in 1985-86.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure in Wales during the last financial year by local authorities in Wales under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Figures for 1984-85 are still being collected. For 1983-84 the gross expenditure under section 137, by counties and districts in Wales, was £3·993 million; the net expenditure was £3·102 million. Expenditure under section 137 by community councils is not held centrally.

Health Authorities

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the amounts actually spent in each financial year from 1978-79 to 1984-85, at 1984-85 prices, by each individual Welsh health authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is as follows:

† Payments made centrally on behalf of health authorities for income tax, national insurance and superannuation have been included.

‡ Prior to 1982-83 the Dyfed area health authority covered the whole county. From 1982-83 onwards the expenditure on the family practitioner services for the whole county is included in the East Dyfed health authority expenditure.

|| The expenditure on the family practitioner services included in the above figures is net of patient charges.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of people leaving youth training scheme courses in June in Wales are currently in full-time, permanent employment.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information for June leavers is not available. The most recent published results of a sample survey of people who left youth training schemes in Wales related to the period between July and September 1984. This gave a figure of 49 per cent. going into full-time employment.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales, of the 15 per cent. of youth training scheme leavers in Wales who receive Manpower Services Commission questionnaires regarding their employment status, what percentage reply.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The most recent 15 per cent. survey for which results are currently available for Wales is for young people who left youth training schemes between July and September 1984. This survey achieved a 67 per cent. response rate.

Dysentery

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people so far in the current year in Wales have notified that they have contracted dysentery; and what were the total notifications for each year since 1979.

Mr. Mark Robinson: For the numbers of notifications of dysentery in Wales in the years 1979 to 1984 I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to him on 18 June 1985 at column 61 by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. Provisional notifications for the current year, up to the week ending 11 October, totalled 551.

Urban Programme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales by how much in real terms the urban programme has risen since 1979; and if he will break this figure down by each of the Welsh counties.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Using the GDP deflator as a measure of inflation, between 1979-80 and 1985-86 the urban programme (including urban development grant) has risen by £18·5 million in real terms. This figure is broken down as follows:

	£m
Clwyd	3·31
Dyfed	1·28
Gwent	1·70
Gwynedd	0·59
Mid Glamorgan	3·93
Powys	0·14
South Glamorgan	6·00
West Glamorgan	1·53

Cervical Cytology

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to give health authorities in Wales additional cash to enable them to put into effect the recommendations of the working party on cervical cytology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The cervical cytology screening service is managed on a district basis and its funding is the responsibility of the health authority concerned. Whilst it is not proposed to provide additional money for the service itself, the Welsh Office is funding the provision of computers for all the family practitioner committees and this will facilitate the administration of the scheme.

Mentally Handicapped People (West Glamorgan)

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how much of the financial year 1984-85 had elapsed before he approved West Glamorgan's proposals for the development of services for mentally handicapped people in that year; why approval had not been given earlier; and what was the level of underspend for the council for that year on these plans;

(2) when approval for West Glamorgan plans for the development of services for mentally handicapped people was given in respect of the financial year 1985-86;

(3) if he will now take steps to place approval for West Glamorgan plans for the development of services for mentally handicapped people on a three-year rolling plan basis.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The West Glamorgan plan for the development of services over a 10-year period necessarily received detailed consideration by the Department and the all-Wales advisory panel and was the subject of consultation with the planning group before it could be approved on 7 June 1984. At that time a firm cash limit was announced for 1984-85 together with an advance indication of likely funding for 1985-86 and 1986-87. Due to a number of factors there was an underspend of £246,000 in 1984-85. A firm cash limit for 1985-86 was notified on 22 May 1985. Advance indication of the likely level of funding for the three year period starting 1987-88 will be given during 1986.

Health Services

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a statement of policies and priorities for health services in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have today published such a document. Copies have been placed in the Library and I have sent individual copies to all right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies in Wales. I intend to publish a corporate plan for the NHS in Wales in a few months' time.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many hon. members have currently got a stop on one or more immigration cases;

(2) what proportion of stops is placed by hon. members on behalf of immigrants or relatives of immigrants resident in their own constituencies;

(3) how many immigration cases are currently subject to a stop;

(4) how many immigration cases have been placed on stop over the last 12 months;

(5) what is his policy with regard to placing a stop on an immigration case when (a) the approach is made by an hon. Member's secretary by telephone and (b) the approach is made by a lawyer stating that he has the agreement of an hon. Member.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1985 c. 209]: The policy is to accept in good faith approaches by hon. Members, or their personal representatives, on the assumption that detailed representations about cases on which a stop has been placed will be submitted very quickly.

In the period from 1 January to 30 September this year hon. Members made representations in 4,146 cases handled by the immigration service compared with 3,532 in the whole of 1984. From 1 to 22 October an additional 764 representations have been received, bringing the total so far this year to 4,910. Currently representations are being considered in 3,325 passenger arrival cases. This substantial growth in case work is a cause for serious concern since the additional resources required to handle it are being drawn from the initial control at ports of entry and the longer this persists the more serious will become the impact on large numbers of other passengers. The more that representations are made, and the longer they take to deal with, the longer it is that persons refused entry are likely to stay in this country; and where it is not possible to serve removal directions within two months of the date of refusal the cost of removal may fall on public funds. Comprehensive information is not separately available of the number of hon. Members making representations nor on what proportion of stops is placed by hon. Members on behalf of passengers whose relatives or sponsors in this country are their constituents.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many Bangladeshi nationals, applying for visits to the United Kingdom have been detained prior to a decision being made whether to admit or refuse, for July, August and September, broken down on a monthly basis, compared with the same period in 1984;

(2) how many Bangladeshis have genuinely absconded from temporary admission during the period July to September, compared with the same period in 1984;

(3) how many Bangladeshi visit refusals have resulted in representations from Members of Parliament for July, August and September, broken down on a monthly basis, compared with the same period in 1984;

(4) how many Bangladeshi nationals have been granted temporary admission for 10 days or more, on arrival, but on reporting back for their first interview have been refused and detained with no further temporary admission, in the months July to September, compared with same period in 1984;

(5) how many Bangladeshis have married while on temporary admission after claiming to be here for short visits during the period July to September 1985;

(6) how many Bangladeshi nationals were refused entry for visits at Heathrow in July, August and September, broken down on a monthly basis, compared with same period in 1984;

(7) how many Bengali interpreters were employed by the immigration service at Heathrow for the period July to October;

(8) what is his policy concerning detaining passengers awaiting decisions on applications for entry or results of representations by Members of Parliament in prison accommodation;

(9) If he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a large number of visitors were detained on the night of 4 October in the Queen's building, Heathrow, Harmondsworth detention centre and Ashford remand centre and in the case of at least one visitor from Bangladesh in a cell at the Northside police station.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1985, c. 208-9]: Information about the number of citizens of Bangladesh recently refused leave to enter, including those who sought entry as visitors is available only from terminal 3 at Heathrow, as is the information requested about the number of representations from hon. Members, and that about absconders. The available information is as follows:

	1984	1985
Refusals of Entry
July	22	129
August	28	237
September	22	318
TOTAL	72	684
Representations from Hon. Members
July	7	57
August	4	122
September	5	181
TOTAL	16	360
Absconders who cannot be traced
July - September	2	24

As far as detention is concerned, in the London airports area the immigration service detention centres at Harmondsworth, Queen's building and Gatwick are able to accommodate those passengers who are not considered appropriate to be granted temporary admission. Where this cannot be done passengers are detained in Ashford remand centre and, exceptionally, in other prison accommodation or in police cells. In recent weeks there has been a sharp rise in the arrival rate of nationals of Bangladesh who have been refused entry, a number of whom have not been considered appropriate to be granted temporary admission. On 4 October the number of people to be detained exceeded the available accommodation at the Harmonsworth, Queen's building and Gatwick detention centres. Those passengers for whom room could not be found in any of the three centres were detained in Ashford remand centre with the exception of one person who was detained at Uxbridge police station.

Three full-time and six hourly-paid Bengali interpreters were employed by the immigration service at Heathrow during the period July to October. The other information requested is either not available or not available in the form requested.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of arrivals in the United Kingdom from (a) Bangladesh, (b) India, (c) Pakistan and (d) Sri Lanka detained by the immigration authorities in each week during the past three months.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985, c. 270]: The following figures, which are provisional, give the information available on the number of occasions on which passengers were taken by the immigration authorities to approved detention accommodation. They are based on returns from all ports of entry plus returns from the detention facilities at Harmondsworth and Heathrow Queen's building. Passengers who were taken to different buildings at different times may have been counted more than once. Some of those detained will subsequently have been granted temporary admission to the United Kingdom while consideration of their case is completed.

Nationality	July	August	September

Heli-tele Surveillance Camera

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions over the past 12 months the Metropolitan police air support unit has used the heli-tele suveillance camera, what these occasions were, whether a film record was made during any of these surveillance operations and on what occasion the heli-tele was first used.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that over the past 12 months the heli-tele surveillance camera was used by his air support unit on about 30 occasions for the following purposes:

i. to assist security operations at such events as state visits, Trooping the Colour and the moving of high-risk prisoners from prison to court;

ii. to assist with traffic control at major sporting events such as the Cup Final;

iii. to assist with the command and control of police officers deployed at demonstrations and marches; and

iv. to assist in the preparation of training exercises.

Video recordings were made on a number of these occasions.

The commissioner assures me that on each occasion the use of heli-tele was fully within the guidelines for the use of equipment in police surveillance operations, a copy of which is in the Library.

Heli-tele was first used at the Notting Hill Gate carnival in 1977.

Baton Rounds

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in each London police district, what is the number of (a) baton rounds held in armouries, (b) weapons that discharge baton rounds and (c) officers trained in their use;

(2) which of the following departments of the Metropolitan police have stocks of plastic baton rounds, baton round launchers and officers trained in their use; and in each case what are the numbers involved: commissioner's office, A1 to A10, B1 to B14, C1 to C13, D1 to D15, area headquarters, training schools and holding centres.

Mr. Giles Shaw: For operational reasons it would not be sensible to disclose the quantity of baton round equipment held by the Metropolitan police, its location or the number of officers who have been trained in its use.

Metropolitan Police (Reorganisation)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responses have been received from the Greater London council, London boroughs and district councils and local authority associations concerning the central structure of the reorganisation of the Metropolitan police; and how many responses were favourable and how many unfavourable.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The commissioner tells me that since he announced the broad outline of his proposals for reorganising the Metropolitan police in November 1984, he has received some 20 representations from borough and district councils, local authority associations and the Greater London Council. Among the points raised were the absence of external consultation before the announcement and the effect of the abolition of districts on community/police consultative arrangements. Assurances were also sought about the commissioner's intention to consult on the detail of the reorganisation.

As part of his commitment to consult widely on the implementation of the reorganisation, the commissioner earlier this year sought the views of all right hon. and hon. Members for constituencies wholly or partly within the Metropolitan police district, of borough and district councils and of community/police consultative groups on the proposed introduction of the eight new areas. He tells me that of the 63 per cent. who responded, 59 per cent. expressed agreement with the proposal; 7 per cent. agreed with reservations; 19 per cent. made no specific comment but expressed no objection; 6 per cent. either asked for further information or were unable to respond before consulting others; and 9 per cent. disagreed.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisations, companies, staff associations, and trades unions were consulted concerning reorganisation of the Metropolitan police prior to November 1984; what comments or reports were received; and which of them he has made available to hon. Members.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The commissioner informs me that he took advice from the following police forces and outside organisations:

Marks and Spencer
Shell International Unilever
G.K.N.
MacDonalds
Corning Glass
British Leyland
McKinseys
Chloride
Ellerman Lines
I.C.L.

These organisations were approached during the research stage of the commissioner's review of the force organisation and management, and their advice was sought in a series of interviews with representatives who had particular expertise and experience in the management of large organisations. The commissioner informs me that no records were made of those interviews and no reports received.

The police staff associations and the civil staff trades unions were first informed of the reorganisation proposals in November 1984.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police authorities have sought 100 per cent. reimbursement from the Government of the cost of policing the miners' dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Ten.

Metropolitan Police (Anti-Terrorist Squad)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Metropolitan police anti-terrorist squad has been involved in the investigation of recent racial attacks in the London area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No, it has not been involved.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the role of the Metropolitan police anti-terrorist squad.

Mr. Giles Shaw: To investigate bombing attacks and terrorist attacks in the Metropolitan police district including politically motivated murder, attempted murder or kidnapping.

Children (Alcohol Consumption)

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will conduct a review of the licensing laws in so far as they permit children over five years old to consume alcohol on licensed premises other than in the bar; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to review the licensing law as it relates to the consumption of alcohol by young people on licensed premises.

Molesworth USAF Base (Incident)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Cambridgeshire police as to the reasons why the police took photographs of visitors to the peace camp at Molesworth USAF base on 13 September and as to where those photographs are now held.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of Cambridgeshire informs me that, so far as he is aware no such photographs were taken. He will however make further inquiries if additional details are provided.

Prisoners (Accommodation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were (a) two to a cell and (b) three to a cell on the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Mellor: Information on cell sharing is collected once a month. Figures for October are being compiled. I shall write to the hon. Member when they are available.

RAF Lindholme

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total cost of purchasing Lindholme Royal Air Force station and of converting it for use as a prison.

Mr. Mellor: The cost of the site was £3·6 million. We are undertaking building work totalling approximately £9 million to provide accommodation for 750 prisoners.

Mr. Godfrey Pritchard

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will conclude his consideration of the representations regarding the conviction of Mr. Godfrey Pritchard.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend hopes to be able to do so shortly.

Courthouses, The Wirral (Access)

Mr. Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether disabled justices, defendants and the public have access to the courthouses in the Wirral.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Neither of the two magistrates' courthouses in the Wirral is modern, but we understand that access to courtrooms on the first floor is provided for wheelchair users at Birkenhead. I understand that the court in Wallasey is not so convenient, but that arrangements could be made for a disabled defendant to appear at a court on the ground floor.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the hon. Member for Birkenhead has not yet received a reply to his letter to the clerk of Wirral justices of 13 March about access by disabled people to the courthouse in the Wirral, nor to his reminder of 11 July.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We understand that a reply has now been sent to the hon. Member's letter.

Riots

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the amount of compensation paid by central and local government for damage caused by each riot since 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under the Riot (Damages) Act 1886 responsibility for paying compensation rests with the compensation authority for the police area. No central record is kept of payments made. After the disturbances in 1981, a special scheme was instituted whereby in certain circumstances the Home Office met 60 per cent. of certain expenditure arising from the disturbances, including compensation payments. Four compensation authorities qualified for that scheme and to date the following sums have been paid to each by the Home Office in respect of compensation payments:

Compensation Authority	£m
Greater Manchester county council	0·29
Merseyside county council	3·40
West Yorkshire county council	0·99
Receiver for the Metropolitan police district	2·15

Drugs Offences

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Cheshire as to the number of people (a) within the area covered by the Cheshire constabulary and (b) within the area covered by the Macclesfield division of the Cheshire constabulary who have been charged with (i) possession of and (ii) supplying (a) amphetamines, (b) heroin and (c) cocaine in each of the last three years; and if he will publish the information in the Official Report.

Mr. Mellor: The information available for the Cheshire police force area is given in the following table. Police forces are not required to provide centrally any information for individual divisions or stations within their areas.

Persons proceeded against in the Cheshire police force area for certain offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971

	Unlawful supply	3	2	3

*As the same person may be proceeded against for more than one offence or for more than one type of drug, the rows cannot be added together to produce totals.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department of those persons in Wales convicted of (a) all drugs related offences and (b) offences related to the use of heroin or its derivatives, how many were unemployed for each year from 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 44]: The information available, from returns made mainly by the police, is given in the following table; corresponding figures for 1985 will not be available until the summer of next year.

Leicester (Police Costs)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Leicestershire as to the additional costs of policing the city of Leicester during the nights of 9 and 10 October, and if he will make a statement on the disturbances which took place in Leicester on those dates.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list in the Official Report the number of prisoners on remand who have been waiting (i) more than six months, (ii) more than nine months and (iii) more than 12 months for their trial at the latest available date (a) in England and Wales and (b) at Cambridge Crown court, and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information for England and Wales is that given in the letter of 10 September 1985 to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), a copy of which is in the Library. Corresponding figures for Cambridge Crown court are not available centrally. The prosecution of Offences Act 1985 established a scheme for applying time limits in criminal proceedings. Field trials are about to begin in four areas to test the practical implications and effects before we apply statutory limits.

Cruelty to Animals (Circuses)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many circuses have been prosecuted over the last five years for cruelty to animals.

Mr. Mellor: The information, which may be incomplete, on proceedings for all offences of cruelty to animals is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Volume 1" (Table S.1.1(A) of the 1984 issue under offence classification 108). The information collected centrally does not identify prosecutions against circuses. However, within the published totals, only one or two prosecutions a year were for cruelty to performing animals.

Farriers (Registration)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the operation of the Farriers (Registration) Act 1975, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have no reason to be dissatisfied with the general working of the Act. Its day-to-day administration is the responsibility of the Farriers Registration Council, which will no doubt be in a position to answer any specific questions.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Veterinary Laboratory, Lasswade

Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the budget for the veterinary laboratory at Lasswade in the last financial year; and what proportion of that budget represented expenditure on research and development.

Mr. Jopling: The recorded expenditure for the veterinary laboratory at Lasswade in the last financial year was £1,425,000 of which £193,000 represented expenditure on research and development projects as such.

Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the proposed closure of the veterinary laboratory at Lasswade and the financial savings expected to arise from closure.

Dame Judith Hart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the proposed closure of the central veterinary laboratory at Lasswade.

Mr. Jopling: Research and development spending by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service will be reduced by some £4 million in 1986-87. This is in line with earlier decisions to reduce Government expenditure on agricultural research and development.

This will be achieved by rationalising the organisation of ADAS's R & D and concentrating work on fewer sites.

This approach is intended to maintain ADAS's capability to respond to advice on the longer term priorities for R & D which the Priorities Board for Research and Development in Agriculture and Food is considering and to respond to the needs of industry as expressed through the financial contributions which the Government consider the industry should make towards the cost of R & D from which it benefits. This approach has been endorsed by the priorities board.

As part of these economies, the department of the central veterinary laboratory located at Lasswade will close from 1 April 1986. The arrangements for maintaining the essential services needed in the areas concerned will be announced later. Until these announcements have been made it will not be possible to provide figures on the overall financial savings resulting from closure, nor will it be possible to assess the number of redundancies likely to be needed.

Bread Manufacture

Mr. Normanton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the Government regulations applicable to the manufacture of bread.

Mr. Jopling: The main regulations which apply to the manufacture of bread are, as follows:

(a) the Bread and Flour Regulations 1963, as amended, to be replaced entirely on 1 July 1986 by the Bread and Flour Regulations 1984 covering England and Wales. Similar regulations exists in Scotland and Northern Ireland;

(b) the Weights and Measures Act 1963 (Bread) Order 1977, the Weights and Measures (packaged goods) Regulations 1979, as amended and the Weights and Measures Act 1963 (Miscellaneous Foods) Order 1984 covering Great Britain. Similar legislation exists in Northern Ireland.

In addition, the manufacture of bread in the United Kingdom is subject to regulations which apply to foodstuffs in general, covering, for example, health and hygiene, labelling, contaminants and units of measurement.

Strawberry Pulp

Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the level of imports of strawberry pulp and the level of domestic production; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: We have received representations on behalf of strawberry growers about the impact on profitability of imports of strawberry pulp. We have no powers to act unilaterally on this. As a result of the pressure we have exerted, the European Commission has reached agreement with the Polish and Yugoslavian authorities on measures to safeguard the interests of strawberry and other soft fruit growers in the Community. My noble Friend the Minister of State is in touch with the farmers unions and will review developments with them next month.

Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information is available to his Department in respect of the number of domestic producers of strawberry pulp and the number of domestic users of strawberry pulp in each of the last five years (a) in England and Wales and (b) in the East Anglian region.

Mrs. Fenner: No information is available on the number of domestic producers or users of strawberry pulp. It is understood that 17 per cent. of the strawberry area in England and Wales was for processing in 1984 and that over 90 per cent. of this was in the eastern region.

Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list in the Official Report such information as he has as to the average price per tonne of (a) domestic strawberry pulp and (b) imported strawberry pulp from each source country in each of the last five years, and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: No information is available on average prices per tonne of domestic strawberry pulp. The information on imports is as follows:

Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list in the Official Report (a) the strawberry acreage in England and Wales and (b) the tonnage of strawberry pulp imported, in total and from each source country, in each of the last five years; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The information is as follows:

Beef

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tons of beef were covered by the recent decision of the management committee in Brussels to offer beef for sale at 18p per pound; and what information he has as regards the amount sent to individual nations under this arrangement.

Mr. Jopling: I think my hon. Friend has in mind European Commission Regulation 2670/8 of 23

September. This made certain intervention beef available to exporters at an average price of 1,540 ecu per tonne (about 43p per lb). It is understood that the Commission believes that contracts to purchase some 175,000 tonnes are likely under this regulation, and that the most likely destination for the meat is the Soviet Union. If this were the case, export restitutions worth an average 995 ecu per tonne (about 28p per lb) would be payable.

The Government continue to press for suitable action to be taken under the common agricultural policy to curb surplus production, and meanwhile to argue that surplus stocks should be disposed of as economically as possible. We also press for intervention beef to be made available for use within the Community as appropriate and on 24 September the Commission made a regulation which releases certain beef to EC processors at special prices.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest information he has on the size of intervention stocks in public and private storage in the European Economic Community for the various commodities covered by intervention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 14 January 1985 at column 30. The note referred to in that reply was last updated on 25 October.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration he has given to the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General regarding the operation of the common agricultural policy in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The report to the Committee of Public Accounts by the Comptroller and Auditor General on the achievements and costs of the common agricultural policy in the United Kingdom recognises the efforts we have made to contain the budgetary cost of the CAP by pressing for price reductions. Although it is critical of some aspects of the current operation of the CAP, it is broadly in line with the Government's own views on how this could best be improved, particularly with regard to the need for a more market-orientated price policy. The Government will continue to press this approach in discussions in the Community on future arrangements for the CAP.

Cash Limits

Mr. Hayward asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans any changes in cash limits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Yes. The cash limit for class III vote 4 (other agricultural and food services and support for the fishing industry) is being reduced by £343,000 from £145,676,000 to £145,333,000. The change is made up as follows:

a decrease of £903,000 because the increased cash limit provision arising from the carry forward of capital expenditure under the end year flexibility scheme announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 18 July 1985 is no longer required.

an increase on this cash limit of £560,000 subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate to provide for additional expenditure on payments to producers in England discontinuingmilk production. The increase will be offset by savings on such payments in Wales and there will therefore be no net addition to the planning total of public expenditure. The cash limit on class XVI vote 5 (agricultural services, support for the fishing industry, regional and industrial development, Wales) is being reduced by £560,000 from £47,170,000 to £46,610,000.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

2. Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what this is as a percentage of those registered unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 July, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,327,000, 41 per cent. of the total. The corresponding number of unemployed registrants in April 1979 was 367,000.

4. Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General what is the present number of people who are unemployed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 12 September 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,346,200.

10. Mr. Corbett asked the Paymaster General what, at the latest convenient date, were the numbers of (a) men and (b) women in Erdington and Birmingham out of work for more than 12 months; and how this compares with the position a year ago.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 July 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of male claimants in the Birmingham, Erdington constituency who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 3,463. The number of female claimants was 951. The corresponding figures for 12 July 1984 are 3,443 male and 932 female claimants.

For the Birmingham travel to work area, on 11 July 1985 the number of male claimants who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 45,947. The number of female claimants was 13,011. The corresponding figures for 12 July 1984 are 46,591 male and 12,554 female claimants.

16. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General what proportion of the work force was unemployed in May 1979; and what is the proportion unemployed at the present time.

Mr. David Trippier: On 12 September 1985 the unemployment rate in the United Kingdom was 13·8 per cent., and the corresponding estimate for May 1979 was 4·9 per cent.

17. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

20. Mr. Adley asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest level of employment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In June, after nine successive quarterly increases, the employed labour force in the United Kingdom had risen to 24,245,000. On 12 September, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,346,000.

18. Mr. Fatchett asked the Paymaster General what are the current numbers unemployed; and what this is as a proportion of the work force.

Mr. David Trippier: On 12 September 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,346,200 which corresponds to an unemployment rate of 13·8 per cent.

21. Mr. Hardy asked the Paymaster General how many people are unemployed in the Rotherham metropolitan borough; how many of these have been unemployed for over one year; and how many are under 20 years of age.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 July, the latest date for which analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, the number of claimants unemployed in the Rotherham metropolitan borough was 18,235 of which 8,387 have been unemployed for over 12 months. There were 3,610 claimants under 20 years of age, and of those 650 have been unemployed for over 12 months.

24. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General if he will make it his practice to give as much publicity to the numbers of people who found work, and the number of jobs advertised and available through local jobcentres as he does the number of people who have become unemployed in each monthly statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The press notice giving each month's unemployment figures already includes the latest figures on vacancies at jobcentres, as well as information on the number of people becoming and ceasing to be unemployed. As from 31 October, the monthly press notice will also show job placings made by jobcentres.

26. Mr. Latham asked the Paymaster General whether he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 12 September 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,346,000.

27. Mr. David Young asked the Paymaster General what are the most recent figures for the total number of job vacancies at career offices in Great Britain; and how many people are registered unemployed for each vacancy.

31. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Paymaster General what are the most recent figures for the total number of vacancies at career offices in Great Britain; and how many people are registered unemployed for each vacancy.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 6 September 1985, there were 13,522 unfilled vacancies at careers offices in Great Britain. Valid ratios of vacancies to unemployed cannot be calculated because many vacancies for which young people are eligible are not notified to careers offices. For example, many young people find employment through jobcentres.

29. Mr. Yeo asked the Paymaster General what is the level of unemployment at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 12 September 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,346,198.

30. Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General what proportion of those who left school in the current year is estimated to be in full time employment other than is provided by the youth training scheme and other special measures; and what was the comparable figures in October 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information of the type requested is being obtained in the special studies referred to in the reply to the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 18 February at columns 347-8. First results for young people who reached minimum school-leaving age during the 1983-84 academic year are expected to become available around the end of this year, while results covering the equivalent 1984-85 group (in England and Wales) will follow a year later.

32. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Paymaster General what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over one year, two years, and three years, respectively; and what plans the Government have for retraining or re-employing those who do not find places on the community programme.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 July 1985, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over one year was 1,326,884. Of these, 799,379 had been unemployed for over two years and 506,807 for over three years.

Our White Paper, "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation" (Cmnd. 9474) describes the current range of employment and training measures and explains our strategy to achieve sustained economic growth. It is only through such growth that more permanent jobs for all unemployed people will be created.

36. Mr. Madden asked the Paymaster General how many young people are currently unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton) earlier today.

40. Mr. Roger King asked the Paymaster General what is the latest total number of unemployed in the West Midlands; and how this commpares with 12 months ago.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 12 September 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the west midlands was 360,799. The corresponding figure for September 1984 was 360,411.

44. Mr. Canavan asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of unemployed persons in the United Kingdom compared with May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 12 September 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom, seasonally adjusted excluding school leavers, was 3,180,000. The corresponding figure for May 1979 was 1,184,100.

46. Mr. Prescott asked the Paymaster General how many people are currently in work in the United Kingdom: and what were the figures for May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) and the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), earlier today.

47. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Paymaster General what is the latest number of people unemployed; and how many of them are aged 50 to 60 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 July 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,235,036, of whom 495,827 were aged at least 50 but under 60 years.

60. Mr. Janner asked the Paymaster General how many people he estimates have been unemployed for over 12 months in the Leicester travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: On the 11 July 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of people claiming benefit for over 12 months in the Leicester travel-to-work area was 11,338.

Mrs. Currie asked the Paymaster General if he will show, for the travel-to-work areas covered by the Derbyshire, South constituency, the numbers leaving the unemployment register as a result of (a) age and (b) obtaining employment, for the last three years.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on the reasons why unemployed persons cease to be unemployed claimants is not available.

Mrs. Currie asked the Paymaster General if he will show, for the travel-to-work areas covered by the Derbyshire, South constituency, the numbers of vacancies notified to jobcentres for the last three years, and the number of such vacancies currently unfilled.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The table relates to the jobcentres of Derby and Swadlincote which cover areas closely corresponding to the parliamentary constituency of south Derbyshire. Figures are not available for travel-to-work areas since they do not correspond to jobcentre area boundaries.

	Weeks in period	Derby jobcentre	Swadlincote jobcentre
Vacancies Notified
8 March 1982 to 4 March 1983	52	8,183	498
7 March 1983 to 2 March 1984	52	8,687	530
5 March 1984 to 8 March 1985	53	11,650	677
1 April 1985 to 6 September 1985	22	5,649	322
Unfilled vacancies on 6 September 1985		635	36

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Paymaster General if he will give a breakdown of the 600,000 new jobs created since June 1983, showing how many such jobs were part-time work for women, how many were second jobs, and how many were self-employed jobs.

Mr. Alan Clark: The net increase of 654,000 in the employed labour force in Great Britain between June 1983 and June 1985 (the latest date for which comprehensive figures are available) included net increases of 380,000 part-time female employees in employment and 399,000 self-employed people.

The second jobs included in the employees in employment estimates are not separately identified, but estimates from the labour force surveys suggest an increase of 60,000 between spring 1983 and spring 1984 (the latest date for which estimates are available) in the number of people with a second job as an employee.

The employment estimates do not include second jobs when they are held as self-employed.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Paymaster General what has been the change in employment in Derbyshire and Amber Valley since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information is for the period from June 1978 to September 1981 when censuses of employment were taken and is as follows:

Employees in Employment

Thousands

	June 1978	September 1981	Net change 1978 to 1981
Derbyshire	357·3	338·9	18·4
Amber Valley	40·2	40·0	0·2

Censuses have been taken triennially since 1978. Results of the September 1984 census of employment are expected to become available during the first quarter of 1986.

Earnings

15. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Paymaster General how many workers in full-time employment earn less than £100 per week.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In April 1985 approximately 2½ million full-time adult employees working a full week had gross weekly earnings of less than £100.

Voluntary Project Programme

19. Mr. Freeman asked the Paymaster General what was the expenditure in 1984-85 on the voluntary project programme; and what is the estimated expenditure in the current year.

Mr. Alan Clark: Expenditure on the voluntary projects programme in 1984-85 was £9·3 million. It is estimated that total expenditure in the programme in 1985-86 will be £12 million.

Trade Unions (Political Funds)

22. Mr. Freud asked the Paymaster General what monitoring he undertakes of trade union political fund ballots.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We keep a regular watch on publicly available reports about these ballots and take careful note of any representations made to us.

25. Mr. Beith asked the Paymaster General how many ballots relating to trade union political funds under the terms of the Trade Union Act 1984 have taken place.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) earlier today.

Young Worker Scheme

23. Mr. Evennett asked the Paymaster General how many people have been employed under the young worker scheme since its inception.

Mr. Alan Clark: Applications have been approved for 403,227 young people employed under the young workers scheme since it began on 4 January, 1982.

Youth Training Scheme

28. Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the implementation of the two year youth training scheme.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 28 October.

33. Mr. Stott asked the Paymaster General whether there has been any improvement in the employment prospects of young people leaving the youth training scheme since the survey results announced in July.

51. Mr. David Marshall asked the Paymaster General whether there has been any improvement in the employment prospects of young people leaving the youth training scheme since the survey results announced in July.

Mr. Trippier: The results of the survey of leavers from the youth training scheme placed in the Library in July showed that 49 per cent. of trainees who left the scheme in October 1984, and 51 per cent. of those who left in November 1984, were in work some three months later. The latest results, for those who left in April and May 1985, show that 62 per cent. were in employment.

34. Mr. Patchett asked the Paymaster General what is the latest estimate of the proportion of youth training scheme leavers finding employment.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a regular follow-up survey of young people leaving the youth training scheme. This survey provides accurate information about the proportion of leavers finding employment. The latest survey results, covering young people who left the scheme during April and May 1985, show 62 per cent. in work. These results have been placed in the Library.

59. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Paymaster General what share of the cost of the two-year youth training scheme will be met by employers.

Mr. Trippier: As programmes under the two-year scheme will involve differing costs and attract varying levels of Government funding, the proportion of the cost which is contributed by employers or other training providers will also vary.

Vredling Directive (Worker Information and Consultation)

35. Mr. Foulkes asked the Paymaster General what recent discussion he has held with his European Economic Community counterparts concerning the Vredling directive on worker information and consultation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As no further discussions have been held on the proposal, I have nothing to add to my previous reply to the hon. Member on 17 July at column 170.

Tourist Industry

37. Mr. Chapman asked the Paymaster General what proportion of (a) employees in employment and (b) self-employed persons is directly and indirectly engaged in the tourist industry; and what has been the trend in the last five years.

Mr. David Trippier: Tourism is one of many activities which provide a stimulus to employment in a range of service industries such as hotels, catering, retailing, recreation, arts, leisure, and so on. It is therefore not possible to identify employment supported by tourism from regularly produced estimates of employment for these industries. An estimate derived from information on tourism expenditure by foreign visitors and Britons suggests that out of 23 million in employment in Great Britain in 1983 about 1 million were supported directly or indirectly by tourist spending.

The following table presents the latest estimates of employees employed in those industries which are considered to be most clearly related to tourism: these include employees who are not engaged in tourism, and exclude employees in other industries who are supporting tourism, but less directly.

The proportion working in these industries has risen from a total of 5·3 per cent. of all employees in 1980 to 6 per cent. in 1985: this trend follows from an increase of around 65,000 employees in tourism related industries and an overall decline in other industries.

Estimates of self employment are not regularly available in detail of these industries. The available figures are as follows:

Wages Councils

38. Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General how many young people are employed in industries covered by wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is estimated that 500,000 young people aged under 21 years work in jobs covered by wages councils.

39. Mr. Ashdown asked the Paymaster General what research he has conducted into the likely employment effects of abolishing wages council protection for employees reaching the age of 21 years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government's intention is to exclude those aged under 21 years from wages council regulation. There is a body of evidence which indicates that, if the pay of young people relative to that of adults declines, their employment opportunities will increase. Some of this increase will be at the expense of older people.

41. Ms. Richardson asked the Paymaster General how many women are employed in industries covered by wages councils.

50. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General how many women are employed in industries covered by wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: About 2·2 million.

42. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Paymaster General which organisations representing workers in wages council industries supported the Government's decision on the reform of wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Since the announcement of the Government's decision to reform wages councils one representation has been received from an organisation representing workers in a wages council industry. This did not support the decision.

Wage Agreements

43. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received advocating legislation to make wage agreements legally binding; and what response he has made.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None. Employers and trade unions are free to enter into legaly enforceable agreements if they wish.

Training and Skill Shortages

45. Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received about training and skill shortages in British industry.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. and noble Friend and I have received a small number of letters related primarily to skill shortages. We know that there is some concern about shortages in particular areas, and the subject continues to be kept under close review. The Manpower Services Commission compiles regular reports on shortages and takes these into account when formulating its local and national programmes.

Wages

48. Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General by what percentage young peoples' wages, for boys and girls, have fallen relative to adult wages since May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The average earnings of boys relative to men fell by 10 per cent., and those of girls relative to women fell by 11 per cent., between April 1979 and April 1985.

Northern Region

49. Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General how many new jobs have been created in the northern region since March 1983.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employment at different dates.

Between March 1983 and June 1985 the civilian employed labour force in the Northern region is estimated to have decreased by 12,000.

Job Creation

52. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General how many additional jobs have been created from 1983 to the present day; and what proportion of these are second jobs.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employment at different dates.

Between June 1983 and June 1985 (the latest date for which comprehensive quarterly figures are available) the Great Britain employed labour force increased by 654,000.

The second jobs included in the employees in employment estimates are not separately identified but estimates from the labour force surveys suggest an increase of 60,000 between spring 1983 and spring 1984 (the latest date for which estimates are available) in the number of people with a second job as an employee.

The employment estimates do not include second jobs when they are held as self employed.

56. Mr. Chope asked the Paymaster General if he will give the latest figure for the net increase in jobs since 1983.

Mr. Alan Clark: Between June 1983 and June 1985 the Great Britain employed labour force increased by 654,000.

Young Persons (Training)

53. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Paymaster General what numbers of young people are presently completing training with an apprenticeship or recognised equivalent certificate; and what were the numbers in May 1979.

Mr. Trippier: The labour force survey shows the level of young people undertaking apprenticeship training as 356,000 in 1979 and 327,000 in 1984. The numbers entering traditional apprenticeships will become increasingly irrelevant as a measure of the real level of skills training being undertaken by industry because of both the reform of existing training arrangements and the substantial provision of initial skills training now taking place under the youth training scheme.

Government-sponsored Training

54. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Paymaster General what numbers of people over the age of 25 years are receiving Government-sponsored training; and what proportion are finding employment on completion of a training course.

Mr. Trippier: In total we aim to help to train some 220,000 adults this year through the Manpower Services Commission's adult training programme. About half of these will be unemployed people. The main adult training schemes involving directly funded training for unemployed people had some 27,400 in training at the end of September 1985, the latest date for which figures are available. It is estimated that two-thirds of these were aged 25 years or over.

School Leavers

55. Mr. Strang asked the Paymaster General how many school leavers of all ages were unemployed or on youth training schemes at the latest available date, and what was the comparable figure five years ago.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 12 September 1985, the number of unemployed claimant school leavers of all ages in Great Britain was 419,448, of whom 152,603 were under the age of 18. The corresponding numbers of unemployed registrant school leavers in September 1980 were 277,070 and 196,327 respectively and are not directly comparable.

The estimated number of young people in Great Britain participating in the youth training scheme at the end of August 1985 was 291,007 while numbers participating in the youth opportunities programme at the end of August 1980 were 114,300. Within these totals, recent school leavers cannot be identified.

Job Vacancies

57. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Paymaster General whether he will list the travel-to-work areas where there are more jobs available than people seeking work.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is not available.

Industrial Tribunals

58. Mr. Richard Holt asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to review the operation of industrial tribunals with particular regard to the formality of their proceedings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The operation of the industrial tribunals is kept under constant review. The Government will continue to look at ways in which industrial tribunal proceedings can be improved without interfering with their judicial independence. In that context I welcome statements made by the judicial authorities themselves discouraging legalism and the excessive quotation of guideline authority in industrial tribunal proceedings.

Manpower Services Commission

61. Mr. Pavitt asked the Paymaster General what criteria are adopted by the Manpower Services Commission for the acceptance of projects offered by local industry; for what reasons an offer by Guinness Ltd. at Park Royal in Brent to take 50 trainees was rejected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and I shall place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Young Persons

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General what, for each region of Great Britain, are the estimates produced by the careers service for the Manpower Services Commission of the number and proportion of (1) 16-year-olds and (2) 17-year-olds who will (a) stay on in school or further education or (b) leave school and join the labour market, and, the number of those who will (i) get work, (ii) remain unemployed and (iii) enter the youth training schemes, for the last year available; and what were the figures for all categories for all years for which figures are available, assuming the youth opportunities programme precedes the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information for the youth training scheme is as follows. The figures represent the careers service's best estimates of the destinations of 16 and 17-year-olds who were eligible to leave school in the academic years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85. The figures for 31 December 1985 are projections made by the careers service in autumn 1984 and revised in January 1985. There are no equivalent figures for the youth opportunities programme.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Wigley asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the number of applications approved for the loan guarantee scheme and the total value of the sum guaranteed, together with the number of such guarantees which have been called in and the cost to the Exchequer of these payments.

Mr. Trippier: At 30 September 1985 16,396 guarantees, valued at £420·28 million, had been approved under the loan guarantee scheme. Of these 4,669 had been called at a cost of £111·8 million.

Mr. Knox asked the Paymaster General what has been the cost to public funds of the loan guarantee scheme in each year since its inception.

Mr. Trippier: The table shows the cost of the loan guarantee scheme in each completed financial year. The figures are based on the cost of called guarantees less premium income and recoveries and take no account of other Government income or expenditure which may be indirectly affected.

Financial Year	Net Cost (£ million)
1981-82	(Net gain) 0·375
1982-83	7·963
1983-84	23·746
1984-85	33·881

European Social Fund

Dr. Cunningham asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the criteria used by his Department in selecting projects for submission to the European Economic Community Commission for funding under the European Social Fund.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is our policy to submit all eligible applications to the social fund, in order to gain as much support as possible for United Kingdom training and job creation projects. Conditions for eligibility are contained in European Council Decisions and Regulations, last revised in 1983. Among the basic conditions are the schemes must be lawful in the member state, that they must secure matching funds from a public authority in the member state, and that they must provide training or create jobs for eligible categories of people. Copies of the fund rules were laid before the House at the time when they were agreed, and are also available on request from the Department.

Self-employed Persons

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Paymaster General on what basis the figures for the numbers self employed are calculated; and what changes have been made in this classification since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates for the numbers of self employed are obtained from the censuses of population, the latest of which was held in 1981, updated by applying proportionate changes in self employment as estimated from the labour force survey.

The first change in methodology since 1979 was the use of labour force survey results to produce the new estimates for 1975 to 1979 which were published in January 1982 issue of Employment Gazette. The LFS data were used in place of the discontinued information from the national insurance card count.

At that time the level of staff employment was assumed by convention not to have changed since the date of the latest available survey data. When this convention was reviewed, in 1983, it was considered unrealistic. The reasons for this were set out in an article in the June 1983 edition of Employment Gazette. This article introduced a 'supplementary' series which assumed that the rate of growth observed between the latest two surveys for which data were available had continued thereafter. This series was revised—and the term 'supplementary' dropped—in July 1984 using results from the 1983 LFS.

The most recent revision was published in the March 1985 edition of Employment Gazette. This revision used the 1984 LFS results, and revised results for 1983. These estimates showed an exceptional growth in self employment between 1983 and 1984 and the Department's statisticians considered it inappropriate to assume that this rate had continued. The estimates for dates after June 1984, which will be reviewed when the 1985 LFS data become available next year, incorporate the assumption that average rate of increase between 1981 and 1984 is continuing.

Youth Training (Grants)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Paymaster General what representations he has had from local authorities who receive grants in arrears in respect of the youth training scheme and community programme, as compared with the private sector where such grants are paid in advance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has received representations from three local authorities expressing their concern about this matter in the past 12 months. The Government consider that the payment of grants in advance to local authority sponsors of youth training scheme and community programme projects would not be an appropriate use of taxpayers' money.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Strang asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received about cuts in the Health and Safety Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the last three months my right hon. Friend, the previous Secretary of State for Employment, has met a delegation from the TUC to discuss the Health and Safety Executive's manpower and resources. Two letters have also been received.

Health and Safety Inspectors

Mr. Strang asked the Paymaster General how many health and safety inspectors were in post at the end of September; and what were the comparable figures for the previous six quarters.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers of inspectors in post in the Health and Safety Executive at 1 October 1985 and for the previous six quarters were:

	Number
1 April 1984	1,239
1 July 1984	1,238
1 October 1984	1,253
1 January 1985	1,237
1 April 1985	1,266
1 July 1985	1,254
1 October 1985	1,244

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Palace of Westminster (Refurbishment)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the cost of the refurbishment of the Palace of Westminster since the general election of 1983, including carpets, furnishings and telephones, and the cost of such refurbishing between 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Biffen: The table below gives details of expenditure by the Property Services Agency on the Palace of Westminster and its outbuildings for the financial years 1979-80 to 1982-83 inclusive and for the period from 1 April 1983 to 30 September 1985. For the costs of the new telephone installations, all of which have been incurred in the current financial year, I refer the hon. Member to the written reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 26 June, column 401.

	New works	Maintenance and repairs (including stone restoration)	Furnishing
	£ million	£ million	£ million
1979-80 to 1982-83	3·612	14·025	3·395
1 April 1983 to 30 September 1985	2·845	14·256	2·267

The increase in the expenditure on maintenance and repairs is attributable in part to the fact that the figures are in cash and in part to the fact that more has been spent on stone restoration in the period since 1 April 1983.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Board and Lodging

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now publish in the Official Report the result of his analysis of board and lodging in all local offices.

62. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the effect of the board and lodging regulations on job prospects of young people.

Board and Lodging Allowance

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the latest available figures since 29 April for the number of existing claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who were assessed under the new benefit regulations and who were (a) aged between 16 and 17 years, (b) aged between 18 and 20 years, (c) aged between 21 and 25 years, (d) aged between 26 years and pension age and (e) pensioners; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole and for England, Wales and Scotland, respectively;

(3) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who were 25 years old or under and who were assessed under the new benefit regulations as a result of which their benefit: (i) was restricted at the outset and (ii) was not restricted at the outset; and if he will give this information for Great Britain, and for England, Wales and Scotland, respectively;

(4) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who were assessed under the new benefit regulations and whose accommodation charge was (i) up to £5 above the upper limit, (ii) between £6 and £10 above the upper limit, (iii) between £11 and £20 above the upper limit, (iv) between £21 and £30 above the upper limit, (v) between £31 and £40 above the upper limit, (vi) between £41 and £50 above the upper limit and (vii) £51 or more above the upper limit, and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for England, Wales and Scotland, respectively;

(5) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostels, residential care home or nursing home accommodation, in the Taunton local Department of Health and Social Security office area who were 25 years old or under and were assessed under the new benefit regulations as a result of which their benefit (i) was restricted at the outset and (ii) was not restricted at the outset;

(6) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of claimants whose address changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who were assessed under the new benefit regulations and who were (a) aged between 16 and 17 years, (b) aged between 18 and 20 years, (c) aged between 21 and 25 years, (d) aged between 26 years and pension age and (e) pensioners; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for England, Wales and Scotland, respectively;

(7) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostels, residential care homes and nursing homes, in the Brighton local Department of Health and Social Security office area who were assessed under the new benefit regulations and whose accommodation charge was (i) above and (ii) within the new upper limit;

(8) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who were 25 years old or under and who were assessed under the new benefit regulations as a result of which their benefit was restricted from the outset where (i) this restriction was lifted subsequently and (ii) this restriction was not lifted subsequently; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole and for England, Wales and Scotland, respectively.

(9) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address changed and new an repeat claimants of supplementary benefit, ordinary board and lodging allowance in the Aberystwyth local Department of Health and Social Security office area who were assessed under the new benefit regulations ans whose accommodation charge was (i) up to £5, (ii) between £6 and £10, (iii) between £11 and £20, (iv) between £21 and £30, (v) between £31 and £40 and (vi) more than £41 above the new upper limit.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 47]: The analysis of statistical returns on boarders from DHSS local offices is not yet complete. These returns were among the arrangements made to monitor the effects of the changes in supplementary benefit board and lodging payments which were introduced in April. In addition, special surveys of younger boarders have been carried out in Scotland and the south-east, local DHSS staff from all regions were asked during September about their experience of the operation of the regulations, and a study by the social security policy inspectorate is in progress.

Full information on the results of monitoring will be made available as soon as possible. Preliminary information is as follows. Between April and July 1985, 126,000 supplementary benefit claims were made by boarders in ordinary board and lodging. Half these claimants were 25 or under. In addition, 6,000 people aged 25 or under were living in hostels and claiming as boarders. Overall, 28 per cent. of those aged 16-25 were exempt from the application of time limits on benefit at the boarder rate. Half the ordinary boarders aged 25 or under were paying amounts within the new financial limits.

Indications from DHSS local offices are that apart from resort areas, where people apparently returned home, most of those affected by time limits stayed in the same area and received benefit at the householder or non-householder rate. Local offices also report in general a continuing supply of accommodation within the new financial limits —in some cases at reduced prices.

A survey of 2,350 claimants under 26 in the south-east showed 20 per cent. were exempt from time limits. A further 35 per cent. remained in the same accommodation, mainly at the non-householder rate of benefit. 15 per cent. moved to other accommodation (less than 2 per cent. of these as boarders). 25 per cent. ceased to claim supplementary benefit altogether (some of them because their entitlement to unemployment benefit exceeded their entitlement to supplementary benefit). A smaller Scottish survey showed a roughly comparable picture and there are similar indications from other areas. Monitoring results so far do not appear to substantiate suggestions of significant movement between board and lodging areas or of increased homelessness.

Of those claimants whom the early monitoring results show to have ceased to claim benefit, a significant number are thought to have obtained work.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest available figures since 29 April for the number of claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostels, residential care homes and nursing homes, who were assessed under the new benefit rules and who were (a) aged 26 years or over and (b) aged 25 years or under, whose accommodation charge was within the new upper limits and who were receiving a special addition to their benefit; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for England, Scotland and Wales, respectively.

Mr. Newton: None, as special additions are payable only to claimants whose accommodation charge exceeds the local limits.

Local Authority Provision

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to introduce legislation to establish a statutory national inspectorate to monitor local authority social services provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: No, but I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 25 February, at columns 75-76 to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames).

Pre-School Playgroups

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children were attending pre-school playgroups in England and Wales for each year from 1979 to 1984.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not available centrally in precisely the form requested. The available information for England is given in the table. Further details are given in the Department's publication "Children's Day Care Facilities (at 31 March)", copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Day Nurseries

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many places were available in day nurseries in England and Wales in 1984 and in each year since 1979;

(2) what information he has as to which local authorities have reduced the number of places in day nurseries since 1979; and what has been the percentage reduction in each case.

Mr. Whitney: Information on the provision of day nursery places in England is given in the table together with a list of those authorities whose level of provision has decreased between 1979 and 1984. Further details are given in the Department's booklets "Children's Day Care Facilities (at 31 March)" copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Medical Practitioners

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many registered National Health Service medical practitioners have been (a) suspended, (b) struck off the register and (c) restored to the register in each of the years since the coming into force of the Medical Act 1978, and if he will express these figures as a percentage of the number of registered National Health Service registered practitioners in each year.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Medical Act 1978 came into operation on 1 August 1980. Data supplied by the General Medical Council do not readily distinguish between doctors in National Health Service and in other practice. Readily available figures are in the following table.

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

General Practitioners (Absent Partners)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what rules (a) his Department and (b) family practitioner committees lay down concerning the procedures to be adopted by general practitioners when their partners are away, and what steps he takes to satisfy himself as to the efficiency of such procedures.

Mr. Hayhoe: The terms of service of a general medical practitioner require him to inform his family practitioner committee, when he proposes to be absent from his practice for more than one week, of the name of the doctor or doctors responsible for his practice during his absence. Additionally, before entering into arrangements with a deputising service for the provision of a deputy or deputies, a doctor must obtain the consent of the committee. The Department has issued guidance to family practitioner committees on the monitoring of deputising services and they have been asked to report on the steps they are taking in their 1985-86 annual programmes.

Private Practitioners (Refresher Courses)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to which refresher courses are obligatory for doctors engaged in private practice, and when these were last reviewed.

Mr. Hayhoe: There are no such obligatory refresher courses.

General Practitioners (Training)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he takes to satisfy himself as to the adequacy of the post qualification training of general practitioners.

Mr. Hayhoe: The standards of training and performance of general practitioners are governed by the corporate bodies of the profession. Medical graduates in order to become principals in general medical practice are required to undertake a three-year period of vocational training as specified in regulations or to have equivalent experience.

Medical Practitioners (Qualifications)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of representations made by the General Medical Council to the Privy Council under the various acts relating to qualifying examinations for National Health Service medical practitioners since 1978 and as to what action was taken as a result.

Mr. Hayhoe: I understand that the Privy Council has had only one representation since 1978 about qualifying examinations under the Medical Act 1978. As a result, the University of Leicester was entitled to award primary qualifications registrable under the Act.

Community Dental Services

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children have been examined by the community dental services in each of the years 1965 to 1984; and how many fillings have been made to (a) their temporary teeth and (b) their permanent teeth, in each year.

Mr. Hayhoe: Details of the numbers of inspections and fillings provided to children in England in each of the years 1965 to 1984 are shown in the table.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the value of the supplementary benefit scale rates, excluding payment for housing costs, for a couple with two children, one aged under five years and one aged five to 10 years, as a proportion of average net male earnings for each year since 1971.

Mr. Major: The information requested is given in the following table.

‡ Net average weekly earnings are the estimates of gross weekly full-time earnings of adult males (aged 21 and over up to November 1982 and from November 1983 all males on adult rates) whose earnings are not affected by absence, less tax and national insurance contributions at the non-contracted out rate plus Family Allowance/Child Benefit (which is off-set against the supplementary benefit scale rates).

Benefits

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the main social security benefits which are not covered by a Government commitment to increase rates in line with inflation, together with an estimate of the cost of each 1 per cent. increase in their rates in 1986.

Mr. Newton: The following benefits are not covered by a commitment to increase rates in line with inflation:

Unemployment benefit.
Sickness benefit.
Maternity allowance.
Child benefit.
One parent benefit.
Family income supplement.
Mobility allowance.
Supplementary allowance (ie supplementary benefit for people under pension age).
Housing benefit.

The cost of a 1 per cent. increase in these benefits would be £170 million at November 1985 benefit rates.

Food Hazards

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if consideration has been given to improving procedures for notifying local authorities of food hazards, with special reference to the capacity of local authorities to react quickly after notification of an emergency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The procedure for communicating food hazard warnings to local authorities is kept under review and we are satisfied that the arrangements for urgent notification by way of a telephone link system, followed by written amplification, is the most efficient at present available. The extent of local action is a matter for local authorities to decide on receipt by them of the telephoned notification. Full regard is had by the Department to the problems which may be faced by local authorities — especially if the notification is received just before a weekend or a holiday: but in practice we have little choice about timing once investigations have established that urgent action is necessary in the public interest.

Mineworkers (National Insurance Contributions)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he is having about the position of those mineworkers who are being declared redundant yet, because they have not paid their national insurance contributions for 12 months, are likely to lose unemployment benefit and entitlement from the redundant mineworkers' pension scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Entitlement to unemployment benefit depends upon the claimant having paid or been credited with the necessary national insurance contributions during the relevant tax year. Those miners who were on strike for all or most of the 1984-85 tax year are, therefore, unlikely to qualify for benefit during 1986. We have no plans to change the contribution conditions in order to allow unemployment benefit to be paid in these circumstances. The Redundant Mineworkers Payments Scheme is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Health Expenditure

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the total funds available for health in the current year and the part thereof devoted to all aspects of mental health.

Mr. Hayhoe: Total spending on the Health Service in England this year will be about £14·5 billion. It is not possible to say how much of this will be spent on mental health services. However, details of past health authority revenue spending on services for mentally ill and mentally handicapped people is shown annually in the Department's evidence to the Social Services Select Committee for its enquiry into public expenditure on social services. The latest information was published in July 1985 in its sixth report: Public Expenditure on the Social Services (HC. 339).

Fairfield Hospital

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates to be (i) the current cost of keeping a patient in Fairfield hospital and (ii) the cost of caring for such patients when they are transferred to smaller units of accommodation.

Mr. Whitney: The average daily cost in the year ending 31 March 1985 of treating inpatients in Fairfield hospital was £30·27. No estimates are available centrally of what would be the cost of caring for Fairfield patients in smaller units of accommodation. This will vary according to local circumstances and the type of patient.

Home Helps

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will specify the number of local authorities which currently offer a free home help service (a) to all who receive a service, (b) to those on supplementary benefit or (c) to people on the basis of the means test.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not collected by the Department.

Conductive Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State of Social Services (1) what representations his Department has received from (a) parents of children with special needs and (b) voluntary organisations concerning the provision of conductive education; and if he will make a statement; (2) if his Department has any plans to fund (a) research into and (b) programmes of conductive education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We have received two letters this year from parents about conductive education for their children and our attention has been drawn to the Conductive Education Interest Group. We are at present considering applications for funding from two voluntary organisations keen to study or explore conductive education and are liaising closely with the Department of Education and Science.

Supplementary Benefit

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the number of persons claiming supplementary benefit and (b) the number of children estimated to be dependent on those claimants, in each of the nine local offices of his Department which serve the London borough of Southwark in each of the years 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Major: The total numbers of people receiving supplementary benefits from the nine local offices serving the London borough of Southwark from 1979 to 1985 are set out in the table.

* Estimated figures

Source: 100 per cent count of cases in action in July each year

Information is not available from which reliable estimates could be made of the number of children dependent on people claiming at individual offices but I refer the hon. Member to the estimates in the reply I gave her on 21 October, at columns 52-53.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in advance of the consideration by the House of the draft Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous and Temporary Provisions Regulations 1985, he will make available to hon. Members a statement of the legal basis and considerations on which he drew up the draft regulations.

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Member will be aware, my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General has been invited to discuss this matter today with the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, following its report to the House last week.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the costs of meeting mortgage interest payments for claimants of supplementary benefit, other than the unemployed, breaking these down into one-parent families, the sick and disabled and pensioners, and showing how many persons in each category benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1985, c. 55.]: I regret that I said incorrectly that a copy of the 1983 annual statistical inquiry was held in the Library. I apologise for this mistake. The latest tables in the Library are the 1982 tables; for 1983 tables will be deposited at the end of November.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the number, proportion, average pay and average earnings of men working (i) full-time and (ii) part-time and (b) the number, proportion, average pay and average earnings of women working (i) full-time and (ii) part-time in each of the 18 ancillary pay groups within the National Health Service grading structure.

Mr. Hayhoe: I will let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Stanley Royd Hospital (Inquiry Report)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the report of the inquiry into the 19 deaths from salmonella poisoning at the Stanley Royd psychiatric hospital in Wakefield; if he will publish the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on 15 July at column 53.

NHS Hospitals (Food Poisoning and Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many cases of food poisoning have been reported in National Health Service hospitals in each of the last five years: which hospitals were involved; and how many of those affected died in each year;

(2) if he will list all the types of premises for which he is responsible in respect of which Crown immunity is claimed.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the right hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

NHS (Griffiths Review)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the progress of the implementation of the Griffith's review; how many managers from outside the National Health Service have been appointed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Implementation is progressing well. All regional health authorities and 189 (of 191) district health authorities have appointed general managers. At regional level 15 per cent. are from outside the National Health Service, and at district level 21 per cent. About 25 per cent. of general manager appointments at unit level have also now been made. Of these 10 per cent. are from outside the Health Service. A further 35 per cent. are front line professional staff: doctors, nurses, therapists and dentists who have decided to use the opportunity presented by Griffiths and put their knowledge and experience of treating patients to use in the wider interests of the Service as a whole.

National Radiological Protection Board

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the National Radiological Protection Board together with their qualifications.

Mr. Whitney: The information is as follows:

Sir Frederick Dainton retires on 31 October 1985. Professor Sir Richard Southwood has been appointed Chairman from 1 November 1985.

Hospital Induced Infection

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the types of illnesses which National Health Service patients have suffered arising from hospital induced infections and food poisoning.

Mr. Hayhoe: This information is not available in the form requested. However, in the 1981 Public Health Laboratory Service study the major systems affected by hospital acquired infection were the urinary, upper and lower respiratory, wound and skin infections. Illnesses derived from food poisoning might include gastro-enteritis, bacteremia and diarrhoeal illness.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of patients who have acquired (a) serious and (b) minor hospital-induced infections in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information on which to base such an estimate is not available.

NHS Hospitals (Pest Infestation)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of pest infestation in National Health Service hospitals have been reported in each of the last five years; and if he will ask regional health authorities to update their information and send him full details.

Mr. Hayhoe: Health authorities are not required to report cases of pest infestation. We are considering with regional health authorities what further action is needed to ensure that satisfactory hygiene standards are maintained in the National Health Service.

NHS (Catering Services)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will arrange for a copy of the Coopers & Lybrand report on catering services to be deposited in the Library.

Mr. Hayhoe: This report has not yet been issued to health authorities. When it is I will arrange for a copy to be deposited in the Library.

Medicines (Product Licence)

Mr. Crouch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many medicines containing a new chemical entity and granted a product licence in 1984, will be subject to the licence of right provisions contained in the Patents Act 1977.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret this information is not available.

Michelle Bartlett

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set up an inquiry into the case of Michelle Bartlett who was in the care of the social services department of the London borough of Wandsworth at the children's home, Wilna Road, Wandsworth.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to the reply, 24 July 1985, c. 601]: The death of Michelle Bartlett was the subject of a coroner's inquest on 16 July 1985 at which a verdict of death due to misadventure was recorded and subsequently the subject of a full report to Wandsworth social services committee by the Director of Social Services, which was then made public. Wandsworth has taken action on a number of points raised in the report to further strengthen its procedures in such cases. In view of this, we do not consider that a further inquiry is necessary.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, county by county for England, the number and proportion of people classified as (a) drinking to excess, (b) problem drinkers and (c) severely dependent drinkers for each of the last five years.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 22 October 1985, c. 131]: Information is not available centrally under these particular classifications but the information in the table may be of help to the hon. Member. In addition there are about 2·5 thousand in-patient cas es treated annually in non-psychiatric hospitals in England with a main diagnosis of alcohol dependence syndrome.

Cervical Cancer Screening

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he proposes to seek to persuade more women in high risk categories to obtain cervical cancer screening.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985, c. 284]: Computerised systems to identify and call up women will help considerably. Health authorities have been advised to plan their implementation. Further suggestions on how to reach women most at risk are included in a consultative paper on practical steps to improve the screening programme which will be issued shortly.

Dental Treatment for Mothers

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will extend the exemption from dental charges to those women who have borne a child in such a way that the exemption period for dental treatment extends to the end of the month in which the child's first birthday falls;

(2) if he will introduce a special item into the dental fee scale to pay for preventive advice for expectant and nursing mothers concerning the care of children's teeth and the prevention of dental disease;

(3) if he will remove the prior approval conditions under items 3 and 5 of the dental fee scale for pregnant women and for those who have borne a child within the previous 12 months;

(4) if he has any plans to extend exemption from dental charges to women who become pregnant during a course of dental treatment.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985]: The dental fee scale already provides for additional advice and additional treatment under item 3(a) to be given without prior approval to expectant and nursing mothers. I have no plans to make further special provision in the fee scale, to relax the prior approval arrangements nor to alter the rules relating to exemption from dental charges for this group of patients.

Mental Hospitals (Patient Education)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on existing and future provision of education for patients in mental hospitals.

Mr. Whitney: It is for the health and local authorities concerned to arrange for adults in long-stay mental hospitals to receive appropriate education and training. The provision of facilities for the education of all children is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

NHS (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of Crown immunity, especially in relation to National Health Service hospitals and other National Health Service properties.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am most concerned at recent reports of poor hygiene standards in National Health Service hospitals and urgent management action to secure any necessary improvements is being taken. Representations calling for the lifting of Crown immunity from the National Health Service are also being carefully considered.

Residential Care Homes

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, by authority (a) the number of persons over 65 years, (b) the number of registered residential care homes in (i) the local authority sector, (ii) the voluntary sector and (iii) the private sector and (c) the number of places in each of these categories for each of the years 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Student Awards

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that the determination of the supplementary rate of grants in connection with student mandatory awards in education is made at a time in the year which will minimise delay by education authorities in paying student grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran and Iraq (Armaments)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government governing the exportation of armaments to Iran and Iraq.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The United Kingdom has been strictly impartial in the conflict between Iran and Iraq and has refused to allow the supply of lethal defence equipment to either side. In order to reinforce our policy of doing everything possible to see this tragic conflict brought to the earliest possible end, we decided in December 1984 to apply thereafter, the following set of guidelines to all deliveries of defence equipment to Iran and Iraq:

(i) We should maintain our consistent refusal to supply any lethal equipment to either side;

(ii) Subject to that overriding consideration, we should attempt to fulfil existing contracts and obligations;

(iii) We should not, in future, approve orders for any defence equipment which, in our view, would significantly enhance the capability of either side to prolong or exacerbate the conflict;

(iv) In the line with this policy, we should continue to scrutinise rigorously all applications for export licences for the supply of defence equipment to Iran and Iraq.

Nicaragua

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is Her Majesty's Government's policy to offer United Kingdom mediation for bilateral negotiations between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and Nicaragua and Honduras aimed at peaceful resolution of the armed conflict between Nicaragua and Contra guerillas, or to propose the offer of Western European mediation at the forthcoming ministerial meeting in Luxembourg.

Mr. Rifkind: No. We and our European partners consider that the Contadora process and an agreement based on the 21 Contadora objectives is the best opportunity to achieve a comprehensive political solution to the crisis of the region. A major aim of the Luxembourg meeting is to support the Contadora group's efforts.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will call on the United States Government to restart the Manzanillo talks with Nicaragua.

Mr. Rifkind: It is for the United States to decide when to resume those talks.

Contadora Peace Initiative

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current position of the Contadora peace initiative in central America.

Mr. Rifkind: The central American states are continuing to negotiate on the basis of a revised draft of the Contadora Act presented to them by the Contadora group on 12-13 September in Panama City.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will propose at the forthcoming ministerial summit in Luxembourg any western European initiative to assist the Contadora process in central America;

(2) what measures have been taken within the past 12 months following the conclusions of the San Jose ministerial conference, held in September 1984, about the Community, Portugal, Spain and the group of central American countries developing, extending and diversifying their mutual trade to increase bilateral trade between Britain and Nicaragua;

(3) if he will make a statement on the progress achieved in implementing the decisons of the ministerial conference held in San Jose in September 1984; and if he will detail Her Majesty's Government's contribution to this progress;

(4) whether he is satisfied with the progress made in implementing the decisions of the ministerial conference held in San Jose in September 1984; and if he will be making any proposals to strengthen the implementation of these decisions at the forthcoming ministerial conference in Luxembourg on 11 and 12 November.

Mr. Rifkind: Our policy towards Central America is designed to support the efforts of the Contadora group to promote conditions of political stability in which the fundamental social and economic problems of the region can be tackled.

Since the San Jose meeting, we have been working with our European partners to ensure that the follow-up conference to be held in Luxembourg on 11-12 November will fulfil the commitment entered into at San Jose to promote stronger economic and political relations between the two regions. We and our partners have remained in close touch with the Governments of central America and the Contadora states. Arrangements for regular political dialogue between the two regions are likely to be agreed at the Luxembourg meeting in November.

In parallel, the European Commission in consultation with members of the Community and the central American countries, have been examining how best to strengthen economic links between the two regions. An economic framework agreement on the lines envisaged in the San Jose communiqué has been negotiated. It is hoped that this will be signed at the Luxembourg meeting. The agreement will include provision for additional EC aid to central America. The additional aid will have the objective of promoting inter-regional integration and the development of central America as a whole.

Raoul Wallenburg

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to the answer of 20 June, Official Report, col. 204, concerning the documentation of the alleged death of Mr. Raoul Wallenburg, he will seek to acquire a copy of the manuscript report by the head of the prison medical service, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Since this report pertains to the death of a Swedish citizen, we would have no locus in asking to see it. The Russians claim that the full text of the report is contained in the Soviet note of 1957 handed to the Swedish ambassador. The Swedish authorities have confirmed to us that on various occasions they have asked for sight of the original to confirm this, but the Soviet Union has not agreed.

Soviet Jews

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the monthly figures of those Soviet Jews who have (a) not been allowed and (b) have been allowed to emigrate in the current year.

Mr. Rifkind: Neither we nor any organisations concerned with Jewry with whom we have been in touch have been able to give a reliable figure for the number of Soviet Jews refused exit permission in 1985. Nor would such a figure of itself reflect the undoubtedly large number of Soviet Jews who would like to emigrate if they saw the chance of being permitted to do so. The monthly figures for those who have been granted exit visas this year are as follows:

	Number
January	61
February	88
March	98
April	166
May	51
June	36
July	174
August	29
September	93

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the representations he has made to the Soviet Union on behalf of those Soviet Jews who have applied for emigration and been refused, what is the latest estimate of those in this category and what reasons are given by the Soviet Union in his discussions for the refusals.

Mr. Rifkind: I raised the question of restrictions on Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union with the Soviet

First Deputy Foreign Minister during my visit to Moscow in July. I mentioned the specific cases of Roald Zelichenok and Anatoly Shcharansky. My right hon. and learned Friend mentioned a range of Soviet failures to observe commitments made under the Helsinki final act at the CSCE anniversary meeting in Helsinki, 30 July to 1 August. Recently, the Soviet response to questions about Soviet Jewry has generally been that the vast majority of those wishing to leave the Soviet Union have already done so. It is not possible to give a figure for the total number of Jews who have been refused exit permission. In 1983 the Israeli Government suggested that there might be around 10,000 Jewish refuseniks in the USSR, but we have no independent information against which to judge the reliability of this figure.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further representations he has in mind to draw attention to the Soviet Union that its constant refusal to allow Soviet Jews to emigrate is in breach of the Helsinki agreement, especially on the sections dealing with human rights, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: In his speech to the CSCE 10th anniversary commemorative meeting this summer, my right hon. and learned Friend made clear our regret at Eastern failure to live up to their human rights commitments under the Helsinki final act. I am placing a copy of that speech in the Library of the House. My right hon. and learned Friend also raised human rights with Mr. Shevardnadze bilaterally in Helsinki. We shall continue to take all appropriate opportunites to remind the Soviet Union of our wish to see full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in the Soviet Union, in accordance with its UN and Helsinki commitments.

Falkland Islands (Fishing)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is currently being taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent fishing by foreign vessels in the waters around the Falkland Islands, and if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of such measures.

Mr. Rifkind: We are continuing our efforts to bring about the establishment of a multilaterally-based fisheries conservation and management regime in the south Atlantic. The aim of such a regime would be to manage fish stocks and to control the activities of fishing vessels in these waters.

British Sikhs

Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Indian Government seeking a relaxation of visa requirements as they affect Sikhs who are British citizens and who wish to visit relatives in India.

Mr. Rifkind: It would be invidious to request special treatment for any category of British citizens. We have on several occasions drawn the attention of the Indian Government to the practical consequences of their visa regime for British travellers, and expressed the hope that the regime may be lifted as conditions in Punjab return to normal.

Hong Kong

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether a decision has been taken on the form of the annual report on Hong Kong and the date on which it is to be laid before Parliament.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. The first annual report on Hong Kong will be published as a White Paper and we hope to lay it before Parliament in December.

CIVIL SERVICE

Disabled Persons

63. Mr. Haynes asked the Minister for the Civil Service what is the current percentage level of employment of registered disabled persons in the Home Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: As at 1 June 1985 1·4 per cent of members of the Home Civil Service were registered disabled persons.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Industrial and Public Service Staff

64. Mr. Eastham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sectors of industry or public services have increased their numbers in employment since 1979 as a direct result of Government investment.

Mr. MacGregor: Detailed information on the labour content of all Government investment is not readily available. Government investment expenditure is assessed in terms of its expected rates of return and in relation to the objectives of the investment. This will not necessarily involve an assessment of employment effects. Input-output tables for 1979, prepared by the Central Statistical Office, may be used to obtain information on the average labour intensity of different categories of expenditure.

Airlines

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual cost of the investigation by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise into the reimportation by airlines of towelettes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: The re-importation of these products is dealt with as part of customs' general control over the warehousing, shipment and return of aircraft stores, and no breakdown of costs is kept.

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual cost of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise searches into airlines' in-flight bars.

Mr. Gow: The control of aircraft in-flight bars forms part of customs' general control over the warehousing, shipment and return of aircraft stores and no breakdown of costs is kept.

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what annual revenue is derived from fines levied on airlines where in-flight bar stocks are wrongly declared.

Mr. Gow: I regret that this information is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. If my hon. Friend has a particular point in mind, and will write to me, I shall help in any way that I can.

Community Trade Mark Office

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Treasury financial support for the proposed Community Trade Mark office in London.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology on 8 November 1984 [Vol. 67, c. 6]. I should like to acknowledge the further helpful work contained in the recent study commissioned by the Community Trade Mark Office Committee.

South African Debt

Dame Judith Hart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with the Bank of England on the subject of South African debt.

Mr. Lawson: I have regular discussions with the Governor of the Bank of England on a range of issues including South African debt.

Housing Improvements (VAT)

Mr. Geoff Lawler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total receipts collected by his Department from the value added tax on housing improvements in the last fiscal year.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985]: Businesses registered for value added tax are not required to make returns of the tax charged on particular supplies of goods or services and information of this kind is therefore not directly available. However, estimates of personal sector expenditure on improvements to dwellings suggest that the yield from value added tax in the fiscal year 1984-85 was of the order of £300 million.

Unemployment Trends

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on recent reports on the likely trends of unemployment in the United Kingdom during 1986 contained in documents issued by the International Monetary Fund and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985]: Neither the OECD nor the IMF expect UK unemployment levels in 1986 to change significantly from those in 1985. According to well-established convention the Government do not publish their own forecasts of unemployment.

ENERGY

CEGB and Electricity Council

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the members of the Central Electricity Generating Board and the Electricity Council, together with their qualifications and, in the case of part-time members, their full-time occupations.

Mr. Goodlad: The details are as follows:

Magnox Reactors

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the estimated total costs of decommissioning the Magnox nuclear reactors presently in operation.

Mr. Goodlad: Total costs will depend on the method of decommissioning that is chosen, but estimates of the cost of decommissioning a typical Magnox reactor were given in my reply on 23 July to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) at column 469.

PRIME MINISTER

Soviet Union

Q12. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister when she next expects to meet the general secretary of the Communist party of the Soviet Union.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

General Belgrano

Q70. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received, following the publication of the Foreign Affairs Committee report on the circumstances of the sinking of the General Belgrano, on the matters raised in the report.

The Prime Minister: The issue was raised on a number of occasions in this House and another place in the week immediately following the publication of the Report and again by the hon. Gentleman on 22 October at c. 109. I have received a small number of letters from members of the public.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what headway has been made on Her Majesty's Government's multilateral initiative on a Falkland Islands fisheries conservation and management regime; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government are continuing their efforts to bring about the establishment of a multilaterally-based fisheries conservation and management regime in the south Atlantic. In his speech to the United Nations General Assembly on 25 September, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary made clear the Government's support for the Food and Agriculture Organisation's constructive initiative in this field and his hope that Argentina would be prepared to work with the Food and Agriculture Organisation, too.

Agriculture (Research and Advisory Services)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Prime Minister if she will publish a table showing, on a directly comparable basis, the spending of the Scottish Office and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, respectively, on agricultural research and advisory services, with particular reference to the comparison between the relevant parts of the budget of the agricultural development and advisory service and of the Scottish agricultural colleges.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on research and development, excluding food science, fisheries and flood protection, totalled £90·4 million in 1983-84 of which expenditure by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service was £39·8 million. Total comparable expenditure by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries in Scotland in 1983-84 was £27·8 million of which expenditure at the Scottish agricultural colleges was £6·8 million.

Expenditure by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on advisory services provided by ADAS was estimated at £37·3 million in 1983-84. Expenditure by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries in Scotland on advisory services in agriculture in the Scottish colleges was £7·2 million.

Engagements

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 October.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Contract Compliance

Mr. Dubs asked the Prime Minister what is the Government's policy about contract compliance.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy is to get the best value for the taxpayers' money.

Commonwealth Conference

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent visit to the Bahamas.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to the Lord Privy Seal's reply, 21 October 1985, col. 11]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my statement to the House this afternoon.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Audio and Video Tape Recording

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will estimate the administrative costs both of collection and distribution of a levy on audio and video recording tapes as recommended by his Department's Green Paper, the "Recording and Rental of Audio and Video Copyright Material", and the proportion this would represent of total levy revenue.

Mr. Butcher: The Green Paper made it clear that the Government would approve a scheme for collection and distribution of a levy only if satisfied that it would operate fairly and on an economical basis. The decision whether or not to introduce a levy on blank recording tape will take account of all relevant factors, including administrative costs. We hope soon to publish a White Paper dealing with copyright law reform and announcing our conclusions on the levy question.

Silentnight Ltd.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any grants have been made by his Department to Silentnight Ltd. in the last four years.

Mr. Butcher: Information about some of the grants made by the Department is published quarterly in "British Business". For reasons of commercial confidentiality, it is not the usual practice to give any further information about grants to particular companies. "British Business of 22 June 1983 recorded an offer of regional selective assistance of £350,000 to Lay E Zee Ltd., a subsidiary of Silentnight Holdings.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give an assurance that his Department, in co-operation with local authorities where appropriate, will ensure that information technology centres received the necessary funding to maintain their operations during the current and the next financial years.

Mr. Butcher: Those ITeCs which remain eligible for DTI pump priming assistance of up to £75,000 will continue to receive my Department's support during this and the coming financial year. Together with the Manpower Services Commission and other Departments concerned with ITeCS, my Department is currently considering the funding arrangements to operate from 1 April 1986.

Innovative Projects (Government Funding)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what funding Her Majesty's Government make available for innovative schemes in the current financial year; what is the total dispersed to date; and if he will list the major projects supported.

Mr. Butcher: Support offered by my Department for science and technology and investment in innovation will amount to around £420 million this financial year, of which under half has already been disbursed. The main areas of support are information technology, including the Alvey programme, the development and application of microelectronics, advanced manufacturing technology and aerospace R and D.

Chrome

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the implications for the availability of chrome supplies to the United Kingdom of the threatened withdrawal of South African supplies, and of the consequential implications for United Kingdom industry.

Mr. Butcher: The Government are keeping the situation under review and are consulting companies in the sectors of industry concerned about their stock position.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the world production of chrome and the percentage derived from South Africa.

Mr. Butcher: In 1984 world production of chromium ore was approximately 8,841,700 tonnes, of which South Africa produced 34 per cent.

Robotics

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the introduction of robotics upon employment during the next decade.

Mr. Butcher: Although my Department has not commissioned any such work I know of studies undertaken by a number of other organisations.

In the short term there may be some job losses arising from the introduction of robots but in the longer term the productivity improvements they make possible, will enhance the earning power and competitiveness of British industry and provide a sound base for future employment prospects. Robots have to be manufactured and marketed —tasks all requiring manpower in the United Kingdom.

Productivity (East Midlands)

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the change in productivity in the east midlands since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Tin

Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the recent suspension of tin trading on the London metal exchange.

Mr. Brittan: Trading of tin metal was suspended on the London metal exchange last Thursday following the inability of the buffer stock manager of the International Tin Council to support the market. The decision to cease buffer stock operations was taken solely on the initiative of the executive chairman of the Tin Council in accordance with the powers vested in him under the Sixth International Tin Agreement, of which the United Kingdom is a consumer member.

The Government will be participating in a special session of the International Tin Council convened on Tuesday 29 October to consider the position following the suspension of buffer stock operations. Officials are discussing the matter with the London metal exchange.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the latest progress in privatising the interests of British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yesterday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State gave his consent to British Shipbuilders for the sale of Vosper Thornycroft (UK) Ltd to a management buy-out team led by the present Managing Director, Mr. Peter Usher.

British Shipbuilders will receive a basic consideration of some £18·5 million. In addition, BS will receive a further payment if certain contracts are won shortly but it has accepted a small contingent liability should redundancies arise.

Directors (Prosecutions)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in how many cases in each of the years since 1979 to the latest date available charges have been brought by his Department against directors for (a) criminal offences and (b) misfeasance and breach of duty.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985 c. 292]: Details of prosecutions under the Companies Act are given in the annual reports laid before both Houses of Parliament under section 729 of the Companies Act 1985, which are available in the Library of the House. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State also undertakes a small number of prosecutions of Directors under a number of other Acts, but detailed statistics cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Pirate Radio

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial, manpower and other resources are currently allocated by his Department for the detection, surveillance and prevention of pirate radio broadcasting.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 309]: The greater part of the resources of the Radio Investigation Service are now devoted to enforcement action against all forms of unlicensed use or abuse of radio, particularly when this endangers the emergency services or the livelihood of those whose businesses depend upon radio. How much is spent on unlicensed broadcasters depend on our success in getting home the message that vigorous action will be taken to deal with them. Few now transmit regularly or for long periods.

In 1984-85, £351,900 was spent on enforcement operations against unlicensed radio broadcasters; this figure includes apportionments of staff costs, vehicles, technical equipment and other resources as appropriate. The RIS has 223 staff at present.

Between 1 October 1984 and 30 September 1985, the RIS took action on 228 occasions against unlicensed radio broadcasters, and 106 persons were convicted over the same period for involvement with such broadcasts.

Shipbuilding and Marine Engineering Industries

Dr. Norman A. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's shipbuiling and marine engineering industries.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 309]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given yesterday at c. 311 by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley).

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Building Degree Courses

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report those institutions of higher education where building degree courses have been discontinued since 1981; and if he will list the courses affected.

Mr. Brooke: In the public sector of higher education no building degree courses have been discontinued since 1981. In the university sector a BSc. degree course in building and management at Brunel university was discontinued from the 1983-84 academic year and a BSc. degree course in building and quantity surveying at Aston university was discontinued from the 1984-85 academic year.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the number of students graduating in each of the last 10 years in: (i) universities and (ii) public sector higher education, in pure building degree courses.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested in (i) is subsumed within figures for the number of civil engineering graduates and could only be disaggregated at disproportionate cost. The information requested in (ii) is as follows:

	Number
1974	66
1975	63
1976	102
1977	64
1978	89
1979	136
1980	110
1981	163
1982	154
1983	153

British Geological Survey

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to reorganise the methods and channelling of funds to the British Geological Survey in support of its basic and strategic research programmes.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend does not intend to pre-empt the outcome of the study established by the Natural Environment Research Council and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils to assess the United Kingdom's needs for geological surveying over the next 5-10 years. The terms of reference of the study group were given in my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on 28 October to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) at column 311.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will consider appointing a new director of the British Geological Survey who is an eminent geologist.

Mr. Brooke: The appointment of the director of the British Geological Survey (BGS) is the responsibility of the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC), as the BGS is one of the NERC's institutes. I understand that the NERC has appointed Mr. G. I. Lumsden to be the BGS's director from 1 November 1985; and that Mr. Lumsden is an eminent geologist who has worked in the BGS for 36 years and has particular experience in stratigraphical, environmental and applied geology.

Conductive Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will make a statement on the provision of conductive education for children with special needs;

(2) if his Department has any plans to fund (a) research into and (b) programmes of conductive education; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The system known as "conductive education" was developed in Hungary, in the context of the Hungarian educational system. I understand that a number of schools and units in England offer a form or derivative of conductive education. My Department is currently considering a proposal put forward by the Spastics Society for a small-scale study of current provision and an evaluation of the educational and other implications which would result from any wider development of the system in this country. There are no funds available to my right hon. Friend from which he could directly pay for independent programmes of conductive education.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations his Department has received from (a) parents of children with special needs and (b) voluntary organisations concerning the provision of conductive education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received no general representations on the subject from parents of children with special needs. He is however currently considering two appeals submitted by parents under section 8(6) of the Education Act 1981 in which conductive education features as a relevant issue. The Spastics Society has submitted a request for financial assistance towards the cost of a proposed study into the system of conductive education and this application is now under consideration.

Doctors and Dentists

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether extra funds will be made available to ensure that doctors and dentists in teaching hospitals, but employed by universities, have the same pay rise as their National Health Service colleagues.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government are currently considering a request from the Committee of Vice Chancellors and Principals that recurrent grant paid to universities should be increased for this purpose. A response has been promised within the next month.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will give a progress report on the new general certificate of secondary education examinations in respect of (a) teacher training, (b) national criteria, (c) preparation of employers to accept the new certificates, (d) syllabuses and (e) teacher briefings and manuals; and what have been the effects of the teachers' pay dispute on such progress.

Mr. Chris Patten: Our plans for the introduction of the GCSE are well on course. We have had no reports of significant disruption caused by teacher action in the context of the current pay dispute. The GCSE examining groups and the LEAs are well-advanced in their preparations for the national programme of in-service training. All teachers of the GCSE are to attend preparatory seminars starting in January next year. Common materials for seminars, teachers' guides and videos are being prepared by the Secondary Examinations Council. They will be distributed to schools as early as possible in January next year. The GCSE national criteria were published last March and have been distributed to all seondary schools and colleges. The Department has plans to continue to publicise the GCSE by various means, including the production of material designed for employers. All GCSE syllabuses must be approved and published by May 1986. The Secondary Examinations Council and the GCSE examining groups are taking steps to approve as many as possible well before that date. Draft GCSE syllabuses in many subjects have already been made available to schools and colleges.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the proposed time-table for implementing the new general certificate of secondary education examinations.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend announced the Government's decision to introduce the GCSE in June 1984. Since then the Department has received some 35 letters requesting that the examinations be postponed for a year or more. Members of the NUT also raised this question at a meeting with my right hon. Friend in September.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department concerning the number of schools yet to receive copies of the proposed general certificate of secondary education syllabuses; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Draft GCSE syllabuses in many subjects have already been distributed to schools. The GCSE examining groups will issue all syllabuses in final, approved form as soon as possible.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the progress made in the introduction of the proposed general certificate of secondary education examinations.

Mr. Chris Patten: Yes.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department in respect of the number of areas where subject representatives for the proposed general certificate of secondary education examination system have yet to be appointed.

Mr. Chris Patten: This information is not available to the Department.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will now drop the proposed merit and distinction certificates from the proposals for the new general certificate of secondary education examination system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the Secretary of State for Wales are now considering their proposals in the light of responses received to the consultation paper issued last December. Decisions will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many and what proportion of teachers who will be engaged in teaching candidates for the new general certificate of secondary education examinations he expects to have received their in-service training before September 1986.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is for LEAs, schools and colleges to ensure that all teachers of the GCSE attend briefing seminars, preferably before September 1986 but in any event before the end of the calendar year.

SCOTLAND

Edinburgh Dental Hospital and School

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an up-to-date statement on the future of the Edinburgh dental hospital and school.

Mr. John MacKay: In my answer of 26 July at column 692 to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) I referred to the outcome of the discussions on 23 July between Edinburgh university, Lothian health board, the University Grants Committee and the Scottish Home and Health Department. I understand that the health board will shortly submit proposals to replace the dental hospital for consideration by the University Grants Committee and the Secretary of State.

Telford College

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether he will make resources available for phase 3 to provide an extension to the building department of Telford college to go ahead shortly with £4·1 million allocated for the purpose concentrating more facilities on the site of the college;

(2) whether he will make it his policy to enable Lothian regional council to purchase the area of ground next to Telford college, presently owned by Edinburgh district council for expansion of the college facilities on the site.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Lothian regional council has not sought consent to incur capital expenditure on building an extension to Telford college. Any such request would receive careful consideration in the light of available resources and of bids received from other authorities for further education building capital consents.

Leith Nautical College

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether extra resources will be made available to Lothian regional council for the buildings of Leith nautical college and for their running costs; and if he will make a statement as to the future use of the buildings.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Detailed discussions are in train between the Scottish Education Department and Lothian regional council about the proposed transfer of Leith nautical college to regional council management. No final decision has yet been taken in this matter.

Agriculture and Horticulture (Assistance)

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his response to requests for assistance to Scottish farmers following the bad summer in Scotland and its effects upon crops.

Mr. Younger: I refer the right hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on 24 October at column 246.

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what assistance he proposes to provide to the horticultural industry in Scotland, in view of the serious effects upon it of the last two summers.

Mr. Younger: The whole of the Scottish agriculture and horticulture industry is facing considerable difficulties as a result of the exceptionally poor summer. The steps that might be taken by Government to assist producers are still under review. It is likely, however, that assistance will be concentrated on the livestock sector where the need both in economic and in animal welfare terms is greatest.

Magnox Power Stations

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when it is intended to decommission the Magnox nuclear power stations in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I understand that the South of Scotland Electricity Board and British Nuclear Fuels plc have taken no decisions on the timing of decommissioning of their Magnox reactors at Hunterston and Chapelcross respectively but they make financial provision for eventual decommissioning in their accounts.

Farm Animal Welfare Council (Report)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the proposed status of the recent Farm Animal Welfare Council report.

Mr. Younger: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply he received from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, on 21 October 1985 at column 3.

Teaching Staff (Higher Education)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many teaching staff were employed in public sector higher education in Scotland for each year since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The following table gives the available information on the numbers of staff employed in public sector further education. It is not possible in all cases to distinguish between staff engaged in teaching advanced and non-advanced courses.

	Academic session (Full-Time Equivalents)
	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85

Environmental Pollution

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will now reconsider his earlier decision not to carry out an independent inquiry into environmental pollution and associated human and animal health problems within a radius of 20 miles from Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has received no substantive evidence which would justify changing his decision.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he has made with the South of Scotland Electricity Board for his officials to obtain air filter pads from the board's generating stations within 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire; and if he will commission scientific analyses of such air pads to test for the presence of trace amounts of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB's) and arrange for the reports of such analyses to be published.

Mr. Ancram: I have no reason to believe that fly ash from fossil fuelled power stations within 20 miles of Bonnybridge will make a significant contribution to background levels of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls but I have asked my Inspectorate to pursue this matter with the SSEB.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek information from the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency about the modification proposed in Sweden to existing waste incinerators to ensure that toxic wastes are burnt in such a manner as to preclude the inadvertent production of dioxins and furans.

Mr. Ancram: Her Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate, as part of an on-going study, seeks information on waste incinerator operations at home and abroad; this will include the operation in Sweden.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to obtain information from present and former employees of Re-Chem International Ltd. of the precise circumstances surrounding the incineration at the company's Bonnybridge plant of substances capable of producing dioxins, furans and other persistent toxins during the period of 1974 to 1984 inclusive.

Mr. Ancram: No. It would not be appropriate to seek the information requested in the manner suggested.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied that the water authorities in Central Scotland have enough money to allow them access to laboratories equipped to test for the presence in drinking water of polychlorinated byphenyls, polychlorinated terphenyls, polybrominated byphenyls, and for dioxins and furans, in parts per trillion; what samples of water are taken regularly for laboratory analysis at this scale of measurement; and whether he will publish in full the results of such analyses.

Mr. Ancram: I am not aware of any of the water authorities in central Scotland having been deterred by financial considerations from making use of laboratories equipped to analyse samples of water for the substances to which the hon. Member refers. The information sought on sampling and the results of analyses are not held centrally.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any information about whether the equipment used by Re-Chem International Ltd. at its Bonnybridge incinerator plant between 1974 and 1984 was at all times operated strictly in accordance with the manufacturer's instructions and specifications.

Mr. Ancram: I do not have information in this form. During the period, however, the plant was required to operate within the best practicable means as set by Her Majesty's Industrial Pollution Inspectorate. On the occasions when breaches were known to have occurred, appropriate action was taken by the inspectorate.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any information about the level of contamination by toxic wastes present in soil and dust in the Denny and Bonnybridge areas.

Mr. Ancram: Samples of soil from several locations have been analysed for polychlorinated byphenyls and derivatives. The results are satisfactory except in one location where part of a field adjacent to a disused refuse tip is contaminated with polychlorinated biphenyls, polychlorinated dibemdzo dioxins and polychlorinated dibemdzo furins. Investigations into the significance and extent of the contamination are continuing.

I am aware that samples from this same field have been analysed, at the request of the farmer, for heavy metals. The results have been sent to him by the laboratories involved.

Rates

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend the Rating and Valuation (Scotland) Act 1956.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985, c. 285]: Changes to the rating and valuation system are being considered in our current study of local government finance.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to review the rating of sporting land.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985, c. 285]: I am aware of the strength of feeling over rates among the owners of sporting properties in Scotland. The long established difference in the treatment of sporting rights by the rating and valuation system north and south of the border is among the issues which will be looked at in the context of general proposals for reform emerging from our current examination of the whole system of local government finance in Britain.

DEFENCE

Silentnight Ltd.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the armed forces have purchased any beds from Silentnight Ltd. in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The armed forces have not purchased any beds from Silentnight Ltd. in the last five years.

Contracts

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Ministry of Defence contracts have been awarded to (a) Securicor and (b) RCA in the last two years; and if he will list the establishments concerned.

Mr. Norman Lamont: During the financial years 1983-84 and 1984-85, which are the last two years for which statistics are available, the Ministry of Defence placed a total of seven contracts (including amendments) with Securicor Ltd. and a total of 58 contracts (including amendments) with RCA Ltd.

Because of the nature of some of those contracts it would be inappropriate to name any of the establishments concerned in them.

L-85 Rifle

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long it has taken to develop the L-85 rifle.

Mr. Norman Lamont: From the endorsement of the feasibility study, the development of the SA 80 individual weapon took 11½ years until January 1984, when its design was accepted by the Ministry of Defence on behalf of the three services. The full development phase lasted some five years.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if left-handed infantrymen will be issued with protective visors when using the new L-85 rifle;

(2) whether left-handed infantrymen will be able to use the L-85 Endeavour rifle;

(3) if a modified version of the L-85 rifle will be introduced specially for left-handed soldiers;

(4) if he is satisfied with the operation of the L-85 rifle for left-handed riflemen.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The operational requirement for an infantryman's rifle in modern warfare is for a short, compact weapon. It is this requirement which dictates the design of the SA-80 which, in its standard form, requires to be fired from the right shoulder. Trials carried out during the development stage of the weapon to determine whether a left-handed soldier could fire the weapon effectively showed this to be the case. Further trials will be carried out to confirm this assessment as the rifle is introduced. There is no requirement for the use of protective visors.

A conversion kit has been designed to permit the rifle to be fired from the left shoulder, but it is not expected that it will be necessary to proceed with this modification.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, following the introduction of the L-85 rifle, left-handed recruits will no longer be recruited for the Army.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No.

Left-handed Service Personnel

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has information as to the number and proportion of service men who are left handed.

Mr. Lamont: Records on this information could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost. However, it is reasonable to expect the proportion of left-handed service men to be in the region of 10 per cent. in line with the population at large.

Nimrod Aircraft

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will estimate when all 11 airborne early warning Nimrods will reach an initial operating capability;

(2) if he will estimate when the 11 airborne early warning Nimrods will meet the full air staff requirement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We are currently discussing with GEC Avionics an incentive contract for the further development of the Nimrod AEW mission system avionics to an acceptable initial operational standard. An operational AEW capability for the Nimrod could be achieved in 1987.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of the airborne early warning Nimrod programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: To date, some £831 million (at current prices) has been spent and committed on the Nimrod AEW project.

Shackleton Aircraft

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Shackleton airborne early warning aircraft use coded digital data transmissions when exchanging the tracks of intercepted aircraft with ground radar stations.

Mr. Stanley: It is not our practice to give details of the encryption facilities available on operational aircraft.

Chile

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Chilean personnel are being accepted on training courses in the United Kingdom in 1985-86.

Mr. Stanley: Yes.

Naval Bases (Food Surpluses)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the amount of food surplus in tons accumulated in the last year at Royal Navy bases in Portsmouth, specifying separate statistics for meat and bread, respectively.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No significant food surpluses have been accumulated at naval establishments in the Portsmouth area. Food returned by Naval ships de-storing at Portsmouth is re-issued from the Royal Clarence yard, unless condemned for destruction by professional food inspectors. In 1985 to date some 2·6 tons of meat and 2·3 tons of other fresh and frozen food, including bread, have been destroyed. No separate statistics are available for bread. This tonnage represents less than 0·2 per cent. of food handled at the Royal Clarence yard.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Tanzania (Road)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign ad Commonwealth Affairs how much of the Songea-Makambako road, Tanzania after upgrading was completed, has subsequently had to be redone or repaired; and what has been the cost of this.

Mr. Raison: Minor repairs after landslips — which had been expected with the relatively low cost per kilometre of the project—have been paid for as part of the project, and of its subsequent maintenance, for which £190,000 has so far been allocated.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has had with the Tanzanian Government concerning the progress of the upgrading of the Songea-Makambako road.

Mr. Raison: There has been continuous contact throughout work on the project, including planning board meetings held roughly every quarter.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the supplementary contract for the second phase of the Songea-Makambako road was negotiated.

Mr. Raison: The contract was awarded on 23 December 1982.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will itemise the reasons for the increase in the cost of the Songea-Makambako road from the original estimated cost in 1978 to the amount spent to date.

Mr. Raison: We could not forecast the exact final cost at the outset for lack of full detailed designs. To achieve an early start a special target cost contract was concluded rather than a conventional admeasurement contract. Additional factors were the 1981 decision to extend the sealed surface of the road to its full length of 184 miles instead of the 97 miles first envisaged, higher than expected inflation and technical delays in the early part of the project. It is not possible to attribute the cash increase to each item individually as they are closely interrelated.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is now the estimated cost for the completion of the upgrading of the Songea-Makambako road, Tanzania.

Mr. Raison: £98·6 million, of which the British Government have agreed to provide £89·6 million.

Chile (Political Refugees)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what requests he has received from the United Kingdom branch of World University Service concerning return of political refugees to Chile; what response he has made; and for what reasons.

Mr. Raison [pursuant to his reply, 23 October 1985, c. 155]: Following is the text of my letter to the hon. Member:

"The World University Service (UK) approached me in 1984, and again in 1985, for financial support to its programme for the voluntary repatriation of Chilean refugees. In 1984 HMG made £75,000 available but we have been unable to offer similar support this year. Aid funds are not unlimited and decisions have to be made between competing claims for assistance. In reaching our decision this year we took account of the substantial support of almost £11 million which we have given in the past to the WUS Chilean Programme principally for training in Britain."

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Butcher: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Eureka Programme

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how it is proposed to fund the Eureka programme relating to advanced European technology; and what will be the extent of Government support.

Mr. Butcher: The financing of Eureka projects is likely to vary according to their nature and their participants; those projects involving United Kingdom companies may qualify for finance from existing schemes of support for which they are eligible. However, the Government consider that, since Eureka projects are aimed at developing internationally competitive high technology products, they should in the main be able to rely on financing from commercial sources. We have no plans to set up a specific fund for Eureka projects.

Platinum

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the current production of platinum (i) in South Africa and (ii) in countries with centrally planned economies; and what percentage their combined production represents of total world production.

Mr. Butcher: In 1984 South Africa produced 90,200 kg of platinum group metals contained; and of the countries with centrally planned economies the USSR and Yugoslavia produced 115,000 kg platinum group metals contained in total. These combined productions represent 94 per cent. of world production.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what official visits are currently planned by representatives of participants in the Alvey programme, or members of the Alvey directorate, to (a) the United States of America and (b) Japan with a view to the discussion of collaborative projects;

(2) what official visits are currently planned by representatives of participants in the Alvey programme, or members of the Alvey directorate, to (a) the United States of America and (b) Japan, with a view to the discussion or the sale of research information obtained through Alvey programme work.

Mr. Butcher: No such visits are planned by members of the Alvey directorate and I am not aware of any such visits planned by participants in the Alvey programme. Any exploitation of the results of work funded under the programme outside the European Community would, however, be subject to the agreement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report the projects funded by the Alvey programme to date, indicating in each case the company, university, or research body involved and any intended eventual use of the project.

Mr. Butcher: I am arranging to have details of the projects comprising the Alvey programme placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will indicate what funds he has made available in each of the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 to work undertaken under the Alvey programme.

Mr. Butcher: One hundred and ten million pounds has been allocated to the Alvey programme by the Department of Trade and Industry. Actual expenditure against the DTI Vote in 1984-85 was £6·5 million and is expected to be £18 million in 1985-86.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what approaches he has received from the United States Government, or from United States based companies, expressing an interest in the purchase of information technology arising out of civil aspects of the work of the Alvey programme; and what has been his response.

Mr. Butcher: I have received no such approaches.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many official visits to participants in the Alvey programme are currently planned by visitors from the Japanese information technology industry, the United States information technology industry and the United States defence industry, and as to the names and status of the visitors concerned.

Mr. Butcher: I am not aware of any such plans for future visits. As a response to an Alvey-led British visit to ICOT, the Japanese fifth generation computer project, a delegation representing the management committee of ICOT was in the United Kingdom between 21 and 25 October and visited the Alvey directorate and a number of Alvey participants. The delegation comprised:

Mr. Kotaka	Vice President, Engineering NEC Corporation.
Mr. Enomoto	Senior Manager, Coordination Staff, Technical Planning and Coordinations Division, Toshiba Corporation.
Mr. Imai	Chief Engineer, Technical Administration Department, Hitachi Ltd.
Mr. Sakai	Manager, Administration Department, Technology Administration Divisions, Fujitsu Ltd.
Mr. Suzuki	Associate Director, Engineering Tokyo Branch, Matsushita Electric Industrial Company, Ltd.
Mr. Yamamoto	Senior Staff, R&D Headquarter, Mitsubishi Electric Group.
Mr. H. Hiroshige	Senior Executive Director, ICOT.
Mr. Ishikawa	Manager, Administration Department, ICOT.
Mr. Kurozumi	Assistant Director, Research Centre, ICOT.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to the answer of 17 December 1984, Official Report column 21, indicating that the majority of the 50 or so firms now participating in the Alvey programme have interests in both civil and defence applications of information technology, he will indicate precisely how many firms fall into this category.

Mr. Butcher: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what major advances in the development of advanced information technology have been achieved to date by work carried out under the Alvey programme in each of the following areas (a) software engineering, (b) person/machine interface, (c) intelligent knowledge based systems, (d) very large scale integrated circuits and (e) communications; to what practical use these advances have so far been put; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Alvey is a five-year programme with long-term objectives. Most of the work under the programme is defined and under way but it is early yet to predict quantified results. Some work, such as that in software engineering, may be expected to lead to exploitation within the next year or so; some, such as that in advanced computer architectures, is unlikely to lead to new products before the end of this decade. Progress on projects under way is, however, outlined in the details referred to in my earlier reply to the hon. Member which are being placed in the Library of the House.

Advanced Information Technology

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for continued support for the development of advanced information technology in Britain beyond the cessation of the Alvey programme in 1988.

Mr. Butcher: The community of those involved in relevant research and development is currently formulating its views on the need for further activity of this sort. Such views will need to be taken into account before any decisions are taken and they will need to be assessed in the light of current proposals for advanced technological collaboration at the European level.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the percentage of research and development work being undertaken in Britain at present in advanced information technology represented by work funded under the Alvey programme.

Mr. Butcher: Data are not available in this detail. Independent evaluations of the Alvey programme have been commissioned which should go some way to answering this question. These will be published.

Electricity (Resale)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy towards the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading in his report on the resale of electricity by landlords that there should be a new criminal offence of reselling electricity for domestic use at a price higher than the maximum price fixed by the appropriate electricity board.

Mr. Howard: The Government will shortly be making an announcement in response to the report by the Director General of Fair Trading.

Technological Innovation

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest Government proposals to help stimulate technological innovation in British industry.

Mr. Channon: The best way the Government can help to stimulate technological innovation in British industry is by continuing to work towards providing a business climate favourable to enterprise and initiative.

In addition, my Department offers a range of measures to assist industrial research and development and innovation. On 25 March my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State explained that following a review of policy the Department would be making more money available for collaborative research, advisory services and schemes for encouraging best practice, and that support for projects in individual firms would be concentrated on innovative projects which represent a significant advance. Within these arrangements we continue to emphasise certain key technologies and their application such as microelectronics, fibre optics and computer software.

For 1985-86 the Department's provision for scientific and technological assistance and support for investment in innovation totals £420 million.

An account of the Department's recent activities in support of technological innovation is given in the report entitled "Science and Technology Report 1984-85" published on 28 October, a copy of which I am placing in the Library of the House.

Tin

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to give financial assistance to the International Tin Council in its current efforts to establish a new international tin agreement.

Mr. Channon: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply my right hon. and learned Friend made yesterday to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris).

Steering Location Inquiries (North-West Region)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many steering location inquiries have been received in the north-west region of his Department; and of these how many have been referred to the Cumbria county council industrial development unit during the last month for which statistics are avialable.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In September 1985 the north west regional office received 24 steering location inquiries: one of these was referred to Cumbria county council's industrial development unit (IDU). Close liaison between the regional office and the IDU continues.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total number and value of offers of regional assistance made to companies in the West Cumbria travel-to-work areas, in Cumbria as a whole, in the north west region and in the northern region for the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In September 1985, 11 offers of assistance totalling £454,000 were made under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 towards projects in the north west region. There were no offers made to projects in Cumbria during this month. 17 offers totalling £4·97 million were made towards projects in the north east region.

Under the new regional development grant scheme 51 offers of assistance totalling £1·26 million were made to companies in the north west. Of these there were three offers totalling £26,455 made to projects in West Cumbria. 96 offers totalling £1·76 million were made towards projects in the north east.

Shipbuilding Redundancy Payments (Appeals)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the British Shipbuilders' national appeal procedure, as laid out in paragraph 12 of the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme internal appeals procedure, has been implement.

Mr. Butcher: Not yet. However, British Shipbuilders will be discussing the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme internal appeals procedure with the unions later this week with a view to hearing outstanding national appeals as soon as possible. They expect them all to be heard in November.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many appeals under the British Shipbuilders' national appeal procedure relating to the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme internal appeals procedure have been carried out in each year since 1980; and how many appeals are at present outstanding.

Mr. Butcher: No appeals at national level have been heard under the shipbuilding redundancy payment scheme internal appeals procedure. There are 15 appeals outstanding at this level.

QE2 (Re-engining)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if consultations have taken place between his Department and Cunard Shipping Ltd. concerning the re-engining of the QE2; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Discussions about the re-engining of the Queen Elizabeth 2 have taken place between Trafalgar House plc, the parent company of Cunard, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. On Friday 25 October Trafalgar House announced that the investment would go ahead but that, as no United Kingdom yard had been able to offer to carry out the work, the contract had been placed abroad. Nevertheless Trafalgar House announced that some £25 million or 30 per cent. of the total cost will be spent in the United Kingdom. GEC will supply the electric motors and generating plant, while Harland and Wolff will supply certain engine components.

British Shipbuilders (Subsidies)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list for each year since 1979-80 the total subsidy paid to British Shipbuilders; and if he will calculate what these data are as (a) a percentage of sales value of work done and (b) per employee.

Mr. Channon: Following are the figures:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Government subsidy for British Shipbuilders* (£ million)	†267	150	153	114	‡220	‡154
Percentage of sales value of work done	32·8	16·7	14·9	10·4	24·8	17·3
Subsidy per employee (£)	3,338	2,143	2,297	1,770	3,780	3,359

* Intervention fund assistance and payments of public dividend capital to British Shipbuilders.
† Includes public dividend capital provided to permit a repayment of a £55 million loan from the National Loans Fund.
‡ Excludes the cost of the sale of Scott Lithgow Ltd. to Trafalgar House Ltd. in March 1984.

CLOFT Scheme

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in seeking alternatives to the CLOFT scheme rejected by the EEC, so that assistance can be given to the footwear and leather industries.

Mr. Channon: The proposed CLOFT scheme envisaged assistance to eligible small firms in the footwear, clothing, knitting and textile industries, but not to the leather industry. As regards footwear, we are considering a proposal from the industry, as my hon. and learned Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for corporate and consumer affairs informed the House on 23 October. We do not regard this as an alternative to CLOFT, which was a sectoral aid scheme.

Japan (Leather Imports)

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to try to obtain the abolition of Japanese quotas and other impediments to imports of leather and leather products.

Mr. Channon: The Japanese Government have made some proposals which are under examination within the GATT. The initial EC view is that they do not represent sufficient progress towards the degree of liberalisation required. The Commission will, within the GATT negotiations, press for more effective measures of real benefit to Community producers.

Leather (Labelling)

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation providing for mandatory labelling requirements for leather products.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans at present to do so.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the gross domestic product of each region in England for the last 12 months for which figures are available; and how each region compares with the figures for 1980 and 1975 in real and cash terms.

Mr. Butcher: Current price (cash terms) gross domestic product data for the regions of England are published in the article "Regional Accounts 1983" ("Economic Trends" November 1984), a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. This article covers 1983 (the latest available), 1980 and 1975. Constant price (real terms) gross domestic product data for the regions are not available.

EC (Spanish Subsidies)

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what arrangements have been made during the negotiations for the entry of Spain into the EEC to remove Spanish subsidies on finished leather;

(2) what arrangements have been made during the negotiations for the entry of Spain into the EEC to remove the Spanish subsidy on exports of scoured wool.

Mr. Channon: From 1 January 1986, Spanish Government subsidies will have to comply with the state aids provisions of the Treaty of Rome. The export subsidy provided through the operation of the present tax system will automatically disappear when VAT is introduced in Spain on the same date.

EC (Raw Hides and Skins)

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements have been made during the negotiations for the entry of Spain into the EEC to ensure that there will be free availability of raw hides and skins within the Community.

Mr. Channon: Under article 42 of the Treaty of Accession, quantitative restrictions on trade between the Community and Spain are to be abolished on 1 January 1986, except where a derogation is specifically provided for. There is no such derogation in relation to raw hides and skins.

EC (Footwear and Leather)

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions there have been in the negotiations for the entry of Spain and Portugal into the EEC regarding the footwear and leather industries.

Mr. Channon: During the accession negotiations there were extensive discussions on the arrangements governing trade with Spain and Portugal in industrial products from 1 January 1986. A substantial part of these were concerned with the arrangements for footwear and leather products. The British footwear and leather industry was consulted throughout.

EC (Product Liability)

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress towards the implementation in the United Kingdom of the European Commission directive on product liability.

Mr. Howard: My Department will be issuing a consultative document before the end of this year on implementation of the EC directive on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states concerning liability for defective products. Following this consultation, legislation will be introduced as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits.

English Estates

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 23 October, Official Report, column 160, if he has had any discussions with the pensions fund industry or local authority superannuation fund managers about the possibility of their providing capital to meet the demand for English Estates to build factories to the specific order of prospective tenants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No, Sir. But as my hon. Friend will appreciate, English Estates is required under statutory guidelines to secure the maximum possible level of private sector funding in all its development projects and seeks to do so.

East Midlands (Productivity)

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the change in productivity in the east midlands since (a) 1979 and (b) 1981.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 29 October 1985]: There are no data available for the change in productivity in the east midlands since 1979 and 1981. However, output per person employed in the whole economy has risen by 13·1 per cent. since the first quarter of 1979 and by 13·4 per cent. since the first quarter of 1981, compared to the first quarter of 1985.

British Telecom

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a list of the firms with which British Telecom shares were placed at the beginning of the offer period; and if he will specify how many shares each firm underwrote.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 25 October 1985, c. 292]: All allocations made at the time of the British Telecom offer for sale, including placing allocations made to firms acting as priority applicants, were recorded in the company's share register. This is available for public inspection.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Maintenance Awards

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the total amounts paid out in each of the last five years for which figures are available on (a) mandatory maintenance awards and (b) discretionary maintenance awards in real terms using 1979-80 as a base, by local education authorities.

Mr. Brooke: A full reply could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The following table shows the amounts paid out in respect of full-value mandatory and discretionary awards by each local authority in England and Wales in 1979-80 and 1983-84, and the value in percentage terms of the 1983-84 payments deflated by increases in retail prices, using 1979-80 as the base.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and by bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

CERN

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether Her Majesty's Government have reached a decision following Sir John Kendrew's report relating to the United Kingdom subscription to CERN and related facilities.

Mr. Brooke: The Government are considering the advice of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and the Science and Engineering Research Council on this matter.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate what funds the Science and Engineering Research Council has made available in each of the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 to work undertaken under the Alvey programme.

Mr. Brooke: The figures for funds actually spent by SERC on work undertaken under the Alvey programme in 1984-85 and provided in the budget for 1985-86 (at 1985-86 outturn prices) are as follows:—

1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million
6	11·4

Teachers (Expenses)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to which local authorities offer inducements to teachers to attend courses during holidays by paying expenses.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is common practice for local authorities to provide some reimbursement to teachers of costs incurred as a result of attendance at in-service training courses, as resources allow. The Department does not collect information on the extent of this practice.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make proposals for reductions in teachers' remuneration where disruption is caused by industrial action.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is for the employers to implement the contracts of employment which they have with their teachers. I understand that these contain provisions for the deduction of salary in certain circumstances including strike action. I also understand that a small number of authorities have made deductions in respect of disruptive action short of strikes, such as refusal to cover for absent teachers. I further understand that the National Union of Teachers contends that employers do not have the right to make such deductions, and court action is pending involving five local education authorities.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what account he took of the non-recognition by certain local education authorities of the Professional Association of Teachers when revising the union side representatives of the Burnham committee; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: In reviewing the composition of the teachers' panel of the Burnham P&S committee, I have followed my predecessors as Secretary of State and used as my criteria the numbers in membership of the different unions and the distinctive nature of their membership. The committeee is responsible for reviewing the pay of school teachers throughout England and Wales and these criteria reflect that national function.

Research Scientists

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what study his Department has made of the consequences of the level of funding for equipment in research laboratories on the movement of scientists from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: The responses to the ABRC's brain drain inquiry suggest that dissatisfaction with the level of funding for research equipment is one of a number of reasons for British scientists taking researchh appointments overseas. The responses show that the provision in last year's PES settlement of additional funds to the UGC for re-equipping some of the best university research groups has been a factor in persuading some senior researchers to stay in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give what statistics he has available about the quitting from the United Kingdom of people of the highest scientific calibre to research institutes and laboratories in North America, Europe and Australia in the spheres of electronics, biochemistry and biophysics.

Mr. Brooke: National statistics are not available. However the ABRC's report to my right hon. Friend on their brain drain inquiry gives some figures for losses overseas from the university and research council groups covered by their survey. Copies of the ABRC's report will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the Advisory Body on Research Councils' report to his Department on the brain drain of human resources particularly in the areas of high technology and areas of scientific excellence.

Mr. Brooke: Yes. Copies of the report will be placed in the Library.

Haringey (Educational Provision and Response)

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the report by Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools on educational provision and response in some Haringey schools has been withdrawn; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The report has not been withdrawn, either in whole or in part.

When the report was published in July 1984, discussions took place between the inspectorate and Haringey local education authority about the interpretation of examination results in the authority in relation to national figures. On the basis of figures then provided by the authority in substitution for other figures it had provided earlier, some of the comparisons drawn in the report would have been slightly different, as the senior chief inspector acknowledged in a letter to the authority's chief education officer. However, these figures would still have shown examination results in Haringey falling below national averages, and gave no cause for the inspectorate to alter the judgment in the report that results achieved by fifth-formers in the borough—particularly in the schools inspected—were disappointing, even after allowing for socio-economic factors in pupils' background.

The concern expressed by Her Majesty's inspectors about educational provision in Haringey secondary schools related to many other issues in addition to examination results. Concern was also expressed about the quality of education in primary schools, where examination results are not at issue.

The authority accepted the report as a basis for action, and is seeking to develop ways of responding constructively to the inspectorate's findings. It has submitted a progress report to me, and will be submitting a further progress report at the end of the year.

Natural Environment Research Council

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the Natural Environment Research Council intends to appoint a director of earth sciences.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that it is the intention of the Natural Environment Research Council to appoint a director of earth sciences as soon as possible and that action is now in hand.

British Geological Survey

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the organisational structures of the British Geological Survey will be in future in the context of its recently agreed terms of reference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The organisational changes of the British Geological Survey are still under discussion in the context of the published NERC corporate plan. I understand that a final structure will be agreed after further consultation, particularly involving the director of earth sciences when appointed.

ENERGY

NIREX

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he proposes to reconstitute NIREX as a public company; and whom he proposes for the composition of the board of directors and the chairman of the company.

Mr. Goodlad: I hope to make a statement shortly.

Opencast Coalmining

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many opencast coalmining operations (a) are currently working and listed, (b) have been authorised in the past decade with specific method of use and (c) are subject to a planning application; and if, in the latter case, he will give an indication of the average time taken to obtain approval.

Mr. David Hunt: Forty-four NCB opencast sites are currently coaling in England and Wales and 10 in Scotland. The respective figures for licensed opencast sites is 57 and 25.

In the 10 years to September 1985, 112 authorisations have been granted in England and Wales and 25 in Scotland. Of the 112, 7 were specifically for coking coal and 11 for anthracite; of the 25, 2 were for low volatile coals.

Since the requirement for planning permission was placed on the NCB on 1 March 1984, 5 NCB sites in England and Wales have received planning permission and authorisation under the Opencast Coal Act 1958. Four of these are now working. A further 23 have yet to be resolved because planning permission has been refused or authorisation not yet granted or the planning application has not yet been determined. It would not be meaningful, in the circumstances, to quote an "average time", but there can be as long as 15 months between application and determination.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and by bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

CEGB (Publicity Material)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the Central Electricity Generating Board a general directive that it should submit all publicity material to him for his prior approval; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: No. The CEGB will remain free to issue any relevant publicity material consistent with its statutory powers and duties.

British Gas

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he proposes to take to seek to secure efficiency and competitive advantages from the privatisation of British Gas.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The proposals for the privatisation of British Gas will be of benefit to the consumer in the encouragement of efficiency by every means.

Energy Conservation

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received concerning the distribution of his Department's save energy booklets by Marketforce in Newcastle under Lyme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: None.

Crude Oil

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the trend in crude oil prices over the 12-month period to the latest date for which figures are available; and what projections are available to him about trends over the ensuring three-month period.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Figures published by the International Energy Agency show that the average price of a barrel of crude oil imported into the IEA area fell about $1·60 between the second quarter of 1984 and the second quarter of 1985.

Short-term indicators show some strengthening of crude oil prices in the third quarter.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Social Security (Fraudulent Claims)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, with a view to the discouragement of fraudulent claims for social security payments, he will consider the desirability of the Housing Executive requiring receipts for payments for work done as a condition of the payment of improvement and repair grants on private houses.

Mr. Needham: The prime requirement for the payment of a house renovation grant is the completion to a satisfactory standard of all the work specified by the Housing Executive. The submission of receipted builders' accounts is not a prior condition for payment of grant.

I am reluctant to introduce a procedure which might hold back claims from the less well-off for grants to combat housing unfitness and disrepair; particularly as it is doubtful if it would be an effective discouragement to fraudulent social security claims.

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of recent tourist project to benefit from the European Regional Development Fund.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted or not proceeded with in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, in Northern Ireland in respect of (a) scheduled and (b) non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: Information is not kept in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average time spent on remand for those who were subsequently acquitted or not proceeded with during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, in Northern Ireland in respect of (a) scheduled and (b) non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: Information is not kept in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons who were remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted or not proceeded against with, spent (a) nil to three months on remand, (b) three to six months on remand, (c) six to nine months on remand, (d) nine to 12 months on remand and (e) over 12 months on remand in respect of those first remanded during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, in respect of (i) scheduled offences and (ii) non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: Information is not kept in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the weekly cost of keeping a prisoner in custody in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively, in a remand institution in Northern Ireland in respect of (a) scheduled and (b) non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: Northern Ireland has no separate remand institutions; nor is information about costs maintained separately in respect of scheduled and other offences.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any plans to introduce financial compensation for those prisoners who were remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted or not proceeded with in Northern Ireland in respect of (a) scheduled and (b) non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: No.

Industrial Development Board

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many industrial national inquiries have been directed to (a) his Department and (b) the Northern Ireland Industrial Development Board during the last month for which statistics are available.

Dr. Boyson: Since September 1982 the Northern Ireland Industrial Development Board has been responsible for processing all inquiries about possible investment in Northern Ireland. The IDB received 13 firm inquiries from companies outside Northern Ireland in September 1985.

Harland and Wolff

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will express the totals of payments to Harland and Wolff for each year since 1979-80 in (a) a percentage of the sales value of work done and (b) per employee.

Dr. Boyson: Following is the information:

	Payments to H & W £ million	Selling value of work done (SVWD) £ million	Payments as percentage of SVWD	Employees	Payment per employee

1984-85	37·5	59·1	63·5	5,163	7,263

Notes:

1. The payments are made under the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries (Northern Ireland) Order 1979.
2. Until 1980 the company's annual accounts were on a calendar year basis; those for 1981-82 were adjusted and covered a 15-month period; thereafter on a financial year basis. The selling value of work done and employee figures follow this pattern. Both are based on the company's annual accounts.

De Lorean (RUC Investigations)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to his answer of 21 October, Official Report, column 64, when the investigations being carried out by the Royal Ulster Constabulary into the alleged misappropriation of funds from De Lorean Motor Cars Limited are likely to be completed.

Mr. Tom King: I have nothing to add to my answer of 21 October.

THE ARTS

Merseyside

Mr. Wareing asked the Minister for the Arts if he will outline the provision for the funding of the arts in the county of Merseyside from 1 April 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 315]: The Government announced last year that £34 million of additional central funding would be made available in 1986-87 for support of the performing arts, film and museums following the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan county councils, after allowing for a contribution from borough and district authorities relieved of precepts. Of this sum, £16 million for the performing arts would be administered by the Arts Council and £1 million for film by the British Film Institute. The remaining £17 million would be for museums.

It will be for the Arts Council and British Film Institute to determine, from within the resources available to them, the funding which they will pass to bodies in the area now administered by Merseyside county council. A new national trustee body will be established by Order in Council under section 46 of the Local Government Act 1985 to own and manage the bulk of the existing Merseyside museums and art galleries service. Its budget for 1986-87, which has yet to be determined, will be met from within the additional £17 million for museums.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total Government expenditure for the years 1975 to 1985, inclusive, expressed (a) at current prices, (b) in cost terms and (c) as a percentage of gross domestic product at market prices.

Mr. MacGregor: Detailed figures of public expenditure over the period 1974-75 to 1984-85 were given in an article entitled "Measuring Public Expenditure" published in the August 1985 issue of Economic Trends.

The figures requested have been extracted from the above named article and are as follows:

Arts Donations

Mr. Speller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to exempt from tax donations to the arts by private or corporate donors, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion. Many bodies concerned with the arts are charities, and donations made to them under deed of covenant already qualify for tax relief.

EC (Finance Ministers' Meeting)

Mrs. Currie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will report the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community's Council of Finance Ministers.

Mr. Gow: The ECOFIN Council met in Luxembourg on 28 October. I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council has preliminary discussions on the Commission's annual economic report and the recent Greek economic measures. Lord Cockfield put forward the Commission's views on indirect tax harmonisation. The Council agreed to return to these matters at its next meeting, on 18 November.

The Council discussed the proposal in the Commission's amending letter of 11 October to increase the 1986 budget provision for the United Kingdom's 1986 VAT abatement under the Fontainebleau system by 264 mecu (some £155 million). The Council agreed that the United Kingdon was entitled to receive this additional sum during 1986. The Commission was invited to bring forward an amending budget in September 1986, which would take account of the 264 mecu and of any other corrections indicated by the latest budgetary information, and the Council undertook to take the necessary decisions on the basis of the Commission's proposal.

I proposed that the Community should take an early opportunity to consider how the financial guideline limiting agricultural spending should be applied to the Community of Twelve. The Commission undertook to prepare a communication to the Council about this.

Finally, considerable progress was made in the Council's discussion on liberalising the marketing of unit trusts throughout the Community. Subject to a waiting reserve by Denmark, the Council agreed the texts of co-ordination and capital movements directives establishing common rules for unit trusts and other undertakings for collective investment in financial securities (UCITS). These directives are intended to take effect from October 1989.

EC (Farm Budget)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increased costs to the draft 1980 European Economic Community farm budget caused by each percentage fall in the value of the dollar below the dollar ecu rate of 1·2 specified in that budget, what reserve contingency is available to meet these increased costs and what steps he has taken to seek to ensure that such variations in the exchange rate do not increase the farm budget beyond the agreed budgetary discipline limits.

Mr. Gow: Estimating the budgetary costs of a depreciation of the dollar against the ecu below the level of 1·20 assumed in the draft budget for 1986 is a complicated operation, which the Commission is best placed to undertake. Account has to be taken not only of the direct impact on export refunds and certain production aids but also of indirect effects such as the supply and demand response on world markets for agricultural products whose prices are denominated in dollars.

There is no contingency reserve in the draft budget for 1986 to cover such eventualities as a change in the dollar/ecu exchange rate. However, the Council agreed in its conclusions on budgetary discipline to proceed so as to keep expenditure relating to agricultural markets within the financial guideline and, if an overrun threatened, to take the necessary decisions to prevent this. The Commission has undertaken to avoid an overrun by management measures and by putting necessary policy proposals to the Council and not to introduce a supplementary budget until it has exhausted all these opportunities for savings.

Customs (Drug Imports)

Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many customs officials at ports of entry were engaged on the prevention of illegal drug importation in each year since 1960.

Mr. Gow: Separate figures for the number of customs officials at ports of entry engaged in the prevention of illegal drugs importation are not available prior to 1978. The figures from 1978 to 1986 (estimated) are as follows:

	Numbers
1 April 1978	3,274
1 April 1979	3,445

	Numbers
1 April 1980	3,214
1 April 1981	3,027
1 April 1982	2,890
1 April 1983	2,795
1 April 1984	2,721
1 April 1985	2,823
1 April 1986*	3,000

DEFENCE

RAF Upper Heyford (Noise Tests)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce the results of the recent noise tests at RAF Upper Heyford.

Mr. Stanley: We intend to publish the results of the tests once decisions on the Department's noise compensation policy review have been taken. My noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Support intends to make an announcement on this shortly. I can, however, say that the tests indicated that a noise insulation scheme would be justified.

Aircraft Noise (North Devon)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints he has had about problems of RAF aircraft noise in urban areas in North Devon in the last 12 months; and what steps he is taking to seek to alleviate them.

Mr. Stanley: In the last 12 months, the Ministry of Defence has received eleven complaints from urban areas in north Devon about military aircraft noise. The heights and speeds at which flying training is conducted in the United Kingdom are limited in order to contain noise levels, and adherence to these limitations is closely monitored. Our rules on low flying are summarised in the Ministry of Defence leaflet "Why low flying", copies of which I am sending to my hon. Friend and am also placing in the Library.

Japan (Prisoners of War)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government will take up with the Japanese authorities questions of compensation for allied prisoners who were used as guinea pigs for medical research at Mukden and elsewhere during world war II.

Mr. Stanley: My noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Support will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date his Department received a letter from the hon. Member for Caernarfon, dated 22 July 1985, concerning allegations that the Japanese used prisoners of war as guinea pigs for medical experiments during world war 2; when he intends to reply to the letter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Member's letter was received on 24 July and my noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Support will be replying shortly.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many full-time members of the Ulster Defence Regiment have been medically discharged by the Army since 1970; of these, how many were under civilian doctor or consultant care; and how many full-time members of the Ulster Defence Regiment have been brought before a medical board and found unfit and have subsequently been discharged on termination of engagement.

Mr. Stanley: The information is not available in the form requested. My noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Support will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible with such information as can be derived from existing records.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and by bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Radar Station, Fylingdales

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the costs of improvements being made or planned at the radar station at Fylingdales; whether the United States Government are paying any portion of these costs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have received proposals from the United States Government to update the facilities at Fylingdales. These proposals are still under discussion with the US Government, and we have not yet made a decision. If the update were to proceed, we expect that the US Government would bear most of the cost.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what funds he has made available in each of the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 to work undertaken under the Alvey programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Defence expenditure on the Alvey programme totalled £2·8 million in 1984-85. Expenditure of £10·3 million is planned for 1985-86.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what approaches he has received from the United States Government, or from United States based companies, expressing an interest in the purchase of information technology arising out of defence aspects of the work of the Alvey programme; what has been his response; and whether any of these approaches have been related to the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have received no such approaches.

Official Secrets Act (Trial)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence for how long Senior Aircraftsman Gwynfor Owen was kept in solitary confinement; what was the size of his cell; for how many days and for how long each day he was interrogated; and for how many hours he was locked up in a cell alone after his arrest on charges relating to the Official Secrets Acts.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which the seven service men based in Cyprus were (a) detained and (b) interrogated by the Provost Marshall's department after their arrest on charges relating to the Official Secrets Acts.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my statement in the House yesterday at c. 842-3.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) in each of the three services, what are the total numbers of ethnic minority members holding officer rank;

(2) if he will estimate the total numbers and percentages of ethnic minority members in the armed forces as a whole, and in each of the three services.

Mr. Stanley: The Ministry of Defence does not have this information.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of each armed service are black and what percentage in each case this represents of the total strength; how many members of the Royal Greenjackets are black and what percentage this represents of the total strength; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested is not held by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the promotion of racial equality of opportunity in recruitment to the armed forces and on the means used to give effect to and monitor the operation of that policy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Race Relations Act 1976 applies to the armed services, subject to certain qualifications. As such, no form of racial discrimination is tolerated either in recruitment or in subsequent employment. A complaint from an individual that he had not been recruited to the armed forces on racial grounds could be brought before an industrial tribunal in the normal way. Any complaint of racial discrimination brought by a member of the armed forces concerning his treatment in the service would be fully investigated under existing redress of grievance procedures provided for in the Service Discipline Acts.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on proposals for the modernisation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's short-range nuclear weapons.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 26 June 1985 at columns 437 and 438.

Defence Planning Committee

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the date of the next ministerial meeting of the Defence Planning Committee.

Mr. Stanley: The next ministerial meeting of the Defence Planning Committee will take place in Brussels early in December.

USS Iowa

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the USS Iowa will visit Britain in 1985.

Mr. Stanley: We have received no request from the United States Navy for such a visit.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many cruise missiles are at Greenham Common at present;

(2) how many cruise missiles are expected to be at Greenham Common in January 1986.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot at present add to what is said in paragraph 27 of Annex A to Volume I of "The Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985". I also refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 26 June 1984 at column 418.

HMS Otter and Euryalus

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what parts of the refit programe for HMS Otter and HMS Euryalus which were originally to be carried out by the contractor have been subsequently carried out by industrial civil servants employed by the Royal Navy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No part of the refit of HMS Otter, originally to be carried out by the contractor, has subsequently been carried out by industrial civil servants. A missile launcher for HMS Euryalus which had been defective on supply to the contractor and as a result was damaged in setting to work, was repaired by industrial civil servants in the Portsmouth fleet maintenance and repair organisation.

Royal Navy (Reserve Forces)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any new procedures are to be introduced to improve the administration and readiness of the Royal Navy's reserve forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The Royal Navy intends to introduce a system of annual reporting for most members of the Royal Fleet Reserve with effect from 1 April 1986. The arrangements will be similar to those for Army reservists which were introduced in 1981. Once a year, the Royal Navy reservists will be summoned individually, by letter, to report for one day to an annual reporting centre within 50 miles of their home. The aim is to maintain regular contact with the reservists, to verify personal details, determine current state of health and welfare, check and update documentation, and ensure that kit is complete and serviceable. Each individual will receive a payment for attendance. Annual reporting will enable the Navy to make better use of the skills of members of the Royal Navy Fleet Reserve should the need arise, and it will help to ensure that they are ready to play their part in meeting their mobilisation commitments. I hope that employers will do all they can to help in releasing the reservists they employ so that they can meet this important commitment.

Maternity Leave

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will seek to apply to service women the provisions of current employment protection legislation with respect to maternity leave and the right subsequently to resume employment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have no plans at present to do so.

Married Service Women

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to abolish the rule whereby, in situations which require service personnel to state their rank and number, a married service woman is obliged to give the relevant information in respect of her husband; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Married service personnel are only required to give details of the spouses in cases where that information is directly relevant.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong (Exhibition)

Sir Peter Blaker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to "Hong Kong—into the Future" to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Rifkind: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 11 to 16 November.

El Salvador (Refugees)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have made representations to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights about the position of refugees from El Salvador in Hondufas.

Mr. Rifkind: We are in touch with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and others in connection with the problems of these refugees. We have contributed over £1,300,000 for the relief of refugees and displaced persons in central America since 1981, £530,000 of which has gone to the UNHCR.

Irish Republic

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in respect of the current negotiations taking place between the British and Irish Government, any formal discussions have also been held with the official opposition in the Irish Republic.

Mr. Rifkind: No.

Disarmament

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress on the conference on disarmament in Europe talks.

Mr. Rifkind: During the seventh session of the conference, agreement was reached on a new informal working structure. We and our allies hope that this s significant development will enable us to make progress on the practical confidence and security building measures proposed in the working documents which we and our allies have tabled.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in the conference on disarmament in Europe talks in Geneva.

Mr. Rifkind: The conference completed its programme of work for 1985 on 30 August and will resume on 4 February 1986. Useful discussions have taken place this year under all agenda items. The United Kingdom has participated actively and constructively and we have tabled four working papers: two on chemical weapons, one on seismic monitoring for a comprehensive nuclear test ban, and one on the principal international agreements relevant to outer space. Limited progress was made in the negotiations for a total ban on chemical weapons. This will continue to be the United Kingdom's main priority at the conference throughout 1986, when the Leader of the United Kingdom delegation will be chairing the negotiations on chemical weapons.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made at the mutual and balanced force reduction talks in Vienna.

Mr. Rifkind: There is no significant progress to report from the mutual and balanced forces reductions talks. During the 37th round which will end on 5 December, we and our allies have continued to explore eastern positions in the hope of identifying ways forward.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Council of Ministers

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mr. Rifkind: The usual written forecast was deposited in the House earlier today. At present, nine meetings of the Council are scheduled for November.

The Fisheries Council is expected to meet on 4 November to consider Norway pout; Monkfish and Megrim quotas; increase in plaice total allowable catch quotas in zone 7F and G; marketing standards for shrimps and certain fresh and chilled fish; relations with certain third world countries and international organisations; flat rate quotas for hake, horse mackerel and blue whiting for Spain in 1986; and, possibly, proposals on improving fishing control measures and on technical measures in the Baltic and the Belts.

The Development Council is scheduled to meet on 11 November to discuss the famine in Africa; co-ordination of member states' aid policies; women in development, and trade promotion.

The Energy Council is also scheduled to meet on 11 November to consider the investment proposal for solid fuels; coal aid social measures; state aids for coal; subsidised coking coal; demonstration projects and projects in the hydrocarbons sector; energy objectives; the oxygenate directive and oil refining and oil product prices.

The Transport Council is expected to meet on 14-15 November. Shipping matters to be discussed are unfair practices, the freedom to provide services, cargo sharing and competition rules. Aviation tariffs, capacity and competition rules will also be on the agenda. The Council will additionally discuss drivers' hours, and haulage capacity, lorry weights, drive axle, the Italian 'master plan' initiative and relations with Austria. It is hoped that the Council will be able to start finalising plans for the European Road Safety Year in 1986. Road quotas for Spain and Portugal and the plating directives are possible agenda items.

The Economic and Finance Council is expected to meet on 18 November to continue discussion on the annual report on the economic situation in the Community, and on the recent economic measures in Greece. The Council is also likely to consider proposals for amendments to the Treaty of Rome in respect of the European monetary system; indirect tax approximation in the context of the internal market; and the calculation of commercial interest reference rates which apply to export finance. The Council will probably give final agreement to the Unit Trusts and associated capital movements Directives.

The Agriculture Council is scheduled to meet on 18/19 November to resume its discussion on cereal and rapeseed prices for 1985-86 and the Commission's Green Paper on perspectives for the CAP. It is also expected to consider the review of the sugar regime; ACP — African, Caribbean and Pacific states — sugar; sugar for the chemical industry; starch production refunds; olive oil consumption aid; hormones; and pesticide residues in cereals and foodstuffs of animal origin.

The Foreign Affairs Council is expected to meet on 25/26 November to discuss a negotiating mandate for adaptation protocols to amend the trade regimes under the Community's agreements with Mediterranean countries to take account of enlargement; the Community's trade relations with the United States and Japan, and proposals for special measures to be adopted under ERDF regulation to support regions of the community affected by the difficulties facing the textiles, shipbuilding and fisheries industries, and certain problems faced by border areas.

The Budget Council is expected to meet on 26 November to consider the European Parliament's amendments and modifications to the 1986 draft budget of the European Communities.

The Environment Council is due to meet on 28 November to discuss a directive on agreed limits on vehicle exhaust emissions, a directive on the reduction in emissions of sulphur dioxide, oxides of nitrogen and dust from all existing large combustion plants, the new water directive, the regeneration of waste oils, the harmonisation of member states' programmes for the reduction and eventual elimination of pollution by wastes from industrial establishments, safeguarding against possible harmful effects from the spreading of sewage sludge on agricultural land, a proposed directive to reduce the maximum permitted sulphur content of gas oil, and the marine pollution information system.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Attorney-General what salary scale and conditions the Director of Public Prosecutions intends to offer solicitors and barristers taking up posts in the Crown prosecution service (a) in London and (b) elsewhere in England and Wales, following enactment of the Prosecution of Offenders Act 1985; and what information he has as to how these compare with the average remuneration available to solicitors and barristers engaged in private work.

The Solicitor-General: The posts of barristers and solicitors employed in a professional capacity in the Crown prosecution service will be graded at one of the following levels:

Crown prosecutor
Senior crown prosecutor
Grade 6
Grade 5
Grade 4
Grade 3
Grade 2
Grade 1

Subject to pay protection arrangements which it is intended to include in regulations to be made under section 11 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 in relation to staff transferring from other authorities, the salary scales of such persons will be those applicable to their grade. All the above grades except Crown prosecutor and senior Crown prosecutor are of general application within the Civil Service. The grades of senior Crown prosecutor and Crown prosecutor will be special to the new service. The Director of Public Prosecutions has proposed that the former should correspond with that of principal in the Civil Service and that there should be a salary scale for the latter of £9,700-£14,000. I am at present considering representations from staff representatives on this issue. Staff employed in London will receive a London weighting allowance appropriate to the location of their office. Conditions of service will be those applicable to the Civil Service generally subject to such reserved rights as may be appropriate in relation to staff transferring from other authorities. These are at present the subject of discussions between officials of the Director of Public Prosecutions and representatives of the relevant unions.

The average remuneration of solicitors and barristers in private practice is not known centrally.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Attorney-General what are the respective roles of the criminal names index of the police national computer and the electoral register in jury vetting.

The Solicitor-General: When a jury vetting is authorised by my right hon. and learned Friend the criminal names index of the police national computer may be examined by police. The electoral register may be consulted as necessary to assist in confirming the identity of a potential juror.

Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA and the DHSS

Ms. Richardson asked the Attorney-General what is the total cost to public funds of all stages of the legal proceedings in Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbech area health authority and the Department of Health and Social Security.

The Solicitor-General: The total costs incurred on Mrs. Gillick's behalf by the legal aid fund will not be known until her lawyers' bills have been submitted and taxed in the usual way. However, it is not the practice to disclose the sums involved in individual cases. The costs incurred by the DHSS are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Official Secrets Acts (Trial)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he will state the criteria used and the factors taken into account by the Director of Public Prosecutions in deciding to bring prosecutions in the case of the seven service men based in Cyprus for alleged breaches of the Official Secrets Acts.

The Solicitor-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions in deciding to bring the prosecutions, and the Attorney-General in deciding to give his consent, each directed himself by reference to and in accordance with the guidelines on "Criteria for Prosecution" published by the Attorney-General in February 1983, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General what has been the total cost to public funds to date of the trial of the seven service men based in Cyprus on charges relating to the Official Secrets Acts.

The Solicitor-General: The total cost to public funds of an individual trial cannot at any date be ascertained. It comprises numerous elements borne by different Government Departments. For the most part these are absorbed in the general running costs of the Department concerned. It is not the practice to publish individual fees payable to counsel or solicitors from public funds, which in any event cannot be ascertained until after taxation of bills of costs.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and by bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Jopling: I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Deer

Mr. John Fraser asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce legislation to prevent the factory farming of deer and their transport for slaughter.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton).

Veal Crates

Mr. John Fraser asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the use of veal crates to be phased out.

Mrs. Fenner: The code of recommendations for the welfare of cattle, which was approved by Parliament in 1982, militates against methods associated with the veal crate system and recommends livestock keepers to consider the adoption of loose-housing systems.

Loose-housing systems are being increasingly used and most calves reared for veal are now kept in such systems.

The Government welcome this shift away from the veal crate system and will continue to encourage compliance with the recommendations of the welfare codes.

Nutritional Labelling

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to publish his proposals for legislation on nutritional labelling.

Mrs. Fenner: The preliminary stage of consultation with interested parties on the introduction of fat and nutrition labelling is now concluded. We aim to publish proposals for comment within the next two months.

Sugar

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the proposal of the European Commission contained in draft instrument R 8687/85 Com (85) 433, to retain the existing quota levels for sugar production.

Mr. Jopling: I consider that the current system of basing B quotas on production performance has encouraged over-production and that, given the current surplus, they should instead be allocated on a standardised percentage of the A quotas for all member states, in such a way as to lead to an overall reduction.

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the increase, in pence per kilogramme, of the cost of production of African, Caribbean and Pacific raw cane sugar imported into the United Kingdom from Mauritius, Guyana and Jamaica over the past five years.

Mr. Jopling: I regret that the information requested is not readily available.

Inclement Weather (Compensation)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now provide details of his proposed compensation arrangements to relieve agriculture from the effects of inclement weather in areas of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on 24 October 1985 [Vol. 84, c. 258].

Paraquat

Mr. Ashdown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) when the Advisory Committee on Pesticides last made a full review of the commercial clearance of paraquat; when the next such full review is intended to take place; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when the Advisory Committee on Pesticides last considered the conditions under which paraquat, and preparations containing paraquat, may be sold; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The Advisory Committee on Pesticides last reviewed and discussed the commercial clearances of the formulations of paraquat currently available in January 1982. The committee has also received a number of information papers on paraquat and the scientific sub-committee has kept the clearances and uses of paraquat under continuous scrutiny since that date. The timing of the next full review will depend, to some extent, on the results of the public consultation on the implementation of part III of the Food and Environment Protection Act.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of deaths attributable to poisoning by paraquat, both accidental and otherwise, in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Fenner: The number of deaths attributable to poisoning by paraquat, both accidental or otherwise, in each of the most recent five years for which figures are available are given in the table below:

Deaths from poisoning—England and Wales

	Paraquat
	Suicide	Others
1978	32	14
1979	26	10
1980	17	7
1981*	—	—
1982	21	6
1983	26	9

* Figures not available.
Source: Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.
Note: None of these deaths were attributable to the normal agricultural use of paraquat.

Development Awards

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes to review the level of development awards from tribunals and panels which were limited to that necessary to meet the dairy producer's expected production in 1984-85.

Mr. Jopling: No. I have already announced on 30 July how I propose to use the remainder of quota acquired under the outgoers' scheme in England and Wales.

Intervention and Assisted Private Storage (Stocks)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a complete list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in England and the United Kingdom, respectively, the amount held and values at the latest available date.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to the reply, Thursday 24 October 1985, c. 256]: The information requested is set out in the tables below. They set out the position at 30 September 1985. The values are calculated on the basis of the buying prices at that date. No values are provided for assisted private storage stocks since these are privately owned.

WALES

Inclement Weather (Compensation)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how he intends to implement Her Majesty's Government's commitment of 8 October to help livestock farmers affected by poor hay harvests in Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: An announcement will be made shortly.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table indicating how many of the senior civil servants in his Department are Welsh-speaking.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Of the 114 staff in the open structure, 60 are Welsh speakers.

European Regional Development Fund

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list Wales's share, in percentage terms, of the British allocation of the European regional development fund in each year since 1975; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The commitments to Welsh projects by the European regional development fund since 1975 as compared with the United Kingdom as a whole are as follows:—

	*1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	Total
United Kingdom (£ million)		150·4		99·7	162·8	153·4	193·7	245·7	243·5	345·2	1594·5

Approximate Welsh percentage of United Kingdom commitment		14		17	13	21	13	19	18	16	17

* Individual United Kingdom figures for the years 1975 to 1977 are not available.

For 1985 Wales has to date received commitment amounting to £5·4 million under the fund; this compares with £81 million for the United Kingdom as a whole. However I look forward to the Commission approving further substantial tranches of aid to Wales from the fund in the course of this year and next on the basis that bids totalling over £87 million in grant already submitted to Brussels by the Welsh Office are awaiting decision.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the provision for spending by each of the health authorities in Wales in each fiscal year since 1978 in 1985 prices.

Notes:

(1) The allocations have been adjusted to take account of general inflation as measured by the GDP market price deflator.

(2) Prior to 1982-83 the Dyfed area health authority covered the whole county.

(3) The figures (other than for 1985-86) reflect the end-of-year notified allocations to health authorities for capital and revenue purposes. They do not include any provisions for family practitioner services since expenditure on these services is demand determined and since family practitioner committees became independent of health authorities with effect from 1 April 1985.

(4) The allocations to authorities for 1985-86 are provisional since they reflect only those resources which have been allocated to date. A further £10·9 million is currently being held in central reserves for further developments in the services provided by health authorities. It will be released during the remainder of the financial year.

(5) The figures include both recurrent and non-recurrent provisions.

BBC (Peacock Committee)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what evidence he has given to the Peacock committee inquiry into the financing of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None. This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have ministerial meetings and a number of engagements in London on that day.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The estimated percentages of employees in employment in Wales in manufacturing at the dates requested were as follows:

Notes:

1. The figures are for all revenue (i.e. current) expenditure excluding payments to doctors, dentists, pharmacists, opticians and others providing services under contracts with family practitioner committees.
2. The figures for 1981-82 to 1984-85 are derived from the accounts of health authorities submitted to the Department. Figures for 1984-85 are at this stage provisional.
3. Prior to 1982-83 the Dyfed area health authority covered the whole county.
4. The figures provided for 1985-86 reflect the latest notified revenue allocations. A further £8·08 million remains in centrally held reserves for the further development of the services provided by health authorities. It will be released during the remainder of the financial year.
5. The out-turn figures for 1981-82 to 1984-85 include the expenditure of income generated locally by health authorities and are therefore not fully comparable with the Department's allocations to districts for 1985-86. The amount of such income in 1984-85 is estimated at £1·5 million.

Dairy Producers

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the total awards made by tribunals and panels to each of the three categories of special cases of dairy producers in Wales in 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Separate figures for Wales are not available, and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total quota requirement to restore small producers to their 1983 milk production levels in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Separate figures for Wales are not available, and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of young people on youth training scheme programmes go on to full-time employment in Wales and by each county in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information is only available at Manpower Services Commission area office level. The most recent published results of a sample survey of young people who left youth training schemes in Wales related to the period between July and September 1984. The survey showed the following percentages of youth training scheme leavers going into full-time employment:

	Per cent.
Wales	49
Mid and South Glamorgan	44
West Glamorgan and Dyfed	45
Gwynedd, Clwyd and Powys	54
Gwent	53

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the gross domestic product of Wales in the last 12 months for which figures are available; and how this compares with 1980 and 1975 in real and cash terms.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The figures requested are as follows:

GDP for Wales	£ million (current prices)
1983*	10,184
1980	8,079
1975	4,193

*Provisional.

Figures for GDP in constant price terms are not available for Wales.

Incomes and Wages

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average family income, personal income and wage for Wales at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: the most recent regional information on average household income, the wages and salaries component of that income, and the average numbers of persons per household (from which personal incomes can be derived) is given in the Department of employment publication "Family Expenditure Survey 1983", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

District Councils (Welsh Names)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce legislation to amend the Local Government Act 1972, so as to enable all district councils in Wales to use the Welsh form of their name for official purposes and in official documents.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Councils in Wales can already use the Welsh form of their name in all their dealings side by side with the English equivalent.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people are currently on Welsh housing authority waiting lists at the latest date for which figures are available;

(2) how many (a) private and (b) public housing starts have been made in each Welsh district authority so far in 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether, during the past six months, he has placed any financial restrictions on the Welsh Development Agency as regards the scale of its factory building programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have placed no financial restrictions on the scale of the Welsh Development Agency's factory building programme over the last six months.

Felinheli Bypass

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if there has been any change to the timetable for the construction of the Felinheli bypass as indicated by the then Minister of State, the hon. Member for Monmouth (Sir J. Stradling Thomas), at a meeting with the hon. Member for Caernarfon on 20 February and in a subsequent letter to the hon. Member; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

ENVIRONMENT

Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act 1985

1. Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has had any reaction from the Football League as to the financial effects on football clubs following the enactment of the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act.

Mr. Tracey: The responsibility for this Act lies with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to whom the hon. Member's question should have been re-directed. I apologise to the hon. Member for the fact that this was not done.

In answer to the hon. Member's question, I have recently received a letter from the Football League expressing concern in general terms about the financial effects of the Act. My right hon. Friend informs me that he has asked the league for more detailed information and expects to receive it very shortly.

Gleneagles Agreement

2. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the operation in the United Kingdom of the Gleneagles agreement, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Since taking office I hae received seven letters on this issue, three from organisations, one from my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) covering one from a constituent, and three from the public. I have informed these correspondents, and have indicated publicly on several recent occasions, that it remains the Government's policy to uphold the Gleneagles agreement.

Northern Region (Rates)

3. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will estimate the amount of commercial and business rates paid in the current year in the northern region.

Mr. Waldegrave: The amount of commercial and business rates paid in the northern region is estimated to be about £330 million in 1985-86.

Local Authority Services

4. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received proposing that local authorities be compelled to put services out to competitive tender.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As my hon. Friend will be aware, we have ourselves published proposals for the extension of competition in local authority services. More than 450 responses have been received up to the end of September. I have today placed in the Library a list of the main respondents.

22. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many district or borough level arrangements for waste management he has so far approved under the Local Government Act 1985.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Act does not provide for such approval. The latest position is set out in my answer of 25 October, at columns 266-67, to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield, (Mr. King). As it is rather long, I shall be pleased to send the hon. Gentleman a copy.

29. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements have been made for the continuation of the waste disposal services in the metropolitan county areas.

Mrs. Rumbold: The arrangements are contained in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) on 25 October, at columns 266-67. As it is rather long, I shall be pleased to send the hon. Gentleman a copy.

Local Authorities (Finance)

5. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the annual report of the Audit Commission concerning systems for controlling local authorities' revenue and capital spending.

Mr. Waldegrave: We welcomed the commission's report on the capital control system when it was published as a useful contribution to our review of the system. We will be responding fully to the report on the block grant distribution system when we have examined the Public Accounts Committee's findings following a parallel report by the Comptroller and Auditor General.

13. Mr. Foster asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the report of the study of local government finance conducted by the Minister for Local Government will include tables of the likely effect of any proposed charges upon different types of household and for each district in England.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It will contain the material necessary for the wide-ranging consultation we shall be seeking.

16. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the studies on local government finance will be published.

34. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of studies into the future of local government finance.

35. Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's response to the conclusions of the report of the inquiry into British housing, a copy of which has been sent to him.

46. Mr. Torney asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects the study of local government finance to be published and in what form.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We hope to publish proposals in a consultative document at about the turn of the year.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have applied and subsequently received a relaxation of the prescribed proportion of capital receipts.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand the hon. Member is referring to the supplementary capital expenditure allocations for 1985-86 given to English local authorities which complied with the Government's request for restraint on capital spending in 1984-85. Two hundred and thirty two authorities have received such allocations so far. One hundred and eighteen authorities have admitted non-compliance with the restraint and another 48 authorities have had their applications rejected. The position of the remaining 16 authorities will be determined once they have provided the information requested of them.

Green Belt

6. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received on his policy for the green belt.

19. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the future and the protection of the metropolitan green belt.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received a number of such representations. I share the widely-felt concern for the protection of green belt land. The Department's circular 14/84 reaffirmed the importance which the Government attach to green belts and the general presumption against inappropriate development within them.

50. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of land are now protected by green belts and how this compares with the position six years ago.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In total about 4½ million acres are now fully protected as green belt. When we took office, only about half of this total had been formally approved and about 1·8 million acres of the total was dependant upon detailed application in a miscellany of old development plans.

Peterlee Development Corporation

7. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider a further extension of the period of winding-up of Peterlee development corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: No. The Government considered this matter extensively prior to the announcement on 21 March this year by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), which extended the lives of the Aycliffe and Peterlee and the Washington development corporations until 31 March 1988. It is important that the development corporations should continue to make progress towards establishing satisfactory succesion arrangements, as called for by my right hon. Friend, and uncertainty about the wind-up date would not help in this.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

8. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received about privatising the water authorities.

Mr. John Patten: Forty-two.

Urban Programme Funding

9. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the capital and revenue levels of urban programme funding for 1985-86.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend has received a number of requests for increased funding and a number of representations about the balance between capital and current expenditure.

Local Authorities (Co-opted Members)

10. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to prohibit co-opted members from voting on local authority committees.

Mrs. Rumbold: We have asked the Widdicombe inquiry to consider within their general terms of reference the issue of co-options to local authority committees. We shall look at the need for legislation in the light of the inquiry's report which we expect next year.

Falklands and Ascension Islands (Airport Construction)

11. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the cost of recent construction works at Mount Pleasant airport in the Falklands and Wideawake airport on Ascension Island.

Sir George Young: The latest estimate for the RAF project at Mount Pleasant in the Falkland Islands is £297 million, plus £10 million for MOD supplied navigation aids. The latest estimate for the separate Army project is £130 million.

The latest estimate for the works at Wideawake air base on Ascension Island is £50 million.

All estimates take account of price changes due to inflation up to September 1985.

Sporting Events (Crowd Control)

12. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will give an up-to-date report on the discussions he has had about crowd behaviour at sporting events.

Mr. Tracey: The Government's concern has been primarily with crowd behaviour at football matches, though we are watchful for problems at other sports. Our discussions with the football authorities continue in my working group. A package of measures has been agreed; many of them, like our alcohol legislation, are in force. We continue to discuss the implementation of particular measures like membership cards and CCTV and to review needs and any fresh proposals that come forward.

Country Structure Plans

14. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to seek to ensure adherence by county councils to structure plans evolved following public consultation.

Mr. Tracey: In considering planning applications, local planning authorities must have regard to the structure plan and any local plans together with other material considerations. It is for county councils to keep their structure plans under review, and to propose alterations as necessary.

25. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the level of development for its structure plans for counties in southern England during the last three months.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received a number of such representations. Where these relate to structure plan alterations submitted but not yet approved, I shall consider them carefully before taking a final decision.

Housebuilding

15. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest housebuilding figures in the public and private sectors.

33. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest housebuilding figures.

Mr. John Patten: Estimates of housebuilding performance during the first eight months of this year were published on 3 October in my Department's press notice No. 482, which is available in the Library.

North of England County Councils Association

17. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with representatives of the north of England County Councils Association about its sixth state of the region report, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), met representatives of the association to discuss the report on 19 June this year. The meeting was also attended by ministerial colleagues from the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of Employment. Discussions covered a wide range of issues arising from the report.

London Docklands Development

18. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made by the London Dockland's development corporation in providing homes and jobs in London's docklands.

Sir George Young: 2,466 housing units have been completed and occupied between the corporation's inception in July 1981 and March 1985. A further 4,617 dwellings are contained within sites which are under construction and approximately 2,400 are planned to start in 1985-86. 5,700 jobs have been created in the area, including an average of 1,500 jobs in construction at any one time and 200 companies have moved into docklands since 1981.

These are substantial achievements which Ministers are determined to maintain.

Housing Accommodation (Young Tenants)

20. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he will take to stimulate the availability of low-cost related accommodation for young tenants.

Sir George Young: We have encouraged local authorities to concentrate their resources on those in special need, a category which includes homeless young people at risk of sexual or finanical exploitation. In addition, the Housing Corporation's programme for 1985-86 includes £550 million for expenditure on providing fair rent and hostel accommodation, and many young people will be among those benefiting from that expenditure.

Water Pollution

21. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made in improving the quality of water in rivers and estuaries.

Mr. Waldegrave: During the last two years there have been notable improvements to the Tees and the Tyne. The Mersey clean up continues. Another national survey of all our rivers and estuaries will take place next year.

Thamesmead

23. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of consultation on the future control of Thamesmead.

Sir George Young: Consultation was completed last week and on 25 and 26 October all adult residents were invited to indicate their preference between a private trust controlled by local residents of Thamesmead, a similar organisation controlled by Greenwich council or neither of these options. The ballot is being conducted by consultants under the supervision of the Electoral Reform Society. The result should be announced on or about 6 November 1985.

Long Leaseholders (Safeguards)

24. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received advocating safeguarding the position of long leaseholds in privately-owned flats.

Mr. John Patten: My Department has in recent years received a substantial number of letters from individuals and organisations about the problems associated with leasehold flats. In addition, the committee which is examining, under the chairmanship of Mr. Edward Nugee QC, the management of privately owned block of flats has received a large amount of evidence about such problems. I expect to receive its report shortly.

Housing Finance

26. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's housing policy in the light of the recent report of the inquiry chaired by His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh on housing finance, a copy of which has been sent to him.

31. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's housing policy in the light of the report of the inquiry into british housing chaired by His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It remains our policy to encourage the maximum spread of owner-occupation, and the maintenance and improvement of the existing housing stock, while ensuring a vigorous housing association movement.

The Government also hope to introduce legislation to encourage the supply of more homes for renting in the private sector, but probably not during the lifetime of this Parliament.

We shall study carefully the report of the inquiry into british housing, bearing in mind that it deliberately adopted a longer-term perspective.

Council House Sales

27. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further plans he has to encourage an increase in the number of sales of local authority housing.

Mr. John Patten: I have announced proposals for legislation to give better protection against high service charges to tenants exercising the right to buy their flats. Other measures to promote sales under the right to buy and by agreement are under consideration.

41. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the implications for levels of local authority housing investment of his policy in relation to council house sales.

Sir George Young: Council house sales have been beneficial in that they have generated very substantial capital receipts—almost £4 billion to June 1985. Local authorities can use the prescribed proportion of those receipts to augment their housing investment programmes. Sales do not of themselves increase the need for housing investment, since the change of tenure does not take the house out of the housing stock.

42. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in England since May 1979.

Mr. John Patten: From April 1979 to June 1985 about 647,000 dwellings were sold to sitting tenants by local authorities and new towns in England. If sales of vacant dwellings are included, the total is about 688,000.

58. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes have been sold under the right-to-buy facility by Teignbridge district council since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: Teignbridge district council has reported 906 sales completed under the right to buy between October 1980 and June 1985.

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many extra council and corporation houses have been sold over the last two years (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in Basildon since the discount was increased to 60 per cent.

Sir George Young: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Law of Property Act 1925

28. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has any plans to amend section 193 of the Law of Property Act 1925.

Mrs. Rumbold: Not at present. We are awaiting the report of the Common Land Forum before taking a view on the promotion of new commons legislation.

Labour Mobility

30. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce new measures to assist workers seeking to move from low-cost housing regions to high-cost areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have already developed the tenants' exchange scheme, the national mobility scheme, and the right to exchange in the public rented sector. We also hope to introduce legislation to encourage the supply of more homes for renting in the private sector, but probably not during the lifetime of this Parliament.

The employment transfer scheme of the Manpower Services Commission can also help with rehousing costs in some cases.

Watts Committee

32. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what conclusions he has reached on the recommendations of the Watts committee on water metering.

Mr. John Patten: I have received the committee's report and intend to publish it shortly.

Local Government Act 1985

36. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the local authority associations on the implementation of the Local Government Act 1985.

Mrs. Rumbold: My noble Friend the Minister of State met representatives of the AMA on 21 October to discuss the implications of the 1985 Act for staff.

43. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place between his Department and representatives of the metropolitan county councils since the Local Government Act received Royal Assent.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer to the answer I gave today, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), concerning discussions with the AMA. In addition, my noble Friend the Minister of State has met representatives of the MCC's during visits to most of the metropolitan counties.

Housing Investment Programme

37. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the housing investment programme allocations for 1986-87.

47. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make decisions about the housing investment programme for 1986-87.

Sir George Young: The housing investment programme allocations for local authorities are normally announced before the Christmas recess.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the housing investment programme allocations made to each London borough and to each metropolitan district in each of the years from 1978-79 to 1985-86 expressed in constant 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have placed this information in the Library.

Joint Boards

38. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the joint boards on their budget and manpower levels for 1986-87.

Mrs. Rumbold: None. These are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Secretary of State for Transport.

Urban Development Grant

39. Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated cost to the public sector so far of urban development grant projects for industrial and commercial development, and what is the estimated number of jobs created by those schemes.

Mr. John Patten: One hundred and twenty one industrial and commercial projects have been approved for urban development grant. They are expected to create over 16,000 permanent jobs for public expenditure of less than £60 million.

Rates Act 1984

40. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received since 25 July from those local authorities designated under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: Four authorities have formally requested a redetermination of their expenditure level under section 3(4) of the Rates Act 1984. I have also received a number of other representations from designated authorities and the local authority associations.

Scunthorpe (Derelict Land Grants)

44. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the operation of the derelict land grant scheme, the funds devoted thereto, and benefits derived therefrom; and whether any advantages have been derived by Scunthorpe.

Sir George Young: The reclamation of derelict land makes an important contribution to urban renewal by providing sites for development and improving the environment. It also relieves pressure for development in the countryside. Up to 1,300 hectares are reclaimed each year. My right hon. Friend has recently increased the resources available this year for such work by £5½ million to £82 million. Several important schemes are under way or under consideration in Scunthorpe, including the reclamation by Pipe and Rail Ltd. of 36 hectares, the largest private sector DLG scheme ever to have been approved.

Football Ground Improvements

45. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has had any recent discussions with representatives of Third and Fourth division English Football League clubs about Government financial support for ground improvements.

Mr. Tracey: The issues about financing of safety improvements at Football League grounds — in particular, of divisions 3 and 4—are discussed in my working group with the Football League (which represents all league clubs), the Football Association and other interested bodies.

The most recent meeting of the group was on 16 October.

Radioactive Waste

48. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made with the investigation of the feasibility of the disposal of radioactive waste below the seabed.

Mrs. Rumbold: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the concept of emplacing intermediate-level wastes under the continental shelf, I understand that NIREX has now let two contracts for generic desk studies into the feasibility of systems that may be suitable for this purpose.

Smith Houses

49. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Leicester city council concerning the designation of Smith houses by the local authority under the Housing Defects Act and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Leicester city council wrote to my Department on 2 July and again on 30 August about the designation of Smith houses under section 12 of the Housing Defects Act 1984. The designation was however legally invalid, and my officials have written to the council explaining why this is so. I have also written to my hon. Friend about this.

Water Supplies

51. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to alter the legal basis for water supply.

Mr. John Patten: We are reviewing some aspects of water supply and sewerage legislation with a view to modernisation and consolidation when the parliamentary timetable allows.

We are also considering whether to privatise some or all water authority functions. A statement will be made in due course.

Widdicombe Committee

52. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the interim report of the Widdicombe committee of inquiry.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's response to the Widdicombe inquiry's interim report on local authority publicity was published on 2 October, and a copy placed in the Library.

Beaches (Pollution)

53. Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in the last 12 months toward the establishment of further European standard bathing beaches in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Rumbold: Major schemes to improve the quality of bathing waters at the following resorts were in hand or completed during the last 12 months:

Redcar (Langbaurgh), Seaton Valley, Caister, Margate, Hythe, Hastings, Ryde and Weymouth.

Substantial investment was also carried out to improve the Mersey estuary.

If current expenditure levels continue over the next 15 to 20 years we shall have eliminated most of those unsatisfactory discharges to coastal waters which affect areas of environmental or amenity significance.

Housing Corporation

54. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the corporate plan of the Housing Corporation.

Sir George Young: I refer to the reply my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) on 13 June 1985, at column 524.

Local Authority Housing

55. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to help local authorities deal with the backlog of repairs to their housing stock, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Repairs to local authority housing will be taken into account in the allocation of resources for housing investment to local authorities. The Department's urban housing renewal unit is ready to offer advice and guidance to local authorities on a variety of imaginative ways in which the problems of run-down estates can be tackled.

57. Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many dwellings owned by local authorities in England were improved in the years 1980 to 1984, and how this compares with the period 1975 to 1979.

Sir George Young: Public sector improvements completed in 1975 to 1983, together with provisional figures for 1984, were published in table 7.1 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1974-1984". A copy is in the Library. Final figures for 1984 were published in my Department's press notice No. 433 issued on 4 September 1985.

60. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's housing policy in the light of the Royal Institute of British Architects' publication, "Local Authority Housing Repair and Maintenance Needs", a copy of which has been sent to him.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend expects shortly to publish the findings of the Department's own inquiry into the repair and improvement needs of local authority housing. We will be discussing the implications of those findings with the local authority associations and other interested bodies.

Audit Commission

56. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has discussed with the local authority associations the implications for his Department's policy of the annual report of the Audit Commission.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The 1984-85 annual report of the Audit Commission drew attention to the very considerable opportunities for providing better value for money in local authority services. The potential for reducing costs and improving services was discussed with the local authority associations at the meeting of the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance on 23 July 1985. As a result my officials arranged for the controller of audit of the Audit Commission to give a presentation to members of the CCLGF on 21 October.

Housing Defects Act 1984

59. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has made to the extra bids for resources from local authorities to meet their obligations under the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on 23 October 1985.

63. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications for repurchase have now been made under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. John Patten: Local authorities in England have so far reported that 140 dwellings were purchased under the Housing Defects Act between 1 December 1984 and 31 March 1985, and that some 190 dwellings have been repurchased during the first quarter of the current financial year. I regret that information on the number of applications made for assistance under the Housing Defects Act, including claims for repurchase under section 3(5) of the Act, is not currently available.

Housing Improvement Grants

61. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he received on the Green Paper on improvement grants.

Sir George Young: My Department consulted widely on the Green Paper and by 16 October had received 401 responses.

London Residuary Body

62. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what matters arising from the abolition of the Greater London council he has discussed with the chairman of the London Residuary Body.

Mrs. Rumbold: Those relevant to the Residuary Body's functions under the Local Government Act 1985.

Group of Eight

64. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Group of Eight to discuss the construction industry.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My predecessor met the Group of Eight on 22 July 1985. I hope to meet the group myself in the near future.

Housing Stress Areas

65. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which areas of housing stress he has visited since 26 July.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since becoming Secretary of State I have visited areas of housing stress in several towns and cities, and I shall be making further visits.

Local Authorities (EC Assistance)

66. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to increase the amount of European Community assistance to local authority projects.

Mr. Tracey: Local authorities and other public bodies which provide infrastructure for regional development in the assisted areas are given equal opportunity by the Government to apply for assistance from the European regional development fund. It is for the European Commission to decide initially which applications to support.

Royal Parks

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the saving to public funds of the privatisation of services of each of the royal parks.

Mr. Tracey: Catering, boating and deckchair services in the royal parks have been contracted out for over 20 years. In the last 2½ years the management of the Serpentine lido in Hyde park and of Richmond park golf courses and the provision of toilet and playground attendants in the royal parks have also been contracted out. Initial net "one off" costs have amounted to some £177,000. Operating savings to date have amounted to £170,000. The estimated future saving is about £130,000 per annum.

Furans and Dioxins

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any information as to the relative amounts of furans and dioxins produced (a) when batches of polychlorinated biphenyls are incinerated in drums and (b) by continuous liquid feed of polychlorinated biphenyls to an incinerator.

Mrs. Rumbold: No relative data are available since PCBs are not normally burnt in drums.

Trials have demonstrated that the amount of dibenzofurans and dibenzodioxins emitted as a result of high temperature incineration of PCBs by continuous liquid feed is consistently less than 1 part in 10^{12} (ie one in a million million) in stack gases.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and by bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

European Charter of Local Self-Government

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Government will now sign the European charter of local self-government which has been adopted by the Council of Europe; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. While we fully support the principles underlying the charter, we remain firmly of the view that its subject matter is not appropriate for an international agreement.

Surplus Urban Land

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 10 July, Official Report, column 475, if he will make a statement on the action that he has taken to require the owners of the 50 sites identified on the land registers to dispose of them; and what action he has taken or contemplates taking under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to bring these sites to the attention of private sector purchasers.

Sir George Young: I am presently considering the representations made to me following the 50 notices issued on 25 June under section 99 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. In the light of those representations, my right hon. Friend will decide whether or not to direct the owners to dispose of their interest in the sites under section 98 of the Act. He will issue his decision shortly.

Inspectors

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the numbers and percentages of the total of his Department's current inspectors who were recruited from (a) central Government, (b) local government, (c) the diplomatic service, (d) the armed services, (e) private enterprise and (f) other sources.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The following list gives the numbers and percentages of the Department's current salaried inspectors who fall into each of the categories listed:

	Number	Percentage of total
(a) central government	37	19
(b) local government	114	58
(c) the diplomatic service	11	6
(d) the armed services	15	8
(e) private enterprise	7	3
(f) other sources	12	6
TOTAL	196	100

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was (a) the total strength of the salaried inspectorate, excluding management, and (b) the total strength of the salaried inspectorate, including management, for the last five years to the latest available date.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The total strength of the salaried inspectorate over the last five years, as at 1 October each year is as follows:

	(a) excluding administrative staff and senior management	(b) including administrative staff and senior management
1982	180	372
1983	166	356
1984	168	359
1985	186	393

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment pursuant to the Answer of 16 January, Official Report, column 152, if he will publish in the Official Report details of the range of recognised professional qualifications required of his Department's inspectors to consider planning appeals under the Town and Country Planning Acts and related legislation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The range of recognised professional qualifications required of housing and planning inspectors in the Department of the Environment is as follows:

Corporate membership of the Royal Town Planning Institute, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the Institution of Civil Engineers, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (any sub-division); registered architects; barristers called to the English or Northern Ireland bars, advocates called to the Scottish bar, or solicitors admitted in England, Scotland or Northern Ireland. Exceptionally, candidates without a professional qualification can also be considered if they have experience of special value to the planning inspectorate.

Limestone, Sand and Gravel

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate the estimated reserves of sand and gravel in England outside marine areas and the anticipated requirements for these minerals in 1990 and 2000.

Mr. Tracey: The estimated permitted reserves of sand and gravel in England totalled 965 million tonnes on 1 January 1982. The demand for sand and gravel in England was forecast in 1981 to be between 62 and 86 million tonnes per annum in 1990. No forecast has yet been made for the year 2000.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) limestone quarries and (b) sand and gravel sites are currently being worked in the United Kingdom; and if he will list the new quarries or sites that have been authorised in the past two years.

Mr. Tracey: There are approximately 360 limestone quarries and 1,180 sand and gravel sites currently being worked in England, Wales and Scotland. Records are not kept centrally of sites granted planning permission in the past two years.

Sulphur Emissions

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes in the volume of United Kingdom sulphur emissions he estimates will take place between 1985 and (a) 1993, (b) 1995.

Mrs. Rumbold: In 1984 total United Kingdom emissions of sulphur dioxide were 3·5 million tonnes. The Department of Energy estimates that, depending on the assumptions made, total emissions will be in the range of 3·4 million to 4·2 million tonnes in 1990 and 3·1 million to 4·5 million tonnes in 2000. There are no estimates for 1993 and 1995.

These estimates for 1990 and 2000 have been made on the basis of Department of Energy projections of long-term energy demand, prepared for and submitted to the Sizewell public inquiry in 1982. These projections are, by their very nature, subject to great uncertainty. They include alternative assumptions about the level of world economic activity, international fuel prices and the growth and structure of the United Kingdom economy. They therefore cover a range of scenarios which, in turn, produce a range of emission estimates.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures for the percentage of United Kingdom emissions of sulphur estimated to have been deposited in (a) Sweden and (b) Norway, in each of the last five years for which figures are available, on the basis of depositions from all sources, and from sources of known origin, respectively.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is estimated that in 1980 United Kingdom sulphur emissions gave rise to 6·1 per cent. of total deposition and 8·5 per cent. of deposition from known sources, in Sweden; and to 9·8 per cent. of total deposition and 17·4 per cent. of deposition from known sources, in Norway. It is also estimated that about 2 to 3 per cent. of United Kingdom emissions fell on Sweden and a similar percentage on Norway.

Directly comparable figures for other years are not available but I am obtaining estimates and will write to the hon. Member.

Norfolk Broads

Mr. Ryder asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to bring forward legislation to establish a new authority for the Norfolk Broads.

Mrs. Rumbold: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Garage Sales

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what encouragement is being given to local authorities and development corporations to sell off garages.

Sir George Young: Where a local authority or new town dwelling is being sold to a tenant who has the right to buy, the sale must include any garage let together with or used for the purposes of the dwelling. The Department has made it possible for local authorities and development corporations to sell garages to other categories of purchaser on a voluntary basis, at a discount where appropriate.

Housing Subsidies

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total of housing subsidies paid by the Housing Corporation to each housing association in Cumbria for the last month for which stastistics are available.

Sir George Young: The Housing Corporation finances the development costs of housing association projects within an approved development programme agreed by my right hon. Friend. The value of projects in Cumbria which were approved by the Housing Corporation in September 1985, the latest month for which information is available are as follows:

	£ thousands
Fair rent (new build)
North Housing Association	791

Mineral Sites

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many planning applications in Greater London for minerals sites in the most recent year for which figures are available of (a) over two hectares were dealt with by the Greater London council and (b) of less than two hectares were dealt with by the boroughs.

Mr. Tracey: Comprehensive information about minerals planning applications in Greater London is not available but, from the returns made by London boroughs to my Department, 5 minerals planning applications were recorded in the year ended June 30 1985. Site sizes of applications referred to the GLC are not held centrally.

Strategic Planning

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 submitted by the Greater London council before 1 February 1984 are still awaiting written consent.

Mr. Tracey: I assume that the hon. Member means 1 February 1985, in which case two applications submitted before that date are outstanding. In both cases further information requested from the GLC is awaited to enable the applications to receive full and proper consideration.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what strategic planning guidance his Department has issued to the Greater London council since 1976 other than in published circulars.

Mr. Tracey: Through its membership of SERPLAN, the GLC will have received guidance from my right hon. Friend on 7 August 1980 "South East Regional Strategic Guidance", and on 23 March 1984, "M25 and Land Use Planning in the South East".

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the likely administrative costs of the proposed planning system in London in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council; and what are the costs of the present system.

Mr. Tracey: This information is not available. Records are not kept of administration costs at every level of the planning system in London. However, with the abolition of one tier in the system, overall costs are expected to be less than they would otherwise have been for a comparable caseload.

Lea Valley Regional Park

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the present arrangements for financing the Lea Valley regional park; and what arrangements will be made, if the Greater London council is abolished, to continue its funding.

Mr. Tracey: The arrangements for funding the Lea Valley regional park authority are set out in the Lea Valley Regional Park Act 1966. The three contributing councils are the Greater London council and the Essex and Hertfordshire county councils. The intention is for the GLC contribution to be split at abolition between the 32 London boroughs and the City of London by means of a per capita levy.

Isle of Dogs

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take to ensure that the nature, merits, and impact on life in east London and on strategic planning in Greater London of the proposals to construct a major financial centre of 10 million sq ft on 70 acres of Canary wharf in the enterprise zone on the Isle of Dogs are given some form of statutory public scrutiny prior to the effective decision being taken to proceed with the project.

Sir George Young: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the date when the London Docklands development corporation is expected to give, or has already given, its consent in principle for the creation of a 10 million sq ft financial centre on Canary wharf in the enterprise zone on the Isle of Dogs; what further negative or positive decisions will need to be made and by whom in order for the scheme to proceed; by what dates he expects those decisions will be taken; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The majority of the proposed financial centre on Canary wharf is located within the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone and benefits from planning permission under the EZ scheme. The board of the London

Docklands development corporation did, however, give approval on October 17 to the incorporation in the proposed scheme of buildings more than 120 ft in height and to development within the EZ boundary subzones, subject to approval by LDDC of the materials to be used throughout the proposed development. At the same time the board, in its capacity as landowner, gave approval in principle to the consortium's master plan. The binding contract leasing the land in the corporation's ownership to the consortium is expected to be submitted to the LDCC board for approval in December. An application for planning approval for the part of the development outside the EZ will also need to be made to LDDC as local planning authority in the normal way.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give the dates when the London Dockland Development Corporation first provided written information or plans of the proposal of Credit Suisse-First Boston to create a major financial centre on the Isle of Dogs to hon. Members whose constituencies include part of the statutory area of the corporation;

(2) if he will give the dates when the London Docklands Development Corporation gave official notification to the London boroughs of Tower Hamlets and Newham and the Greater London council, respectively, of the proposal by Credit Suisse-First Boston to create a major financial centre on the Isle of Dogs; and in what form any such notice was given.

Sir George Young: The LDDC has been in continuing discussion with the London borough of Tower Hamlets about the plans for a major financial centre on Canary wharf within the borough. The Docklands Forum, the local Members of Parliament, the City of London chief officers and the Docklands Business Club, among others, were invited to presentations on the proposals. In addition to its contacts with Tower Hamlets the LDDC has written to the London boroughs of Newham, Southwark, Lewisham and Greenwich and the GLC informing them of the proposed development and offering to give them presentations.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether, in relation to the proposals for the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, he will arrange to call in the proposals for his own consideration;

(2) in relation to the proposals for the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, what existing development will be displaced and with what employment consequences.

Mr. John Patten: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much the proposals for the Canary wharf site in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone would increase the rateable return to be remitted by his Department to the London borough of Tower Hamlets in lieu of normal rate payments by the developer.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 22 October [Vol. 84, c. 129].

Cultural Festival of India

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether an application for consent has been made by the Greater London council under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 in respect of a contract made by its officers on behalf of the Greater London council with P.N. Structures Limited in respect of £101,200 for works carried out in connection with the Cultural Festival of India's display at the Brent show.

Mr. Tracey: No.

Sports (Drugs)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will have discussions with sporting authorities about the use of drugs, including beta-blockers, by sportsmen and women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I strongly condemn the use of drugs in sport. Action to combat this is vigorously and positively led by the Sports Council, and I fully support its actions. In March 1984 the council adopted a resolution obliging all sports to introduce random checks. In March 1985 the council decided to apply severe sanctions to governing bodies of sport who did not introduce effective anti-doping measures. The council continue to fund research into methods of detection for new drugs which unfairly aid performance.

The Government and the Sports Council have also taken firm action in the international context. In May 1984 the Government supported the adoption of a European anti-doping charter; and more recently the Sports Council announced the formation of an international working party, chaired by the United Kingdom, to study ways and means for the promotion and implementation of effective anti-doping measures.

Portsdown Park Housing Estate

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what public funds are available to Portsmouth city council with respect to the refurbishment of the Portsdown Park housing estate.

Sir George Young: That will depend on the type of scheme which the council decides upon for refurbishing the estate. As I have told the council, my Department's urban housing renewal unit can provide local authorities with detailed advice and assistance on tackling the problems of their rundown estates, and it may be able to help them to find the resources necessary, either in the public or private sectors, or both.

London Lesbian and Gay Centre

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act for the London Lesbian and Gay Centre was refused; and when a reply will be sent to the Greater London council's appeal against this decision.

Mr. Tracey: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my right hon. Friend gave on 3 May to my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) [Vol. 78, c. 257]. The Department replied on 20 August 1985 to the GLC's request that my right hon. Friend reconsider his decision.

Women's Peace Bus

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act for the Women's Peace Bus was refused.

Mr. Tracey: Consent to the GLC's proposed grant of £41,363 to the Women's Peace Bus Co-operative was refused because my right hon. Friend was not satisfied that the proposed expenditure by the council would be either expedient or in the interests of Greater London or any part of it or all or any of its inhabitants.

Elgin and Walterton Estates

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether Westminster city council has sought his consent for the disposal of the whole or any part of the Elgin and Walterton estates.

Mr. John Patten: No.

Thoroughbred Breeding Establishments

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the amount of rateable income derived by local authorities on a year-by-year basis from the date of inception of the rating of thoroughbred breeding establishments.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is not held centrally. However, the total rateable value of horse breeding establishments assessed by valuation officers was of the order of £600,000 at March 1985. Applying the average general rate poundage for shire areas in England in 1984-85 of £1·69 in the pound suggests a potential rate income from these establishments of about £1 million for that year.

"Spare Rib"

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why consent for Spare Rib under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 was refused.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend was not satisfied that there was any justification for an organisation whose primary purpose is to publish a mass circulation popular magazine to be funded by ratepayers.

Local Authorities (Discrimination)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer of 19 November 1984, Official Report, column 3, he will make a further statement on any proposals that he is considering to prevent local authorities from discriminating against private companies for reasons which have nothing to do with the quality of their work.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, Thursday 24 October 1985, c. 252]: The Government remain very concerned about the misuse of contractual powers by a few local authorities for political purposes. The hon. Member will recall that the Government have given commitments to legislate on this issue but analysis of the recent decision of the House of Lords in the case of Wheeler and Others v. Leicester City Council has led us to reconsider whether such legislation is necessary. Although that case was concerned with conditions imposed by a local authority in pursuance of a specific statutory responsibility, the decision fortifies the view that authorities which discriminate against firms on the basis of irrelevant political considerations do so unlawfully. The Government appreciate the practical difficulties facing a firm wishing to assert its legal rights in this area, but any new legislation would still require action to be taken in the courts by or on behalf of individual companies. It would seem that the law as it stands gives sufficient scope for such action.

SCOTLAND

Farm Animal Health

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to seek to ascertain the subsequent health of cows sold in 1983 from two farms near Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, the names of which are being supplied to him.

Mr. John MacKay: Following allegations about stock purchased from a dispersal sale at Househill farm, Larbert, in April 1983 visits were made to 18 farms by members of the State Veterinary Service. Some animal health problems typical of those affecting dairy cattle were encountered amongst the purchased animals but the majority were found to be in good health. I am not aware of similar allegations concerning Netherwood farm.

Animal Medicines

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the stringency of tests on medicines for animal consumption.

Mr. Younger: Veterinary medicines as well as human ones must be licensed under the Medicines Act 1968. Licences are granted only after a thorough evaluation of data relating to the safety, quality and efficacy of the product. The assessment covers the safety of consumers of produce from treated animals as well as that of the animals themselves. In licensing the products Ministers are advised by a statutory committee of independent experts in animal and human health, the Veterinary Products Committee. Amongst other things the product licence specifies any necessary recommendations for the safe use of the product, such as the withdrawal period to be observed before produce from a treated animal is used for human consumption.

Veterinary Laboratory, Lasswade

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he has made a study of the effects of the proposed closure of the veterinary laboratory at Lasswade on agriculture in the south of Scotland;

(2) what representations he has received about the proposed closure of the veterinary laboratory at Lasswade.

Mr. Younger: In announcing his decision to close the veterinary laboratory at Lasswade, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, whose Department is responsible for the services currently provided by the laboratory, has made it clear that essential diagnostic services needed in Scotland will continue to be provided for the benefit of Scottish agriculture. The most appropriate means of doing so are under active consideration.

I have received a number of representations about the proposed closure from parliamentary colleagues, representatives of the farming and poultry industries and members of the veterinary profession.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the net cost of policing the mining dispute for each police authority in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is set out in the following table:

Smallholdings

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many agricultural smallholdings were leased to tenant farmers by his Department in each district and islands area in May 1979 and in October 1985, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of agricultural smallholdings (excluding crofts) leased to tenant farmers by the Secretary of State's Department are set out in the table below. The information is not readily available by district and island areas.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will arrange for a thorough survey and analysis of cattle morbidity and mortality on dairy farms participating in the Scottish Milk Marketing Board's milk recording scheme within 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, from 1975 to 1985, and publish the results in a form accessible and intelligible to the non-scientific general public;

(2) if he will take steps to prepare a detailed analysis of the persistent and unusual symptoms of ill-health in farm animals reported in central Scotland for the years 1980 to 1985, inclusive, and to publish the data in detail and also in a summary intelligible and accessible to the non-scientific general public;

(3) if he will make arrangements for further cartographic analysis of the unexplained phenomena affecting the health of farm animals within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, for the years 1982 to 1984, inclusive.

Mr. John MacKay: The incidence of animal morbidity in the Bonnybridge-Denny area was fully considered as part of the Leniham review. After taking into account the outcome of extensive investigations carried out by the veterinary investigation services of the East and West of Scotland agricultural colleges and by the Glasgow University veterinary school, the review concluded that there was nothing unusual about the health of animals generally in that area nor was there any unusual factor operating in the area causing unusual morbidity among farm animals. In the light of this conclusion I see no reason for undertaking further surveys and analysis as proposed.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farmers have been interviewed personally and their evidence recorded in writing by his officials concerning animal problems of farm animal health within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, for the years 1974 to 1985, inclusive; and if he will publish the available data in detail and also in a summary form intelligible and accessible to the non-scientific general public.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available. As explained in my reply of 23 October [Vol. 83, c. 175] problems of animal health would normally be a matter for the farmer and his veterinary surgeon, not my officials.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has made to the Scottish Milk Marketing Board and to the relevant public health authorities on the subject of regular tests for the presence of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls in random samples of bottled milk sold direct from farms to consumers within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire; and whether reports of such tests will be published.

Mr. John MacKay: None. Public health sampling and testing of milk is the responsibility of local authorities. Requests for information on such testing should accordingly be directed at the appropriate district council.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to require that milk from farms where there have been unexplained and unusual animal health problems is segregated from milk supplied by farms where no such problems have been reported; and if he will make provision for compensation for farmers affected by such action.

Mr. John MacKay: No. Adequate powers are already available to local authorities under both the Milk and Dairies (Scotland) Act 1914 and the Food and Drugs (Scotland) Act 1956 to stop milk supplies intended for human consumption if they consider that the milk is unfit. These powers include provisions regarding compensation.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what he is doing to commission statistically significant scientific testing for traces of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls, at parts per trillion, of samples of soil, vegetation and animal fat from farms within a radius of 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, on the basis of samples taken as near as possible to each kilometre grid square intersection on the 1:50,000 Ordnance Survey.

Mr. John MacKay: Samples of soil and animal fat have been analysed at the parts per trillion level for dioxins and furans and at the parts per billion level for polychlorinated biphenyls. No useful purpose would be served in sampling in the way suggested.

Concerning current research into the levels of dioxins, furans and polychlorinated biphenyls in soil I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question about current research on 21 October [Vol. 84, c. 98].

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish details available to him of the operation of the Re-Chem International incinerator at Roughmute, Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, on the following dates: 5 September 1983, 1 to 30 April, 18, 24, 28, 29 and 31 May 1984, 1, 20 and 27 June 1984, 10 and 11 July 1984, and 7, 10, 15 and 31 August 1984; and whether he is satisfied that the reactor was properly operated on those dates.

Mr. Ancram: The Secretary of State does not have this information. Details of operating conditions during the periods in question are held by the company.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the standard of cartographic analysis of the data examined by the Lenihan report on morbidity in the Denny and Bonnybridge areas; and whether any use was made of the technique of computer mapping in the analysis.

Mr. John MacKay: The findings of the report of the independent review group chaired by Professor Lenihan have been accepted by the Government. The group's methodology was set out in its report. I do not consider it appropriate to comment on its use of particular analytical techniques.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish his analysis of the information he has on the health of farmers, farmworkers and their families living within 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, for the period 1974 to 1985 inclusive; and if he will indicate the professional advice he sought in the analysis.

Mr. John MacKay: I have no specific information on the health of farmers, farm workers and their families living within 20 miles of Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire for the period 1974 to 1985 inclusive.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has had any discussions about compensation to children born with eye and other bodily defects, as a result of the poisoning of their mothers and fathers by the emission and dispersal of toxic compounds from installations in central Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: No. Such discussions would be inappropriate. There is no evidence that the eye and other bodily defects referred to in the question are linked to the emission and dispersal of toxic compounds from installations in central Scotland.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy towards the recommendations in the Lenihan report about morbidity in the Denny and Bonnybridge areas about the best geographical area of study.

Mr. John MacKay: I have accepted the recommendations of the Lenihan report, and am pursuing those which call for further action.

Agricultural Research and Development

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to publish a paper on the future structure for agricultural research and development work.

Mr. John MacKay: It is desirable that publication of the paper setting out the future strategy and structure for agricultural research and development work in Scotland should follow submission by the priorities board for research and development in agriculture and food to agriculture Ministers and the chairman of the Agriculture and Food Research Council of its recommendations on priorities and budget allocations for the United Kingdom. It is hoped the Department's paper can be published around the beginning of December.

List D Schools

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the future of list D schools in Scotland in the light of representations made to him by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to a question tabled by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) on 6 June [Vol. 80, c. 257].

The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities subsequently asked that present arrangements for supporting the schools should be continued for a further year until 31 March 1987. My right hon. Friend concluded, however, that it would be best to follow the timetable set out in his statement on 6 June. Direct grants to the schools will therefore be withdrawn from 31 March 1986. Rate support grant will be increased to reflect the consequential increase in expenditure falling on local authorities.

I understand that authorities are considering their future requirement for places and the arrangements for providing financial support to the schools from 1 April next.

Discussions with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities concerning the amount of the additional rate support grant to be paid in 1986-87 are nearing completion.

Duich Moss (Drainage Ditch)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that a drainage ditch dug on behalf of a Scottish firm of distillers upon Duich Moss site of special scientific interest, Strathclyde, extending outside phase 1 of the permitted development area, fulfils the conditions contained in letters dated 18 July and 18 December 1984 from his Department which were sent to the interested parties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Following the discovery that a drainage ditch appeared to have been excavated in an area of Duich Moss outside phase 1 of the permitted development area, my Department wrote to Scottish Malt Distillers Ltd. to seek their comments on this apparent breach of conditions laid down by my right hon. Friend in granting the company planning permission for the extraction of peat from the moss. The company's comments have recently been received and Argyll and Bute district council, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Greenland White-Fronted Goose Study have been invited to offer views on the points raised by the company to assist my right hon. Friend in his further consideration of the matter. Replies from these bodies are awaited.

Locate in Scotland

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the number of jobs created by Locate in Scotland in each of the last five years, giving a breakdown between those created in new towns and those created elsewhere and a breakdown between main industrial classifications.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The employment effect of planned inward investment secured for Scotland in new towns and elsewhere since Locate in Scotland was set up in March 1981 is described in table A.

The breakdown of these jobs between the main industrial classifications is as indicated in table B.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is usually published as staff in post (by whole-time equivalents) as at 30 September and for the years 1981 to 1984 is shown in table 1 below. No projected figures are held but table 2 shows the provisional figures at 31 March 1985.

Strathclyde Structure Plan Review

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received regarding the Campsie and Baldernoch local plan within the framework of the Strathclyde structure plan review; from which individuals or organisations the representations were received; whether he made any modifications to the local plan as a result of any of those representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: In addition to representations from the hon. Member and my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) my right hon. Friend has received representations from Strathclyde regional council, Strathkelvin district council, two community councils and 80 letters from individuals or groups of individuals. As I explained when I wrote to the hon. Member on 11 September, further action on the local plan will depend upon my right hon. Friend's further consideration of the Strathclyde structure plan second review and alteration.

GEC Telecommunications Ltd. (Redundancies)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the employment consequences of the intention of GEC Telecommunications Ltd. to make 310 of its Kirkcaldy work force redundant.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Were 310 persons to be made redundant, and were they all to claim unemployment benefit in the Kirkcaldy travel-to-work area, it is estimated that the direct short-run effect would be to increase the unemployment rate in the Kirkcaldy TTWA by around one-half of one percentage point.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the longest time, as of 1 October 1985, that any person had been held in custody awaiting trial.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, approximately 18 months.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted or not proceeded with in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (Table 2.4 of the latest issue for 1984 Cmnd. 9622).

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average length of time spent on remand for those who were subsequently acquitted or not proceeded against during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, in England and Wales;

(2) how many persons who were remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted or not proceeded against spent (a) nought to three months on remand, (b) three to six months on remand, (c) six to nine months on remand, (d) nine to 12 months on remand and (e) over 12 months on remand in respect of those first remanded during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the weekly cost of keeping a prisoner in custody in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively, in a remand institution in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The average weekly cost in recent years of keeping a person in custody in a local prison or remand centre in England and Wales is shown in the following table. Financial information for 1984-85 is not yet available.

Average weekly cost per inmate of imprisonment in a local prison or remand centre.

Financial year	Average weekly cost £
1979-80	122
1980-81	168
1981-82	181
1982-83	200
1983-84	*216

* The figure for 1983-84 was derived from the Prison Department costing system and is not strictly comparable with figures for earlier years. A full explanation of the different bases of calculation was given in the Prison Department Financial Report 1983-84.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to introduce financial compensation for those prisoners who were remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted or not proceeded against in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Immigration Checks

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the numbers detected at all United Kingdom airports in the categories of illegal immigrant and criminals for 1983 and 1984, through checks made by immigration officials.

Mr. Waddington: Information is not available in the form requested. However, the total numbers of passengers refused leave to enter the United Kingdom are published annually by Nationality in "Control of Immigration Statistics, United Kingdom" (Table 1 of Cmnd. 9544 for the 1984 figures and 9246 for 1983).

Crime-Police Ratio

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidences of crime were reported per number of policemen employed in the last year for which figures are available in (a) the West Midlands county, (b) Warwickshire and (c) West Mercia.

Mr. Mellor: The number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in each police force area in England and Wales is published annually in "Crime Statistics, England and Wales" (Table 2.5 of the volume for 1984, Cmnd. 9621). Statistics of police strength at 31 December in each police force area are published annually in the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary (appendix 7 of the 1984 report, HC469).

Metropolitan Police (Firearms)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated expenditure for 1985-86 by the Metropolitan police on firearms and related equipment; and how much of this sum is due to be spent in each of the following categories: (a) revolvers, (b) automatic handguns, (c) rifles, (d) shotguns, (e) semi-automatic rifles, (f) fully automatic rifles, (g) fully automatic weapons and (h) other firearms.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The sum of £243,000 was allocated in the Metropolitan police estimates for 1985-86 for firearms and related equipment; the bulk of this was for ammunition, primers and propellent powders, holsters, body armour and electronic target systems. Some £15,000 was set aside for the purchase of new firearms, comprising revolvers and shotguns to replace worn out training models, some additional rifles and any weapons that may be required for evaluation.

Police (Assaults)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state for each year since 1979 the number of officers of the metropolitan police who were assaulted in the course of duty where any of the following charges were laid against the assailant and also state the number of such charges in each category: (a) actual bodily harm, (b) grievous bodily harm, (c) wounding with intent, (d) manslaughter and (e) murder.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that information about charges brought against people who assaulted Metropolitan police officers on duty is not readily available except in relation to offences of homicide. That information is given in the following table.

Offences currently recorded as homicide where the victim was a Metropolitan police officer on duty

1979	—	—
1980	1	Conviction for murder

Brixton Prison

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of the female prisoners in Brixton prison who have been subject to strip searches; for what offence each is imprisoned; how many times these strip searches have taken place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Strip searching is a routine security measure for the detection of small items of contraband, in particular weapons and drugs, which can be concealed easily about the person and cannot be detected by other methods of searching. The three female prisoners on remand at Brixton prison have been strip searched in accordance with standard practice before and after court appearances, after visits, at the time of cell changes and during wing and cell searches.

Silentnight Dispute, Yorkshire

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constables concerned into the police action in relation to the Silentnight dispute at Sutton in Yorkshire.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of North Yorkshire that there has been an industrial dispute at the Silentnight factory at Sutton-in-Craven since April. The factory has been picketed on most days. On 25 October, 50-60 pickets were present, but on all other occasions the number has not exceeded 20. The chief constable informs me that during the dispute his officers have made 13 arrests and seven people have been reported for summons. He has received one complaint against the police.

Prisoners (Petitions)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prisoners' petitions to him led to the granting of prisoners' requests in the most recent convenient period.

Mr. Mellor: No record is kept of the total number of petitions and the proportion granted.

Metropolitan Police

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his statement of 21 October, Official Report, column 31, that the reorganisation of the Metropolitan police is expected to release 200 officers for operational duties, if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the approximate number of Metropolitan police officers currently assigned or expected to be assigned in the near future to the following duties: custody officers and local consultation liaison committees as required by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, diplomatic protection squads and other personal protection, Special Branch and support for immigration and customs service activities at Heathrow airport and elsewhere; and if he will publish the information in tabular form.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and by bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Scarman Report

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the recommendations and (b) the suggestions contained in the Scarman report, indicating in each case what action has been taken in response.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We shall place a paper in the Library as soon as possible.

Riots

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list those riots which have occurred since 1979;

(2) what is the number of police officers, civilians and others injured in each riot since 1979;

(3) what is his estimate of the number of buildings (a) destroyed and (b) damaged in each riot since 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following is the readily available information in respect of the major urban disturbances in 1980, 1981 and 1985:

	Police officers injured	*Civilians injured	Others injured†	Buildings destroyed	Buildings damaged

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from each chief constable as to all those incidents in 1985 in which petrol bombs were thrown at the police; and if he will indicate, in each case, the location of that disturbance, the apparent causes of it, the number of petrol bombs thrown, the injuries to police officers and civilians that were sustained, the arrests that were made and the charges that have been preferred.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Petrol bombs were thrown at police officers during the recent disturbances in Birmingham, Brixton, Peckham, Toxteth, Tottenham and Leicester but information relating to numbers, and injuries caused, is not available. Details of arrests and charges, and of other instances in which petrol bombs have been thrown in 1985, are not collated centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what factors and causes he attributes the recent riots in British cities.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Hostility to the police, criminal opportunism and a general alienation from authority in areas with special social problems were among the factors contributing to the recent disorders.

James Kay

Sir Ian Percival asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his reasons for recalling a restricted patient, James Kay (Lang), and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: James Kay, formerly known as James Lang, was conditionally discharged on 9 April 1985 from Park Lane hospital, Liverpool, where he was detained as a restricted patient following his conviction in 1971 for manslaughter of a young girl. His discharge was in accordance with a direction given on 19 March by a mental health review tribunal. My right hon. and learned Friend the then Home Secretary and I took a very serious view of Mr. Kay's case, and opposed his discharge on the grounds that it would constitute an unacceptable risk to public safety.

On 23 October 1985 Mr. Kay was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm and a further charge of unlawful wounding was brought on 28 October. Both charges relate to attacks on young women. He is now remanded in custody at HMRC Risley. On 23 October my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary issued a warrant of recall under section 42 of the Mental Health Act 1983. The effect of this is that, if Mr. Kay were not detained in custody pending trial, he would be returned to hospital.

Ashad Miah

Mr. Malins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the immigration authorities did not notify the sponsor of Mr. Ashad Miah TN3/RLE/6261/85 of his place of detention, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Mr. Mohd Ashad Miah was detained at Harmondsworth from 15 October until 24 October, when he was transferred to Ashford remand centre. I understand that a relative of Mr. Miah was aware of his detention in Harmondsworth. On transfer to Ashford remand centre, Mr. Miah had the usual access to a telephone there, and made a call.

Deer

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has concerning the number of reported incidents of the illegal clipping of deer antlers for their velvet.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not collected centrally. We are not aware that there have been any prosecutions for illegal clipping of deer antlers since it was made illegal in 1980.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to alter regulations affecting the slaughter of farm-raised deer.

Mrs. Fenner: I have been asked to reply.

The Farm Animal Welfare Council earlier this year submitted to the agriculture Ministers a report on the welfare of farmed deer, covering the welfare aspects of their farming, transport and slaughter. Comments have been sought from all interested parties, and we shall respond with our proposals once full consideration has been given to the results of that consultation.

Youth Custody

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many detention centre places have been converted to youth custody places since the coming into force of the relevant parts of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Mr. Mellor: Two hundred and eighty-eight.

Convicted Prisoners (Open University Courses)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he used in deciding to make available funds in support of prisoners taking Open University courses, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Education makes an important contribution to the regimes of prison department establishments. The education needs of prisoners span the whole range of adult education, from basic remedial to university undergraduate and other forms of higher education. Open University courses form only a small part of the wider programme of education and training but, from the establishment of the university in 1970, have been regarded as the right distance learning method of meeting the educational needs of a minority of longer-term adult prisoners. The cost of Open University courses represents less than one half of one per cent. of the cost of prison education in England and Wales.

Community Radio Franchises

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the new community radio franchises.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I cannot yet add to the reply given to a question from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on 25 July at column 670-71.

Heroin Addiction

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many registered heroin addicts there were in each year since 1960.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the numbers of persons notified to the Home Office as addicted to heroin (alone or in combination with other drugs) is readily available only from 1973 and is published annually in "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs in the United Kingdom" (Home Office Statistical Bulletins 18/84 for 1973, 23/85 for 1974 to 1984) and in the associated supplementary tables.

European Court of Human Rights

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to introduce measures with respect to future participation in the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Mellor: The Government have announced their intention to accept, for a further five years, the optional articles of the European Convention on Human Rights which recognise the right of individual petition and the compulsory jurisdiction of the court, when they fall due for renewal in January 1986.

Metropolitan Police (Recruiting)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many vacancies there are in the Metropolitan police for police officers and civil staff.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 30 September there were 406 vacancies for police officers in the Metropolitan police, but the commissioner informs us that a recent welcome intake of recruits has reduced this figure to about 300. The civil staff strength was 339 below ceiling.

Immigration

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will grant exemption to the husbands of women settled in the United Kingdom before 1973, equivalent to that given to the wives of men settled in the United Kingdom before 1973.

Mr. Waddington: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Bangladeshi nationals arrived at Heathrow airport in July, August and September, and how these figures compare with the same period in 1984.

Mr. Waddington: I shall write to the right hon. Member.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in view of low staff morale, increasing delays in interview casework and lengthening queues of incoming visitors from abroad, he will increase the resources devoted to the immigration service generally and at Heathrow airport in particular, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1985, c. 208]: We share the right hon. Member's concern at recent, and current, pressures on the immigration control, and on staff, especially at Heathrow terminal 3. We have discussed these with staff and some staff representatives. Additional staff have already been transferred to Heathrow terminal 3 and to the ministerial correspondence unit at Harmondsworth. More will be allocated there from 3 November, and two training courses for new recruits have been arranged to enable more staff to be allocated to operational duty before Christmas. We believe these measures will assist in tackling the problem of delays, and we shall keep the staffing position under close review.

The right hon. Member has written on these and related matters and we shall be replying to that letter in due course.

Crematoria

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria determine whether or not a town may obtain a crematorium.

Mr. Mellor: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Public Order (Safeguards)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of recent disturbances and riots, any additional measures are to be taken by the police in London to safeguard persons and property on 5 November, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Immigration (Members' Representations)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to the answer of 24 October, Official Report, columns 412-3 and 419-20, what action he expects an hon. or right hon. Member to take prior to making representations to his Department regarding a person who has been refused entry at a United Kingdom port as a visitor and whose sponsor lives in the constituency of the hon. or right hon. Member concerned, and if he will make a statement;

(2) pursuant to the answer given on 24 October, Official Report, columns 412-3 and 419-20, what action he expects an hon. or right hon. Member to take prior to making representations to his Department regarding a person, who has been refused entry at a United Kingdom port as a visitor and whose sponsor's own hon. or right hon. Member has refused to consider taking up such representations, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Prison Discipline

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received the report of the departmental committee on the prison disciplinary system, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The report of the departmental committee is being published today as Cmnd. 9641, volumes I and II. I am very grateful to the chairman, Mr. Peter Prior, and the members of the committee for the far-reaching and imaginative review they have undertaken of the prison disciplinary system. The subject is a difficult one and the report will need to be studied carefully, but I accept its fundamental conclusion that new adjudication arrangements are needed. We hope to bring forward proposals at an early opportunity. The present arrangements will continue in the meantime and I am grateful to boards for the way in which they have been discharging an increasingly complex task.

Metropolitan Police (Cash Limit)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes he proposes to make to the Metropolitan police cash limit for 1985-86.

Mr. Hurd: In order to enable the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to recruit up to agreed manpower levels I intend to increase the cash limit for 1985-86 by £8 million from £763·184 million to £771·184 million. This increase will be charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the public expenditure planning total. The cash limit is non-voted but parliamentary approval will be necessary for the associated Supplementary Estimate covering the increase in police grant.

The financial consequences of the recent disorders in Brixton and Tottenham are being urgently assessed so that further adjustments to the cash limit can be made as necessary.

City of Leicester (Police Costs)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Leicestershire as to the additional costs of policing the city of Leicester during the nights of 9 and 10 October and if he will make a statement on the disturbances which took place in Leicester on those dates.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 29 October 1985]: I understand from the chief constable of Leicestershire that on the evening of 9 October there was a football match between Leicester City and Derby County. At about 7 pm a number of incidents occurred in the city centre involving football supporters. At about 7.30 pm, because of the number of people still in the city centre, the kick-off time was delayed by 5 minutes and the match subsequently started at 7.50 pm. Just before the end of the match a group of about 50 youths congregated in a small recreation ground in Walnut street which is close to the Leicester City ground. On attempting to disperse these youths, police officers came under attack when missiles were thrown at them. The youths were however dispersed into a nearby estate. Similar attacks on police occurred in nearby areas.

Shortly afterwards police received reports of disorders in the new St. Martins shopping precinct, and the London road area, with windows being smashed and property removed from window displays. Police officers were deployed into the area and came under attack by approximately 50 youths, as a result of which 2 vehicles were overturned and set on fire. A number of petrol bombs were thrown at police in a number of areas of the St. Peters estate. The youths were dispersed through the estate and the situation contained.

As a result of these incidents 35 people were arrested for various public order offences. Three police officers and one civilian received injuries.

Some 200 police officers were deployed during the football match, but because of the subsequent disorders this was increased to about 500, some of whom were deployed from adjoining forces.

On the following day there were further incidents of disorder, though on a smaller scale. At about 9 pm a petrol bomb was thrown at a general store on an estate three miles from the city centre. At 11 pm in the Highfields area about 40 youths began to engage in stone throwing, breaking some windows. Four petrol bombs were thrown and an office building was set on fire and badly damaged. One car was also burnt out. About 200 police officers were deployed and by 1 am the area was quiet. One policeman was slightly injured. Sixteen arrests were made in connection with the disorders on 10 October.

Information about the additional costs of the policing operation is not yet available.

TRANSPORT

Motorways (Sign-posting)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that sign-posting to a new motorway is in position when the new road is opened.

Mr. Ridley: We aim to ensure that signing to a new motorway is provided when it is opened. Signing on the local authority routes which may be involved is, however, outside our direct control. When a motorway is opened in sections full signing may need to await completion of the route, but temporary signing is provided where appropriate.

Motorways (Sign Cleaning and Maintenance)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the new guidelines for motorway sign cleaning and maintenance, it has been arranged for this to take place at three-yearly intervals; and what additional provisions have been made for the repair or replacement of damaged signs on the most heavily used motorways.

Mr. Ridley: The code of practice for routine maintenance of motorway and all purpose trunk roads (a copy of which is in the Library) specifies that sign faces shall normally be cleaned at three yearly intervals. But the code recognises that some signs may need to be cleaned more frequently than that and there is scope for local variations. The code also requires that motorways should receive safety inspections at seven-day intervals and that these inspections include checks on the general condition of signs.

Driving Test Centres

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria his Department requires a town to satisfy in order for it to have a driving test centre.

Mrs. Chalker: The aim is to have a national network of test centres located so far as possible to suit the reasonable convenience of candidates. There is no policy of locating centres in particular towns. The siting of a centre must meet land use planning, police and operational requirements. Most important, it should provide test routes which cover as wide a variety of traffic conditions as practicable and a selection of hazards, so as to impose a meaningful test on candidates.

A11 (Suffolk)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what plans he has for improving the A11 at Red Lodge in Suffolk;

(2) what estimates he has made of the relative cost of bypassing Red Lodge on the A11 in Suffolk and of dualling the existing road;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report the cost-benefit comparisons he has made of a bypass on the A11 of Red Lodge, Suffolk, along the route he proposed 10 years ago, and of dualling the existing route through Red Lodge, indicating the land to be required for each of these options, the lengths and approximate costs of the roads required to be constructed in each case, the numbers of properties liable to be disturbed in each case, and any other relevant comparisons.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall answer these three questions together. Plans for improving the A11 at Red Lodge are in the trunk road programme for a start of works between April 1987 and March 1989. At the time of public consultation the Department's preferred option was to dual the existing road, but in the light of public comment a bypass is being considered. The estimated costs are £2·3 million for on-line dualling and £3 million for a bypass. I hope to announce our preferred solution early next year and all the relevant supporting information will be made available at that time.

Commissioners of Irish Lights

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the negotiations with the Irish Government on financing the Commissioners of Irish Lights.

Mr. Ridley: Under the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 the commissioners' expenditure is met from the general lighthouse fund, for which I am responsible. The fund is not Exchequer money: it is derived from light dues paid by ships using ports in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. The fund's accounts, which are laid before Parliament, do not identify the costs incurred by the commissioners in the Republic of Ireland, but for the purposes of the agreement, it has been accepted that 70 per cent. of the commissioners' total expenditure is incurred in the Republic. In future an increasing proportion of this expenditure will be met from sources within the Republic. These will consist of light dues collected in the Republic (set at levels determined by the Irish Government) supplemented, when necessary, by a contribution from the Irish Government. The first supplement will be paid by the Irish Government on 1 January 1987, and will be at a level which, when added to the light dues collected in the Republic in 1985-86, will meet 30 per cent. of the commissioners' expenditure incurred in the Republic in that year. In the subsequent years the percentage will rise to 35 per cent. in 1986-87; 40 per cent. in 1987-88; 45 per cent. in 1988-89 and 50 per cent. thereafter.

In pursuing these negotiations it has been common ground that the commissioners should continue as a body dealing with the island of Ireland. Further discussions will be opened shortly on the need for changes in the Commissioners' constitution and the statutory relationships that Ministers in the two Governments have with the commissioners.

M25 (Widening)

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Transport if any contingency plans exist for the widening of the M25 in the event that traffic volumes exceed the planned totals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane) on 29 October.

London Regional Transport

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the current full establishments of (i) London Regional Transport, (ii) its rail operations and (iii) its bus operations; and what are the comparable figures for staff in post.

Mr. David Mitchell: These matters are the responsibility of London Regional Transport. I suggest that the hon. Member approaches the chairman direct.

Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now make a further statement about the response from London Regional Transport to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report, published on 1 February 1984, on the arrangements made by the then London Transport Executive for the maintenance of buses and coaches.

Mr. Ridley: London Regional Transport has made good progress in following up the commission's recommendations since I last reported to the House on 25 October 1984, at columns 684-5. It has now prepared a further response, copies of which I am placing in the Library of the House.

The MMC made some important recommendations for the improvement of the cost accounting and management control systems employed by the then London Transport Executive. On 1 April 1985, LRT established a separate subsidiary company, London Buses Ltd., for the provision of bus services. A further subsidiary, LRT Bus Engineering Limited, was also established to provide vehicle maintenance and engineering facilities for London Buses Ltd. The "arms length" relationship made possible by this restructuring will ensure that BEL is fully accountable for the work it carries out for LBL.

Within LBL, bus garages are now established as separate cost centres and are charged for the repair or replacement of each unit and for their use of materials. There is now regular monitoring of performance against budget. Further steps remain to be taken towards the development of a comprehensive cost information system, and I look forward to the implementation of the necessary measures as soon as possible.

Proposals for a revised management structure for garage engineering maintenance have been prepared, but LRT states that their implementation is dependent on the introduction of a negotiating machinery which reflects more closely the revised corporate structure of LRT and the negotiation through this machinery of a new grading and salary structure. The introduction of revised shift patterns was planned to take effect from April 1985; some changes have now been made, but the bulk of the savings envisaged are also said to be dependent on changes in the negotiating machinery. In my previous statement, I said that I expected to see substantial progress by LRT in the modification of the complex industrial relations structure inherited from the former London Transport Executive. Progress in this area has been limited so far, and I remain anxious to see firm evidence of further progress.

Since LRT's initial response to the commission's report, I have had cause for serious concern about the standards of its bus maintenance as shown by the results of my Department's spot inspections. LRT's response contains some encouraging evidence of a significant improvement in recent months and gives details of the steps which are being taken to ensure that this improvement is sustained. This does not, however, mean that the standard of performance being achieved is yet satisfactory, and I expect to see further improvement at an early stage.

At the BEL workshops, improved production control systems are being installed. Job booking is now operative in both Aldenham and Chiswick works, the valuation of work in progress has been introduced, issues and receipts from the works stores are more closely controlled. Cost reduction targets have been set in all areas and the necessary monitoring procedures are being established, together with the new quality control organisation. A proportion of the work required by LBL is being placed with other contractors in order to provide a continuing check on the prices being charged by BEL.

I now expect to see the steps which LRT and its subsidiaries have taken feed through into real savings in the costs, and improvements in the effectiveness of their bus maintenance activities. The initiatives which they have taken in response to the commission's report, and which I welcome, need to be pursued vigorously and I shall take a continuing interest in their progress.

M1 (Repairs)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of 17 July, Official Report, columns 197-8, if he can now give a precise timetable for the repair of the signposts at junction 33 on the northbound carriageway of the M1 and at junction 28 on the southbound carriageway of the M1; and if he will arrange in future for the condition of such signposts to be monitored at more frequent intervals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I expect the advance direction sign at junction 28 to be replaced by 6 November. A number of signs between junctions 32 and 33 will be either repaired or replaced in the next few weeks. The code of practice for the routine maintenance of motorway and all purpose trunk roads (a copy of which is in the Library) requires that motorways should receive safety inspections at seven-day intervals, and that these inspections should include checks on the general condition of signs, including their cleanliness.

Vehicle Safety (Fuel Tanks)

Mr. Christopher Hawkins asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce stronger standards for the construction or location of fuel tanks on motor vehicles so as to reduce the risk of explosion in accidents.

Mrs. Chalker: We plan to increase our research effort on fire risk in cars and coaches to see what steps should be taken to reduce fires from all causes including rupture of the fuel tank.

Driving Licences

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport which foreign driving licences can now be exchanged in Great Britain.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Holders of current driving licences issued in other parts of the European Community are entitled to exchange them without a driving test on application within one year of becoming resident in the United Kingdom. They may also, if they can provide evidence of substantial recent experience of driving heavy goods or public service vehicles, apply for the appropriate vocational licence within 18 months of becoming resident.

Holders of Portuguese and Spanish licences will be able to exchange on these terms with effect from 1 January, when those countries accede to the Community.

Holders of licences issued in non-EC countries and territories designated under the Road Traffic (Driving Licences) Act 1983 may apply on similar terms for British ordinary, but not for vocational, licences. In addition to Spain, which will now come within the Community provisions, those so far designated are:

Australia, Austria, Barbados, British Virgin Islands, Republic of Cyprus, Finland, Hong Kong, Japan, Kenya, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland and Zimbabwe.

The legislation relating to both EC and third country licence exchanges stipulates that driving tests must be of a standard comparable to the British L-test.

A40 (Improvement)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answers to the hon. Member for Uxbridge on 29 October, he will make a statement on what is the normal equivalent basis of compensation; and if he can yet make any estimate of the sum involved in this case.

Mrs. Chalker: Compensation on the basis of the reasonable cost of equivalent reinstatement, where applicable, is a matter for negotiation between the parties in each individual case: or, in the event of a dispute, for determination by the Lands Tribunal.

No estimate of the likely level of compensation is yet available.

Derailment (Morpeth)

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received his Railway Inspecting Officer's report on the derailment that occurred on 24 June 1984 at Morpeth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received this report, which includes a number of recommendations for preventing a recurrence of this type of accident. Copies are available in the Library. A number of the recommendations are for the British Railways Board, and I look forward to receiving its formal reply. Other recommendations are appropriate for Government consideration. These include:—

1. Introducing statutory powers to require staff involved with the safety of others on the Railway to submit to a breath, blood or urine test for alcohol

(a) if there is any doubt about their sobriety when signing on for duty; or

(b) if it is considered that alcohol may have been a contributory factor to an accident.

2. Considering the extension of any new statutory powers to staff with similar responsibilities in other transport industries who are not covered by existing legislation for testing for alcohol levels; and

3. Modernising the language of the relevant sections of the Regulation of the Railaways Act 1842 and the Offences Against the Person Act 1861; making it an offence for any railwayman to be so under the influence of alcohol or drugs that he jeopardises the safety of others; and ensuring that scales of punishment apply automatically to all railways.

The Government will consider these recommendations very carefully in consultation with the industries concerned and will then report their conclusions to the House.

Aviation Fuel (Prices)

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to trends in aviation fuel prices over the last 12-month period to the latest date for which figures are available; and what projections are available to him about trends over the ensuing three-month period.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have been asked to reply.

The average price of aviation turbine fuel fell by 5 per cent between October 1984 and October 1985. Future trends are highly uncertain.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will print a list of accident rates per mile of long distance heavy goods vehicle drivers for the five years prior to 1968 and the most recent five-year period for which figures are available, including the total number of accidents in each case, and showing such information as he has as to what proportion were caused by driver error.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 28 October 1985, c. 327]: Data are only collectd on road accidents which involve personal injury. Details are not collected on the causes of accidents or the length of journeys. However the following figures are available:

Heavy Goods Vehicles Involved in Accidents and Involvement Rate per 100 million kilometres travelled: 1963 to 1968 and 1980 to 1984: Great Britain

SOCIAL SERVICES

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he now proposes to revoke the Supplementary Benefit Requirement and Resources Regulations 1985 relating to the accommodation of unemployed persons under 26 years of age.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether, after the passing of transitional protection within the new regulations affecting board and lodging, the topping up of board and lodging payments by local authorities in respect of elderly persons in adult fostering placements will still be permitted;

(2) if adult foster care funded by his Deprtment's board and lodging payments will be affected by the proposed new board and lodging regulations.

Mr. Newton: As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has told the House, my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General met the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments yesterday afternoon to discuss the meaning and effect of the draft board and lodging regulations. Further consideration is being given to points which have been raised, and in the circumstances the Government did not feel it right to ask the House to debate the regulations last night.

Population Statistics

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the 20 English non-metropolitan counties which have shown the greatest percentage of growth in electorate since 1980; and what has been the percentage growth and actual figures in each case.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

County (ranked by percentage growth)	Electorate 1980 (Register)	Electorate 1985 (Register)	1980-1985 Growth

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the numbers of staff employed on supplementary benefit work in his Department's Woolwich office over each of the past five years for which figures are available, together with the number of supplementary benefit cases handled during the same period.

Mr. Major: Returns of local office staff which subdivide those actually working on supplementary benefits from those on contributory benefits work have been kept only since May 1983.

Additionally, records of the work loads in Woolwich office are kept only for four years.

The average number of supplementary benefits claimants in July of each year from 1982 to 1985 and the number of staff allocated to supplementary benefits work in July in each year from 1983 to 1985 are as follows:

Date	Number of claimants	Staff
1 July 1982	15,416	*
1 July 1983	16,212	148
1 July 1984	17,516	154
1 July 1985	18,380	164

* Not known.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claimants can be misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for those offices covering the Workington travel-to-work area, what is the total number of supplementary benefit claimants for the last month for which statistics are available and the figure for the comparable month in 1984;

(2) for those offices covering the Workington travel-to-work area, what is the total number of unemployed people claiming supplementary benefit during the last month for which statistics are available and the figures for the comparable month in 1984;

(3) for those offices covering the Workington travel-to-work area, what is the total number of supplementary benefit appeals registered during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Major: The numbers of people receiving supplementary benefit from the Workington local office are as follows:

	July 1984	July 1985
All claimants	6,594	6,608
Unemployed claimants	2,509	2,538

Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action.

Fourteen supplementary benefit appeals were registered at Workington local office during the four weeks up to 24 September 1985.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit as unemployed; and, of these, how many claim benefit in ordinary board and lodging accommodation, broken down in age bands 16 years to 17 years, 18 years to 20 years, 21 years to 25 years and over 26 years, for each year from 1979 to 1984.

Mr. Newton: Information about the number of claims is not available. The total number of unemployed people receiving supplementary benefit over the years 1979-1983 was as follows:

	'000s
1979	566
1980	854
1981	1,318
1982	1,722
1983	1,826

Figures for 1984 are not available.

Information requested on the numbers of unemployed boarders broken down by age for these years is not available. The information that is available on the numbers of boarders is given in paragraph 4 of the statement by the Secretary of State on the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985, Cmnd. 9467.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the percentage of mortgage defaults resulting in persons losing possession of their homes that are cases where the borrower has received supplementary benefit to take account of mortgage interest but not passed this element on to the building society concerned.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information is not available.

Medicines (Labelling)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to amend the terms of service for the pharmaceutical profession to make correct labelling of medicines a requirement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Consideration is being given to an amendment of the pharmacists' terms of service with a view to the inclusion of a correct labelling requirement for dispensed medicines.

Septicaemia

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of cases of death through septicaemia in each of the last five years.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of deaths for which septicaemia was coded as the underlying cause of death are given in the following table. However, septicaemia may also be mentioned on a death certificate as a complication of some other underlying cause; exact statistics of these cases are not available but they may be as many as ten times the numbers for which septicaemia was coded as the underlying cause.

Deaths from Septicaemia, 1980-84, England and Wales*

Year	Males	Females	Persons

Health Authorities (Yorkshire)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the area health authorities under the responsibility of the Yorkshire regional health authority and name the chairmen, the vice-chairmen and the secretaries of each of the authorities and if he will indicate the addresses to which official correspondence should be sent.

Mr. Whitney: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not appoint the vice-chairmen of district health authorities. They are elected annually by the members of the authority from within their own number. There is also no statutory post of secretary to a health authority, although most authorities identify a person to act in this capacity. This information is therefore not held centrally but the right hon. Member may wish to obtain it from the relevant district health authority chairman. The other information requested is as follows:

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the Yorkshire regional health authority, the dates of their appointments and any qualifications they may hold in relation to the National Health Service.

Mr. Whitney: Regional health authority members are appointed for their personal qualities and not because of the professional or other qualifications they may hold. The available information is as follows:

Yorkshire regional health authority membership

Mr. Ian Cordial	1 October 1982
Dr. George Crouch	1 October 1984
Mrs. Irene Endean	1 October 1984

Mr. James Walsh	1 October 1982
Councillor James West	1 October 1984

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the Wakefield area health authority, the dates of their appointments and any qualifications they may hold in relation to the National Health Service.

Mr. Whitney: We do not hold this information centrally. The responsibility for appointing members of Wakefield health authority lies with Yorkshire regional health authority and the appropriate local authorities. The right hon. Member may therefore wish to obtain the information from Mr. Bryan Askew, the chairman of the regional health authority.

Medical Practitioners

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of National Health Service medical practitioners who failed to achieve the prescribed standard of proficiency within the meaning of the various Medical Acts in force since 1978, and if he will express this as a percentage of those in National Health Service medical practice for each of those years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Medical Act 1983 consolidated legislation providing for General Medical Council control over standards of entry to the medical profession. Proficiency in medical practice can be assessed only in the context of the relevant circumstances, and there is no provision for a uniform formal standard. Statistics are therefore not available.

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations his Department has received concerning the professional conduct of National Health Service medical practitioners in each of the last five years, and what action was taken as a result.

Mr. Hayhoe: Action on the professional conduct of individual doctors is, according to the circumstances, a matter for the General Medical Council, health authorities, or family practitioner committees. No meaningful central record of such representations is available.

Fraud Investigators

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many investigators into social security fraud are employed in (a) Greater Manchester, (b) Greater London and (c) the West Midlands.

Mr. Major: The number of posts allocated as investigators into social security fraud in the relevant local offices of the Department is as follows:

	Number
(a) Greater Manchester	107
(b) Greater London	223
(c) West Midlands	235

Computerisation

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the progress of his Department's planned computerisation of individual files.

Mr. Major: A substantial proportion of DHSS records are already held centrally on computers, including for example national insurance contribution records, retirement pension records, child benefit records and, on behalf of the Department of Employment, unemployment benefit records. Progress on our plans to redevelop these computer systems and extend computer support to DHSS local offices was set out earlier this year in Chapter 6 of the second volume of the Green Paper on reform of social security, "Programme for Change" (Cmnd. 9517). My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 11 September the decision to invite ICL to tender for computers to be used on the prototype for the local office project, the largest single project in the computerisation strategy.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many youth training scheme trainees have been recruited by the National Health Service.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not collected centrally on a regular basis. However, an ad hoc survey carried out in August 1983 indicated that 91 of the 127 health authorities surveyed were involved in schemes or sponsorship. In aggregate, there were 2,057 trainee places either available at that time, or in the later stages of planning.

Drinking Water (Bedfordshire)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any evidence seeking to correlate the incidence of gastric cancer and of methaemoglobinaemia in babies in Bedfordshire with the levels of nitrates and nitrites in drinking water in the county; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have received no such evidence and am advised that infantile methaemoglobinaemia is a very rare condition in the United Kingdom. My Department is aware of reports of only some 14 cases attributable to nitrate in drinking water in the past 35 years. The last reported and confirmed case was in 1972.

I understand that the epidemiological evidence gives no support to the suggestion that nitrate is a cause of cancer of the stomach, or of any other organ.

Benefits

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will place in the Library a copy of the efficiency study on overpayments of benefits, mentioned in paragraph 6.18 of "Reform of Social Security", volume 2, Cmnd. 9518.

Mr. Newton: The efficiency study was mainly concerned with the organisation of and procedures for dealing with the recovery of overpaid benefits, including overpayments where fraud is involved. It would not be in the public interest to publish the report as a whole, but we will consider whether some parts of it could be made available as the hon. Member asks.

"Community Care"

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will respond to the Second Report from the Social Services Committee of Session 1984-85, "Community Care".

Mr. Whitney: Within the next few weeks.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list all those proposed hospital closures since June 1979 which he has overruled;

(2) if he will list all proposed hospital closures since May 1979, by region, indicating (a) whether or not the proposed closure was objected to by the community health council and (b) what was the final outcome.

Mr. Hayhoe: For hospitals approved for complete closure between May 1979 and 31 March 1985 I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Minister for Health on 20 May at columns 317-28.

Hospitals approved for complete closure between April and 30 June 1985, the latest date for which information is available, are as follows:

South West Thames	North Bedfordshire	Park

Amalgam Fillings

Mr. Laurie Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will ask the committee on toxicity to make a comparison of allergic reactions from amalgam fillings with established allergies from other substances;

(2) if, pursuant to the answer of 22 October, Official Report, columns 131-2, he will take steps to bring to the attention of patients who received treatment with dental amalgam his statement that there is no convincing evidence of any adverse health effect on the vast majority of such patients;

(3) if, in the light of the representations made to him expressing anxiety about the possible health hazard arising from amalgam teeth fillings, he will take steps to expedite the consideration of evidence on this matter by the committees on toxicity and on dental and surgical materials.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Committees on Toxicity and on Dental and Surgical Materials will be considering the risks and benefits of dental amalgam, including the evidence relating to allergic reactions, as soon as possible bearing in mind the considerable amount of data to be reviewed. I do not consider any really useful purpose would be served by drawing to the attention of patients at some considerable cost my recent statement about the safety of dental amalgam.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue guidance to all general dental practitioners that amalgam fillings be substituted only when a patient presents evidence of the necessity through the written advice of a consultant neurologist.

Mr. Hayhoe: I will write to the hon. Member.

Contraceptives (Form of Notification)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for the introduction of a form of notification to be completed by all medical practitioners upon the prescription of contraceptive drugs and devices indicating the age, marital status and geographic location of the patient and requiring the signature of the patient, or their parent or legal guardian if they are under the age of 16 years, to authorise the prescription of such drugs or devices; and if he will arrange that in the case of minors where parental consent is not obtained the practitioner is obliged to give the reasons for the failure to obtain such permission.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. The effect of the decision of the House of Lords in the Gillick case is that doctors may lawfully prescribe contraceptives for young people under 16 without parental consent in certain exceptional circumstances. The Department's guidance makes it clear that only in exceptional circumstances should doctors prescribe contraceptives for young people under 16 without parental consent, and as I have stated this guidance is being reviewed.

Disabled People (Open University Courses)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he used in deciding not to make available funds in support of disabled people taking Open University courses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I regret that I cannot usefully add to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member on 24 July at c. 598-599.

Residential Homes

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities have appointed registration officers for private residential homes; and what qualifications he specifies for appointment to these posts.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not collected centrally and qualifications for these staff are not prescribed. However, advice on the knowledge and skills required of registration officers is contained in section 6 of the code of practice for residential care "Home Life" which was drawn up by an independent working party and circulated with the endorsement of my right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Social Services and for Wales, to all local authorities. A copy of "Home Life" is in the Library.

Elderly People

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the principal objectives of this Department for the care of elderly people.

Mr. Whitney: The principal objectives of the Department for the care of elderly people are:

to strengthen the primary and community care service together with neighbourhood and voluntary support to enable people to continue to live at home;

to encourage an active approach to treatment and rehabilitation to enable elderly people in hospital to return to the community wherever possible; to maintain capacity in the general acute sector to deal with the increasing numbers of elderly people needing acute medical or surgical treatment; and to maintain an adequate provision for the minority of people requiring long-term care in hospital or residential homes.

The Government's policies are set out in more detail in the White Paper "Growing Older", Cmnd 8173, published in 1981.

West Middlesex Hospital (Hip Replacement Operations)

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current approximate average waiting time for artificial hip operations at the West Middlesex hospital, Isleworth; how this compares with other hospitals in inner and outer London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not held centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to approach the chairman of Hounslow and Spelthorne health authority for local information and the chairman of north west Thames for information about the position in other districts in the region.

I am aware that in some areas there are unacceptably long waiting times for hip replacement operations. Health authorities have been asked to give priority to developing this service.

NHS (Private Contractors)

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what efficiency savings are being made or expected (a) by the Hounslow and Spelthorne district health authority and (b) by the Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton district health authority for the contracting out of cleaning, catering and laundry services, respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: The reports submitted to the Department on the competitive tendering exercises carried out so far show estimated annual savings of £806,000 for Hounslow and Spelthorne health authority and £802,000 for Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton health authority.

NHS (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will institute an inquiry into the effect competitive tendering has had on (a) wages and conditions of staff (b) redundancy and pension conditions of staff, (c) the percentage of National Health Service spending on the above services and (d) the quality of the services provided;

(2) if he intends to take any steps to increase the speed of competitive tendering in the National Health Service;

(3) if he has any proposals to change the criteria for competitive tendering in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am glad to report that the policy is proving increasingly successful. So far in England tendering exercises have achieved estimated annual savings of over £28 million. These savings can be used to improve the care of patients. I expect health authorities to keep to the approved timetables for their tendering programmes in order to achieve the maximum benefits from this policy. There should be no lowering of the quality of the service provided, so long as departmental advice is followed. I see no need to set up an inquiry.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement concerning the Coopers and Lybrand report on competitive tendering for the catering requirements throughout district health authorities; and if he will place a copy of the report in the Library.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on 21 October at columns 47—48 and on 29 October.

Smokers (Statistics)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of smokers who have been recorded by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in each single year during the last 20 years; and what these figures represent as a percentage of the total population during the same period.

Mr. Whitney: Questions about smoking have been asked in the General Household Survey in alternate years since 1972. The following table shows the numbers and percentages of persons who were recorded in the surveys as (a) smoking at all and (b) smoking cigarettes.

(a) Prevalence of smoking: 1972-1984

Persons aged 16 and over — Great Britain

	Current smokers*		Base=100 per cent.
	Percentages	Numbers
1972	51	11,536	22,471
1974	52	10,990	21,281
1976	49	11,368	23,409
1978	46	10,258	22,518
1980	†43	9,655	22,500
1982	†39	7,689	19,730
1984	†37	6,738	18,058

* For 1974 and 1976, figures include occasional cigar smokers, that is, those who smoked less than 1 cigar a month.
† In 1980 to 1984 males were not asked about pipe-smoking, and therefore the figures for all smokers exclude those who smoked only a pipe.

(b) Prevalence of cigarette smoking 1972-1984

Persons aged 16 and over — Great Britain

	Current cigarette smokers*		Base=100 per cent.
	Percentages	Numbers
1972	46	10,495	22,630

1980	39	8,885	22,554
1982	35	7,016	19,840
1984	34	6,206	18,205

* Figures for cigarettes include all smokers of manufactured and hand-rolled cigarettes.

Foetal Material

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether it is the policy of his Department that foetal material may be used by the cosmetics industry;

(2) whether it is the policy of his Department that the recommendations of the Peel committee on the use of foetal material should apply to all licensed private abortion clinics and commercial firms;

(3) whether his Department is aware of any trade in foetal material, within, to or from the United Kingdom;

(4) whether it is proposed to make unlawful the buying and selling of human tissue including foetal material.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's policy is that the use and disposal of foetal material should be governed by the code of practice recommended in the report of the advisory group on the use of foetuses and foetal material for research—the Peel report, 1972. We have no plans for legislation in this area. If the hon. Member has evidence that the Peel code is being breached, I will certainly investigate it. As far as the buying and selling of human tissue other than foetal material is concerned, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 16 May by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) at columns 225-6.

Health Expenditure

Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the outturn revenue spending of each district health authority from 1981-82 to 1984-85 and the budgeted revenue spending for 1985-86.

Mr. Hayhoe: The table shows the breakdown of revenue expenditure between regions, including sums spent directly by regional health authorities, from 1981-82 to 1984-85, and the initial revenue allocations notified to regional health authorities for 1985-86. For the years 1981-82 to 1983-84, the expenditure of individual regional health authorities and district health authorities — area health authorities for 1981-82 — is recorded in the Department's annual summaries of health authorities' accounts, copies of which are held in the Library. The summary for 1984-85 is now being prepared and will be placed in the Library when it is available. Details of regional health authorities' allocations to district health authorities for 1985-86 are not held centrally.

*Provisional figures.

†NHS restructuring on 1 April 1982 resulted in significant boundary changes between the North West Thames and North East Thames regions.

Notes:

1. Expenditure figures are derived from the annual accounts submitted by health authorities to the Department. They exclude payments to doctors, dentists, pharmacists, opticians and others providing services under contracts with family practitioner committees.
2. The expenditure figures include the expenditure of income generated locally by health authorities, and are therefore not fully comparable with the Department's allocations to regions for 1985-86. The amount of such income in 1984-85 is estimated at £79 million.

Health Authorities (Employees)

Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the numbers employed by each district health authority from 1981-82 to 1984-85 and expected numbers employed in 1985-86 for each of the following categories: (a) medical nursing, (b) paramedical and technical, (c) administrative and clerical, (d) ancillary and (e) others.

Mr. Whitney: I shall write to the hon. Member with the information requested as soon as possible.

Registered Homes Tribunals (Decisions)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to seek to ensure that the reports containing the decisions of the registered homes tribunals are placed in the Library except when their release is expressly refused by the tribunals.

Mr. Whitney: Yes.

Private Medical Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice his Department has given concerning the circumstances in which health authorities should regard their private patients' wings as economically unviable; and what controls he has over the speculative refurbishing of such wings.

Mr. Hayhoe: None. These matters are for decision by the individual health authorities concerned.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that family practitioner committees and community health councils will retain a role in relation to detained National Health Service patients contracted out to private institutions.

Mr. Hayhoe: I will write to the hon. Member.

Social Security Reform (Green Paper)

Mr. Ryder asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Social Security Advisory Committee will be publishing its evidence to him on the proposals in the Green Paper on the reform of social security.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the Social Security Advisory Committee to publish its evidence to him on the proposals in the social security Green Paper; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I understand that the fourth report of the Social Security Advisory Committee is being published today. The report reproduces the committee's advice to Ministers on the proposals contained in the Green Paper on reform of social security. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of staff employed by local authorities in calculating and administering housing benefit.

Mr. Major: I shall write to my hon. and learned Friend as soon as possible.

High Rent Area Authorisations

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be (a) the estimated cost and (b) the estimated gains and losses, by income band, of the introduction of a single taper scheme based on net income and with rent tapers of (i) 35p, (ii) 40p, (iii) 45p and (iv) 50p, and rate tapers of half the rent taper.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1985, c. 515]: The estimated increase in expenditure of the net income housing benefit schemes, based on the assumptions given in the notes below, would be as follows:

	Rent taper	Rates taper	Increase in expenditure
	Percentage	Percentage	(£ million per annum)
(i)	35	17·5	340
(ii)	40	20	160

The estimated gains and losses by income bands in relation to the current needs allowances would be as follows:

Notes:

1. The estimates are derived from the DHSS housing benefits computer simulation model for standard housing benefit with the following adjustments to the standard parameters as at November 1984:

a. Needs allowances — set at the appropriate long-term supplementary benefit scale rate plus £2 eg single person £37·70, couple/lone parent £59·10. The pensioner addition is assumed to be nil, but the dependent child addition is unchanged.

b. 100 per cent. starting point—the starting point for the calculation of benefit, normally 60 per cent. of rent and of rates, is increased to 100 per cent.

c. Tapers—those below the needs allowance become nil whilst those above the needs allowance are set at the levels indicated in each table.

d. Net Income—the level of gross income taken into account is reduced where appropriate by the assumed amount of income tax and national insurance contributions, the latter at the not contracted out rate, on the basis that income remains constant throughout the tax year. Similarly only the single person's, married man's, wife's earned income, and additional personal tax allowances are assumed to be available.

e. Earnings disregards—both earnings disregards are assumed to be £4·35 the level of the current main earner's disregard once the tax and national insurance elements have been removed.

2. The computer simulation model is based on family expenditure survey data updated and adjusted to reflect actual housing benefit caseloads and expenditure. The estimates are therefore subject to statistical and modelling error. In particular figures of 50,000 or less will be subject to very considerable proportionate error, and individual breakdowns should accordingly be treated with caution.

3. Caseload estimates are rounded to the nearest 10,000. Figures of less than 5,000 are indicated by an asterisk. Some totals may, therefore not be equal to the sum of their component parts. Expenditure estimates are rounded to the nearest £10 million.

4. Certificated caseload and expenditure remain unchanged.

5. The model does not take account of the effects of the different schemes on housing benefit supplement. The expenditure estimates therefore do not take account of changes in HBS.

Toxocara Canis

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of toxocara canis have been recorded in the last three years.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 25 October 1985, c. 284]: Figures are not available centrally on the incidence of toxocara canis. The only serious disease which is certainly attributable to this infection is ocular toxocariasis and about 50 such cases are reported each year in England and Wales. There is no epidemiological evidence to suggest that the incidence of ocular toxocariasis is increasing.

Child Care

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with local authorities and voluntary organisations about joint funding for the care of children who have left mental hospitals.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: Local authorities and voluntary bodies, as well as health authorities, are well aware of the importance we attach to appropriate placements and support for mentally handicapped children, and to the scope for both central funding and joint finance. The policy is regularly emphasised, and specific projects are discussed with voluntary bodies. It is for district health authorities, together with local authorities and voluntary bodies, to discuss local projects and joint finance in the light of local priorities. We emphasise close collaboration in regional reviews. All proposals to use joint finance money must be recommended by the relevant joint consultative committee on which the health and local authorities and voluntary organisations are represented.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what percentage of cases children who are released from mental hospitals return to the parental or family home.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: This information is not available centrally. It is impossible to generalise. Children who are released from mental hospitals either return to their parental or family home, or are placed in other domestic settings.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to ensure that full and adequate community care is provided for children who are released from mental hospitals.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: We have helped to finance the move to community care by making over £11 million available under our children's initiative to help both health authorities and voluntary organisations fund schemes for moving children out of hospital; by joint finance allocations to health authorities of over £100 million in 1985-86 about a third of which can be expected to be spent on mental handicap services; and by enabling health authorities to transfer funds from their ordinary budgets for as long as necessary to local authorities or voluntary organisations for patients, including children, transferred from long-stay hospitals to be cared for in the community. In addition, the national development team for mentally handicapped people and the Department's own social services inspectorate are available to advise authorities on the provision of services, and the annual ministerial reviews of regional health authorities provide an opportunity for us to look at how effectively health authorities, jointly with local authorities, are planning the shift to community care.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under which health authorities the children who leave mental hospitals are reviewed for their health, social service and educational needs.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: It is for the health authority making the new arrangements, in co-operation with the relevant local authority, to satisfy itself that a child transferred from hospital is moved into an adequate and appropriate form of community care. All authorities are expected to undertake joint, multi-disciplinary assessments of the needs of mentally handicapped children moving into community care, the aim of which should be the formulation of a programme designed to meet the child's specific health, educational, social and other needs.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children have been admitted to mental hospitals in each of the last five years; and if he will name the hospitals and their locations.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: The available information is given in the two tables. The figures in table 1 include repeated admissions for short-term care or assessment. Both tables include some admissions to small NHS units in the community.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the record for each regional health authority, in each of the past five years, of releasing children from mental hospitals.

Mr. Whitney [Pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: The table shows, for each region, the changes in the number of children resident in mental handicap hospitals and units at 31 December in the years 1980-1984. The figures include children admitted for short-term care or assessment.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the numbers of children in each of the last five years who have ceased to be included in statistics as children in mental hospitals because they reached the age of 16 years.

Mr. Whitney [Pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: This information is not available centrally. Young people aged 16 and over are also being moved out of hospital, either as part of the children's initiative or as part of the wider shift to community care.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the change over the last five years in the number of children under the age of 16 years who are in mental hospitals.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: The available information for England is given in the table. The figures include children in hospital for short-term care or assessment.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what date he estimates that all children will be removed from long-stay mental handicap hospitals.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: It is not at this stage possible to make such an estimate. Health authorities are well aware of the need to keep under review all the remaining long-stay mentally handicapped children in hospital wards and to make plans for their placement in small locally based units run by the health or local authority, or the voluntary sector, or in their own homes with appropriate support. It would not be helpful to set universally applicable dates for the closure of children's wards. It is important to get children out of long-stay hospital placements, but it is more important to ensure that they are going into more appropriate and better provision, and centrally imposed deadlines may well prove more hindrance than help in achieving this.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children under the age of 16 years are in mental hospitals with 25 or more beds; if he will name the hospitals and their locations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 28 October 1985, c. 381]: There were 656 children under 16 years of age resident in NHS mental handicap hospitals and hospital units in England with 25 or more available beds at 31 December 1984. The hospitals and hospital units are listed in the table. The figures include children in hospital for short-term care or assessment. It is encouraging to note the success of the Government's children's initiative in reducing the number of mentally handicapped children in hospital and we will continue to do all we can to ensure that progress continues.

Information Technology (Overseas Sales)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government intend to seek powers to permit the sale overseas of information technology obtained under the work of the Alvey programme; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Prime Minister if she intends to invite the House to consider the decision to renew the United Kingdom's acceptance of the right of individual petition under the European Convention on Human Rights.

The Prime Minister: There is no time in the present Session for a debate on the right of individual petition under the European Convention on Human Rights, and I can give no undertaking as regards the time available in the coming Session.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister whether, during her recent visit to the United States of America, she discussed the Alvey programme with President Reagan or senior United States officials; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No.

Efficiency Scrutinies

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on steps which are taken to ensure the implementation of recommendations made by efficiency scrutinies.

The Prime Minister: A report "Making things happen: the implementation of Government scrutinies" is being published on 31 October. Copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

The report, produced by members of the Efficiency Unit, looks at the implementation of scrutinies which were conducted in Departments between 1979 and 1984 in association with Sir Derek (now Lord) Rayner and latterly Sir Robin Ibbs. The report finds that scrutinies have already saved £750 million with more to come, but that delays do occur in making decisions on scrutiny recommendations. These delays cost money.

I have accepted the recommendations the report makes for revising the scrutiny process to ensure a swifter timetable for implementation and for placing the responsibility on permanent secretaries to get results. These changes are reflected in new notes for guidance which will be published and distributed with the report.

Offences Against Children (Judicial Inquiry)

Mr. Dickens asked the Prime Minister if she will institute a judicial inquiry into (a) the consequences of Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the prevention of child abuse and murder of recent court cases involving cruelty towards babies and young children and (b) the implications of those cases for the co-ordination of departmental responsibilities for agencies charged with providing or supporting child welfare services and the efficacy and appropriateness of current Government guidelines issued on this subject; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I shall write to my hon. Friend shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

Factory Inspectors

Mr. Golding asked the Paymaster General how many visits to workplaces have been undertaken by Her Majesty's inspectors of factories in north Staffordshire in each year since 1978.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers of visits to workplaces by the factory inspectorate in north Staffordshire in each year since 1981 are as follows:

Year	Visits
1981	2,090
1982	2,166
1983	1,908
1984	2,126

The figures for 1978 to 1980 could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people have been taken on under the youth training scheme by his Department and bodies for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and shall place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General what percentage of young people on youth training scheme programmes go on to full-time employment nationally and by region in England.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a regular postal survey of young people who have left the youth training scheme. Questionnaires are sent to young people some three months after they leave the scheme.

The following results relate to those leaving the youth training scheme between June 1984 and March 1985 based on a 15 per cent. sample of leavers in each month:

Ionising Radiations Regulations

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received on the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985; and if he will make a statement on the action he is taking in the light of these representations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Ministers in this Department have received 10 representations concerning the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985. The regulations were the subject of long and wide-ranging consultations by the Health and Safety Commission. I do not propose to take any action.

Information Technology (Training and Jobs)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Paymaster General what plans he currently has for the development of training schemes and job creation measures specifically related to information technology.

Mr. Trippier: The Government intend to continue their programme of pump-priming support for training which aims to meet skill needs of the labour market. Priority is given to new technology skills including information technology and to computer-based learning techniques. These include the open tech programme, priority skills training and local training grants to employers. We are continuing to provide access to information technology training through skillcentre new technology access centres, information technology centres and the access to information technology scheme.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Paymaster General (1) how many redundancies in (a) the textile industry, (b) machine tool engineering, (c) general engineering, (d) service trades and (e) steel fabrication work were made in the last last month for which statistics are available in the Workington travel-to-work area;

(2) how many redundancy notifications were given during the last month for which statistics are available in the Workington travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: A provisional total if 18 redundancies were confirmed by the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in jobcentre areas approximating to the Workington travel-to-work area in August 1985, the latest month for which statistics are available. All the redundancies were in the transport industry (Standard Industrial Classification 1980 classes 71-77). There were no advance notifications in August of redundancies involving 10 or more workers.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Paymaster General how many additional places were sponsored by Allerdale district council under the youth training scheme and the community programme separately for the last month for which statistics are available; and what is the total number of places now being supported by that authority under each scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: Allerdale district council has a community programme agency for 395 places, of which 381 places have been approved. Of these places 353 were filled on 30 September 1985. No youth training scheme places are currently sponsored by the district council.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Paymaster General what is the total of young people who have become unemployed and who have registered at unemployment benefit offices in each travel-to-work area in Cumbria in the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The table gives, for the travel-to-work areas requested, the numbers of persons aged under 18 years who became unemployed claimants between the counts of 8 August and 12 September 1985.

	Numbers
Barrow-in-Furness	479
Carlisle	327
Kendal	67
Keswick	12
Penrith	65
Whitehaven	233
Windermere	14
Workington	281

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Paymaster General how many youth training scheme places were identified and supported in the Workington travel-to-work area and the county of Cumbria during the last month for which statistics are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: At the end of September 1985, there were 1,247 approved places in the Allerdale and Copeland local authority districts, which largely correspond to the Workington travel-to-work area, and 3,300 approved places in the county of Cumbria.

During the month of September, 153 places were approved by the Cumbria area manpower board; 56 of these were for one large mode A scheme in Allerdale local authority district.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Paymaster General what proportion of (a) unemployed males and (b) unemployed females in the Barrow in Furness, Kendal, Whitehaven, Carlisle, Keswick and Penrith travel-to-work areas had been out of work for (i) one year, (ii) two years and (iii) three years at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the requested information in respect of unemployed claimants as at 11 July 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available.

Duration of unemployment—Travel-to-work areas—11 July 1985

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate the percentage of the work force of each region of England employed in manufacturing industry at the latest date, in 1980 and in 1975.

Mr. Alan Clark: The percentages of employees from each of the English standard regions who are employed in manufacturing industry are shown in the following table:

	June 1985	June 1980	June 1975
South East	21·2	24·4	26·3
Greater London (included in South East)	16·4	N/A	N/A

North	27·6	31·9	35·5

Local Enterprise Agencies

Mr. Bellingham asked the Paymaster General what progress has been made in encouraging local enterprise agencies to promote equity investment in small firms.

Mr. Trippier: I welcome the initiatives taken by some local enterprise agencies to bring together small companies seeking equity finance and potential investors. The business expansion scheme introduced in the 1983 Finance Act makes this form of investment particularly attractive and local enterprise agencies are ideally placed to operate "marriage broking" services which respond to the interest the scheme has generated. My Department, in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Industry, will be issuing guidance notes to local enterprise agencies to explain the legal considerations which might arise under investor protection legislation and to offer advice to those agencies considering activities in this area. There is considerable scope for local enterprise agencies to encourage equity investment at local level to the mutual benefit of both small companies and investors and I hope that the guidance notes will help them to continue and expand their contribution to this important objective.

Food Retailers

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to make arrangements to assist retailers of food and refreshments in seaside towns who have suffered severe losses in consequence of the bad weather.

Mr. Trippier: We have no such plans but through the activities of the English tourist board the Government are encouraging seaside resorts to broaden their tourism base and develop all weather attractions. For commercial interests dependent on tourism this is the best insurance in the longer term against the uncertainties of the British climate.

Incomes

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General what is the average family income, personal income and wage for each region of England at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The most recent regional information on average household income, the wages and salaries component of that income, and the average numbers of persons per household (from which personal income can be derived) is given in the Department of Employment publication "Family Expenditure Survey 1983", a copy of which is in the library.

Small Firms Loan Guarantee

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how many loans given under the small firms loan guarantee scheme have not been used for the original intended purpose.

Mr. Trippier: Where a lender is aware of a change in the purpose of a guaranteed loan this is required to be notified to the Department. Information about the number of cases in which a change has been notified could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 84

SESSION 1984–85

21st October—30th October 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
